The Nautilus (Stangate) Oars Match.—The gentlemen of this club rowed, on Monday evening, for a pair of gold oars, subscribed for by the members. The distance was from Battersea to Hammersmith-bridge, and four boats started. Messrs. Dyett and Ford were the winners.

Cricket.—The match between Seven Gentlemen of Nottingham with Four Players v. Eleven Players of Nottingham, was played last week upon Clark's Trent-bridge Ground. It had been arranged that it should be a match of one innings. The ground was well and fashionably attended. Slow bowling has, in this case, gained another victory, for Clark carried off nine wickets, notwithstanding those against whom he bowled are in the constant habit of standing before him. The follo-wing was the score.—Gentlemen, 111; Players, 125.

The match between the Marylebone Club and Ground v. County of Hants, with Box, Pilch, and Martin—two elevens—terminated in favour of the Marylebone Club, by 136 runs.

The match between the Marylebone Club and ground v. the Western Counties, with Box, Pilch, and A. Mynn, Esq., was won by the Western Counties in one innings by 90 runs.

Election for Limlithgowshire.—Mr. Baillie, younger, of Polkemmet the Conservative candidate, has been elected, without opposition, member for the county of Linlithgow, in the room of the Hon. Charles Hope, now Governor of the Isle of Man.

POSTSCRIPT.

LATEST NEWS OF HER MAJESTY.

(From our own Correspondent). COBURG, August 24.

The theatre opened last night for the performance of a German drama. The piece selected was Schiller's "Bride of Messina"—written as an experiment. It is an attempt to construct a tragedy on the model of that of the Greeks. The form is strictly adhered to, except in a few changes of scene, and the play is beautiful as a composition; but, as an acting drama, it has defects that quite outweigh its literary merit. In the first place, the story is repulsive in its nature to modern feelings and ideas. It depicts the hatred of two brothers, who are mutually enamoured of a beautiful girl—Beatrice. She proves to be their sister, brought up in secret by their mother, in consequence of a dream that a daughter of the Royal House of Messina would bring ruin and destruction on the princely line. The means taken to prevent the catastrophe only tend to hasten it. In ignorance of her birth, both the brothers conceive a passion for her. At the opening of the piece their mother effects a reconciliation between them, and old hatreds are forgotten. The complication of the plot is admirably kept up till the fatal revelation is made; then the old enmity breaks forth afresh, more intense from the addition of jealousy and revenge: one murders his brother's hand, the survivor destroys himself, and Beatrice dies broken-hearted.

It is as dark a tale of woe as ancient tragedy ever wrought from the elements of human blindness and mortal passion, borne on by that invisible and inevitable power, which, under the name of Fate, or Destiny, the Greeks believed hung for ever over certain families; the doom that is seen impending over the House of Œdipus, is reproduced in the "Bride of Messina;" but with this disadvantage—to a Greek audience the belief in that destiny was almost a part of its creed, and their minds were prepared for the events; the hideous incidents shadowed forth, were rather exclamations than crimes, and awe and pity—a kind of "sacred horror"—were the emotions produced. The moderns have no such bel ef, or rather, superstition; they must be imbued with the feeling, as a key to the plot, and that is very ineffectually done by a narrative. But the great defect of the "Bride of Messina," is the subject that is constantly suggested to the mind throughout the play. Nothing can redeem it from repulsiveness. Setting these considerations aside, the drama is well constructed; the mother, the two brothers, and Beatrice, the "direful spring of woes unnumbered," are strongly contrasted; the chorus is represented by the armed retainers of the brothers. The poetry is partly blank verse, but long passages in rhyme are also introduced. Such a play requires music, and the "Bride of Messina," with the choruses arranged like those of "Anticona," might be successful; as a spoken drama, never. The mere sound of thirty or forty voices speaking together in "stage" tones, fine moral maxims, or sage warnings, has an effect the very opposite of grand or pathetic. Music would throw its charm over all this, and preserve, in skilful hands, every variety of expression. Schiller's choruses, arranged by a Mendelssohn, would form a great work.

The drama was "cast" on the present occasion with all the strength of the tragic company of the theatre. Isabella of Messina, the mother of the two Princes, was especially well played by a Madame Schroeder-Gerlach. There are fine bursts of dramatic power in the piece, and some effective situations; but, as a whole, the effect is heavy. It has been determined to display to her Majesty all the resources of the theatre: the first night the Queen attended, an opera was played—"The Huguenots;" last night, a tragedy; to-morrow, a comedy is to be given.

The theatre itself is small and elegant; the Royal box is very large, and is the centre of the dress circle—a far better place than in our overgrown houses. There are no private boxes, all is open and free; and they are so constructed as to require no pillars or supports in front—an immense advantage, both as to the appearance of the interior and the comfort of the audience.

Her Majesty took refreshment in the box during the evening, according to the custom here. On the return of the Royal party, the carriages were escorted by horsemen with lighted torches.

To-day her Majesty attended Divine Service in the Church of St. Maurice, which may be called the Cathedral. It is a building of considerable size; the interior as plain and simple as possible, and, after seeing the gorgeous churches of Flanders and Cologne, appears cold and bare. But it is appropriated to a form of worship less ceremonial. The place of the altar is occupied by a large tomb, or monument, of three of the Dukes of Coburg (brothers), whose statues are placed on the base, in a kneeling attitude, with their hands joined in prayer; they are as large as if elaborately carved in marble, and coloured according to the taste of the time. The rest of the monument is rich with carvings of Scripture scenes, some of them very spirited; it is very lofty, an open screen for the altar itself. from its form and position might easily be mistaken for the altar itself. It has been rent and shivered by a stroke of lightning, but all the figures and ornaments remain. Before it stands the Communion Table. The body of the church is fitted up with seats, but there are no pews; the galleries, of which there are two, one above the other, are occupied by the men; the women sit in the body of the church. The Royal pew is at the chancel end of the gallery, to the right of the Communion Table; it is enclosed with glass windows, and is a somewhat large apartment. The reading desk is below it in the centre of the church, and the pulpit directly opposite.

The church was crowded in every part; the chancel was occupied by the girls' schools, in the same pretty costume they wore at the fête already described—white, with green wreaths and garlands in their hair. As the bright sun gleamed down on them from the lofty windows, the effect was exceedingly picturesque.

Her Majesty was received at the door of the church by the clergymen in their robes, who preceded her to the foot of the stairs leading to the Royal pew. The Princess of Coburg, the Queen of the Belgians, the Duchess of Kent, and Prince Albert, were also present. The Lutheran service is very simple; it opens with a few verses, chanted by the minister standing at the Communion Table, with responses from the choir; a hymn sung by all the congregation follows; portions of Scripture are read, another hymn, a short prayer or address, and then the Communion Table. On the present occasion a Te Deum was sung in addition to the musical part of the service; it was not the Te Deum of our service, but a rhymed hymn, the music composed by Schicht. It was given by the choir alone, supported by the brass instruments of the military band; the effect was magnificent; nothing could exceed in grandeur the combination of sound in this song of praise, which rolled through the church in one rich wave of melody. It opened with a chorus to the words—the Lord of Hosts, thy servants sing thy praise.

Kneeling to thee, in thankfulness and joy,

At the tenth line it was taken up as a tenzet, admirably sung; and concluded with the full chorus again in the "Hallelujah." The singing, in which the congregation joined, exhibited the advantage of musical training among the many. It was in the usual psalm metres, as in our services, but the tune was more marked, and the voices kept better together than in the congregational singing of our churches.

The sermon was one of sound Protestant doctrine, the subject being the necessity for freedom of opinion, and the resting on religious belief on the words of Scripture alone. It contained no allusion whatever to matters of worldly interest, or present excitement.

As the observance of outward forms in the celebration of Divine Worship is among us, at present, a question of no slight importance, it may be useful to state that in this, the only Lutheran Protestant Church, there is nothing like a surplice to be seen, either out of the pulpit or in it; the ministers wear the simple black gown and band, the garb of Geneva. A collection of money is made during the service, as in all Continental churches—which might be deemed an authority for the Offertory; and two tapers stand on the Communion Table, with the vessels for the Sacrament. These may be slight relics of the old ritual; but the service itself differs far more widely from the Mass than our own.

But, whatever change may have been made in religious belief and the form of worship, Lutheranism has not in the slightest degree altered the manners of the people with respect to the observance of the Sabbath: a pious English Churchman would be as much shocked in this church of the Protestant Church as in France itself, which is considered the most lax in this part of the... Here—at Coburg—all is life and gaiety; the booths erected for the fête of the children are filled with people; the pleasant meadow where they stand is thronged with chatting knots of the peasantry, in their best attire; the showmen are in full activity without and within; the roundabouts are flying in their merriest whirls; the strains of lively music rise on every side, and, in a large saloon, the chil lren, who in the morning attended the church, are waltzing away to a good band, with all the delight of youth and high spirits, under the supervision of their teachers! An extensive trade is being done in the frying of sausages in the open air; and, altogether, it is a complete festival—here an ordinary affair, though in England it might degenerate into riot, and, in the lanes of Edinburgh, would be considered a crying enormity. Such are the differences of country and considered a crying enormity. Such are the differences of country and

IRELAND.

BARBAROUS MURDER IN BANTRY.—The vicinity of Bantry was the scene of a very horrifying murder on the 18th inst., a murder of the most revolting character, according to all and more than absurd cus'om around Holy Well, where they spent the day and night, some in tents drinking, and others in devotional exercise. Among the former were two policemen named Flynn and Murphy, who, as the maddening glass went round, came to blows, when the latter party succeeded in ejecting their opponents from the tent. Irritated at their defeat, the Flynns returned with a large reinforcement, and a desperate onslaught on the Murphys, several of whom were severely injured. One of them, however, a very fine and powerful young man, named John Murphy, who, though a pensioner, and having no part in the said orgies of the night, had unfortunately become mixed up in the fray, was felled to the ground by a dreadful instrument called a griffane, which dashing in a portion of his brain, left him all but dead. While thus lying on his back, a fiend in woman's form took a large stone, and coming over the prostrate man, let it fall with violence on his chest. Instant death was the result. Some of the party engaged in the affray have been arrested by the police, but the immediate murderess have as yet escaped their vigilance.

THE HARVEST IN IRELAND.—The latest accounts supplied by the Irish provincial journals generally are rather gloomy as regards the wheat crop, which is described as likely to turn out deficient; but, regarding all other produce, they report very favourably.

NEW LOCOMOTIVE AGENCY.—A letter from Philadelphia has the following:—"William Evans has received a problem, which must overturn and subvert all system of railroads and steam boat propulsion. By means of enormous compression, he has succeeded in liquifying atmospheric air, and then, a few drops only of some chemical composition, poured into it, suffice to restore its original volume with an elastic force quite prodigious. An experiment, on a large scale, has just been made. A train of twenty-six waggons was transmitted a distance of sixty miles, in less than an hour and a quarter—the whole motive power being the liquid air inclosed in a vessel of two gallons and a half measure; into which fell, drop by drop, and from minute to minute, the chemical composition in question. Already, subscriptions are abundant, and a society is in course of formation. The inventor declares, that an ordinary packet-boat may make the passage from Philadelphia to Havre in eight days, carrying a ton of his liquid air. A steam-engine of six horse power will produce that quantity in eight hours."

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

THE ALLEGED CUSTOM-HOUSE ROBBERY.—On Monday, three individuals formerly connected with the Customs, William Strickland, aged thirty seven, victualler; Edward Lewis, aged thirty seven, ironmonger; William Bonham, aged thirty six, coal dealer; and Henry Osborn, aged thirty eight, victualler, were tried, on an indictment, charging Strickland, Lewis, and Bonham, with stealing five watches, the property of Joseph Savory and another: and Osborn, with feloniously receiving the same, well knowing them to have been stolen. We have already mentioned the circumstances of the alleged robbery. Evidence was offered in support of the prosecution; but, as the jury acquitted all the prisoners, it is not necessary to recapitulate it.

MALICIOUS MURDER.—Joseph Harvey was indicted for killing Charles Rutherby, by striking him, on the 8th of April.—Mr. Payne stated the case to the jury. The deceased was a musician, and resided in a cottage at Walworth. There the prisoner, who had formerly occupied it, had also resided. Deceased had given him six months' notice to quit, which time had expired, and a reluctance on the part of the prisoner to give up the ground had given rise to the affray on the 8th of April, which terminated fatally. It would appear that on that day the wife of the deceased saw the prisoner sowing some seed in the ground he had received notice to quit. She went up and remonstrated with him on the folly of acting so, as her husband wanted the ground. Prisoner was very abusive, and complained that he had not had a legal notice, and that he was entitled to twelve months' notice; adding, that he should like to have an up and down fight for it. Her husband came out, upon which he gave him a violent shove upon the chest, which upset him. Deceased got him down, and, if he wanted to take proper possession of the ground, he should stick a spade in it. The husband accordingly did so, when prisoner snatched it out of the earth, and flung it at him, but it missed him, and went over his head. Deceased told prisoner that he did not wish to go to law with him, and all he wanted was peace and quietness. The prisoner then threw him on the ground, and dragged him along for some distance, and prisoner's niece came from their house, and unchained a large bull-dog, saying, "Here, Pincher, you are man enough to beat the fiddler." Deceased made his escape into the house, with his clothes all splashed in mud. Shortly after he was taken sick, and threw up a quantity of blood; he continued to get gradually worse, and was admitted an in door patient to Guy's Hospital. He left there, and returned home, where he gradually sank until he expired. The post mortem examination proved that, although his lungs were in a diseased state, the primary cause of death had been the rupture of a blood vessel on the lungs, resulting, in all probability, from the violence he had received.—Witnesses were called who proved these facts—The jury found him guilty of an assault, and the judgment was respited.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

AWFULLY SUDDEN DEATH.—A charity sermon was preached on Sunday morning last, at the parish church of Hendon, Middlesex, by the Rev. J. B. Dyne, M.A., head master of Highgate School, in aid of the funds for the benefit of the Charity Children School, at Hendon, and a liberal collection (about £45, was made. The plates were held at the door of the church by several highly respectable proprietors and residents in the parish; but one gentleman having disappointed the Rev. Rector, he in the emergency applied to Mr. Wood, the auctioneer, &c., of Mill Hill, and he was apparently in excellent health, walking across the churchyard from one door to the other with his plate in his hand, during the singing of an appropriate hymn at the conclusion of the sermon, in order to take the collection, when he suddenly staggered and fell lifeless into the arms of another gentleman. The noblemen and gentlemen immediately rushed to his aid, and Mr. Holgate, the surgeon was called out of his pew to render assistance, but all to no purpose; he was dead.

ACCIDENT TO COLONEL LASCELLES.—On Monday afternoon, between two and three o'clock, an accident attended with serious consequences occurred in South-street, Grosvenor-square, to Colonel Lascelles, of the Grenadier Guards. The unfortunate gentleman, who is very corpulent, was mounted on a spirited horse, when, in turning the corner of Park-street, the animal's hind hoofs stumbled, and the gallant officer was thrown violently to the ground, the left side of his face coming in collision with the edge of the curbstone. On being raised from the ground he was insensible. The gallant officer was conveyed to his residence, 35, Upper Grosvenor-street, and the assistance of Sir Benjamin Brodie and two other medical gentlemen, who are still in attendance, was obtained. It appears that the right eye is somewhat cut or bruised, and the shoulder is injured.

DEATH OF A FEMALE MISER.—On Tuesday, Mr. Payne held an inquest, at the Owen Glendower public house, Aldersgate-street, on the body of Miss Palmer Phipps, aged seventy. The deceased had lived for a number of years in a small back room, in Edmund's place, Aldersgate street, and, from her mode of living, the neighbours always supposed her to be in great poverty. The deceased was last seen alive on Saturday afternoon. Not being seen on Sunday or Monday morning, the landlady went to her room door, and knocked repeatedly, but without receiving any answer. Eventually, the door was burst open, and the deceased was found lying in bed, quite dead, and had evidently been so some time. On making an examination of the premises, a discovery was made of a pocket book in a box, which contained several Bank of England note for £300, which were concealed in a box provided with a false bottom. On making further search, and on examining the pocket book which was found to contain several Bank of England notes of £10 each, placed under a false bottom, most artfully contrived. There being no relatives of the deceased forthcoming, the coroner adjourned the inquest to the ward beadle to take possession of the property, until such time as the proper persons came forward to substantiate their claim to it. The jury returned a verdict of "Natural death."

MELANCHOLY DEATH OF A CLERGYMAN'S DAUGHTER.—A fatal accident happened to a daughter of the Rev. Benjamin Hoe, of Cure lane, Clapham. It appears that at the back of the house is a small flat-roofed garden, and there the children were usually taken to play in the garden, and the deceased among them. On this occasion the deceased child got away from the nurse, and, whilst running on the bank of the above ground, unfortunately stepped into it. The servant used every means to get the child out, which she succeeded in doing in a few minutes, and conveyed it to the house, when a surgeon was sent for, who promptly attended, and used every means within his reach to restore animation, but, as the child had been in a sickly state of health, all his efforts were useless. The Rev Mr. Hoe was at York at the time.

CAUSE OF THE LATE ACCIDENTS ON THE CAMBRIDGE LINE.—The following is a copy of the official report of the directors of the Eastern Counties Company to the Board of Trade, describing the cause of the recent accidents:—Nature of Accident.—Engine (the 30 down fast train) Camel, and Driver, Wing, ran off the line near Waterbeach, and overturned.—Cause of accident.—Supposed defective joint of the rail caught the flange of the wheel of the engine, the flanges being on the principle used by the Great Western Railway, but not so well adapted for the rails of the Eastern Counties Railway.—Remarks.—The engine will not be used again with passenger trains until the flanges have been altered. The engine will be going more than 32 miles per hour, and the whole train did not go off the line.

RAILWAY ACCIDENT AT ELY.—On Monday last, when the labourers were returning home from their work at Ely, an accident of a fatal nature occurred, arising from the carelessness of the person whose death was occasioned. The labourers are conveyed down the line on trucks, and the heedlessness of one of the men in the habit of getting on his cart, can be proved. The labourer was about, and was carelessly sitting on his cart, when he overbalanced himself and fell under the train. The injuries he received were of the most dreadful nature. His skull was completely scalped and fractured, the eyes were crushed, and he sustained other severe injuries on the body. On his left arm crushed, and he sustained other severe injuries on the body. both externally and interly, a very handsome building, about the size of the Haymarket Theatre in London. The opera selected was "The Puritans." About eight o'clock, the Royal box, which was in the centre of the first row, was brilliantly lighted, and shortly afterwards, the reigning Duke, Queen Victoria, the King of the Belgians, the Duchess of Saxe Coburg-Gotha, Prince Albert, the Queen of the Belgians, the Duchess of Kent, the Earl of Aberdeen, and other distinguished individuals made their appearance. Immediately the orchestra struck up the national air "God save the Queen," which was sung in chorus (in English or German) by nearly all the persons in the theatre, and it was impossible not to be struck with their earnestness of manner and their warmth of expression. The reception given to her Majesty, on her entrance, was not boisterously enthusiastic; it was essentially and with good taste a respectful one, but it was at the same time a truly affectionate one. The theatre was literally crowded to the ceiling, for in the open space around the splendid chandelier a number of persons had obtained places, from which they had a bird's-eye view of the Royal box. After the first act (which passed off admirably) the Royal party retired to the saloon. The costumes were elegant, and the singing and music were first-rate.

Rosenau itself is the beau-ideal of a summer residence. It lies some four miles out of the town, amid meadows and hanging woods, and rich parterres of flowers. The building itself is curiously simple. On the summit of a little mount, fragrant with roses, and wreathed with plantations of tangled shrubbery, stands a plain house—its gables marked by those peculiar steps from the eaves of the roof to the summit, common in old mansions. A small round tower flanking the main body on one hand, alone breaks its uniformity. The view around is beautiful—the scenery is rich and park-like—vistas of wooded dells and fair meadows, and the distant ridges of dim forest stretch away far into the far-off country. Close to the house fountains play, and the ground is dazzling with the hues of many flowers. The whole is a little paradise. And what will astonish English notions is the unexclusive character of all this. Not a wall, not a sentinel, not a gate.

This Arcadian scene is engraved at page 137; and, together with the companion-view of the Palace of Ehrenberg, is from the beautiful drawings of his Royal Highness Prince Albert. Another vignette of the picturesque Rosenau, also from his Royal Highness' drawing, is engraved at page 137.

THE REIGNING DUKE AND DUCHESS OF SAXE-COBURG-GOTHA.—DRAWN BY BAUGNIET.

Not more than four miles from Rosenau, and nearer Coburg, there is another summer residence, the Palace of Prince Ernest of Wurtemberg, from which a very fine view is obtained of the vale in which Coburg is situate, the spire of the Church of St. Maurice rising boldly from the centre of the city. On the opposite heights is the fortress of Coburg.

The population of Coburg is about 10,000. That of Gotha, which is about 75 miles from Coburg, is 14,000. When her Majesty arrived at Coburg the whole population turned out to meet her. There were dense masses all along the road between the frontiers and the town. Not only these were there, but also the people of the surrounding country, in a circuit of many miles, came in crowds into Coburg. Some came as much as twenty German miles, and some from Leipsic.

The Palace of Rosenau is occupied by the Queen and Prince Albert. The other Royal personages, with their respective suites, stay at the town Palace of the Duke.

The late Duke of Saxe-Coburg married, in 1817, the Princess Louisa of Saxe-Gotha (from whom he was separated in 1824), and secondly, in 1832, the Princess Maria of Wurtemberg. The issue of his first marriage are the present reigning Duke, and our own Prince Albert. The Duke espoused, in 1842, the Princess Alexandrina, of Baden, who has two children. The portraits of the Duke and Duchess have been engraved from drawings by M. Baugniet, the celebrated Belgian artist.

The ancient fortress of Coburg contains a number of extremely interesting relics, among which may be mentioned the bedstead in which Luther slept when he took refuge in Coburg, the greater part of which has been chipped by pilgrims, who are anxious to bring away some relic of the great author of the Reformation. The fortress is of great extent, but has been suffered to go to decay, its commanding position and the friendly relations existing between the Principality of Coburg, and the great continental Powers rendering its preservation a matter of comparative indifference. The principal apartments are hung with pictures of the most celebrated and distinguished Dukes of Coburg, and the walls in many places painted in fresco. The finest paintings are those of Marshal Tilly, and Duke Bernard of Coburg, who distinguished himself during the Thirty Years' War, painted by Schreder, an artist of Frankfort. Among the other portraits, are those of Gustavus Adolphus Wallenstein, the Emperor Charles V., the Duke John Casimir, &c. One of the rooms is fitted up with the most elaborate carving —the ceiling, walls, and floor being composed of various woods, beautifully inlaid, and the sides of the apartment representing the chase of the wild boar, deer, &c., in mosaic of different-coloured woods. The Rose Room has a ceiling of oak, beautifully carved and gilt, representing roses and buds in pleasing groups, and at the end of the room is an ancient carved buffet loaded with antique vases and drinking cups. One of the objects of greatest interest is the sitting-room of Luther, containing portraits of himself, his wife, Catherine of Poland, Melancthon, and other distinguished leaders of the Reformation, the space in the panelling around each figure being richly gilt. In the "Hall of Armour" is a magnificent collection of ancient armour, a portion of which has been presented by his Majesty Louis Philippe. It contains the massive two-handed swords used in the execution of state criminals, one of which, with the date 1679 on the blade, is said to have decapitated one hundred persons; several figures, mounted on horseback, in complete armour of the time of the Crusades; and a variety of curious cross-bows, spears, arrows, daggers, &c. In the centre of the fortress is a well, several hundred feet deep, to supply the garrison with water. The ancient carriages of Duke John Casimir are still preserved in the lower rooms adjoining the prison, and are elaborately carved and gilt, and are square built, somewhat resembling a char-a-banc, or a Burmese carriage. The view from the summit of the fortress is of great extent, including the long and lofty range of the Thuringian mountains on the north, Hesse Cassel and Bavaria to the east, Bohemia to the south, and Saxe Meiningen to the west; Saxe-Coburg being spread out beneath, and stretching away on the north and east towards Gotha. The whole plain beneath is a succession of corn-fields, meadow-land, and vineyards, with crests extending for several miles towards Bohemia, where game of every sort abounds, and where, it is understood, a grand battue will take place before the Queen leaves Coburg.

The events of Thursday and Friday will be found described elsewhere in the present number.]

Coburg, Saturday, August 23.

The Court has settled down into something like private life, little ceremony attending its movements among the quiet groves of Rosenau, and its occasional excursions into the towns, or through the environs of Coburg.

To-day the Queen and Prince Albert, driven by their Ducal host, paid a visit to the Chateau of Prince Ernest of Wurtemberg, a Twickenham-villa looking edifice, pleasantly placed on a green hill, some ten minutes walk from Coburg.

The Museum of the town was also honoured with a flying visit, and to-night the Royal party will attend the theatre, the "Bride of Messina," a tragedy of Schiller, being the entertainment.

A ball took place last night at the "Residence," which went agreeably off.

The vicinity of Coburg is beautiful. Kallenberg, the favourite palace of the reigning Duke, distant about four miles from Coburg, commands some of the finest prospects. Like almost all the palaces or "residences" around, it is perched on an eminence, which is reached by a winding road through a plantation, quite as beautiful as that which leads to Rosenau. The interior of the palace is fitted up in the most elegant, and, at the same time, "comfortable" style. Indeed, it deserves to be so characterised more than Royal residences generally. There is no ostentation or display such as is met with in "show places," but everything is of the most perfect workmanship and in the most exquisite taste.

This summer Palace is not built on a grand scale, but, like Rosenau, it has more the air of the residence of a private gentleman. The architecture is an odd mixture of the turreted style with the cottage ornée, and the effect is very pretty, although the materials are incongruous. Here the Duke and Duchess spend the greater part of their time during the fine weather, and a more delightful retreat could not well have been selected. Like everything else in and around Saxe Coburg, it belies the vulgar notions entertained in England as to the German style of living and manners. The Duke is fond of sporting, and keeps here a small pack of hounds. The residence is full of evidences of his inclination this way. One room, for instance, is almost entirely filled with emblems of the chase, worked into all imaginable ornaments. The easy chairs are made of antlers. Another room (the Duke's private study) is filled with engravings of every sort of sporting, French and English. The country, however, from being so much wooded, is not well adapted for field-sports generally; but a large preserve of wild boars is maintained at a short distance from Kallenberg. Attached to the

A TALE OF THE OPERA.

V

The person to whom house the Count directed his companion's attention, was a little, meagre old man, who, in his younger days, had won a considerable reputation as a singer, but had long since left the stage to repose on his laurels and his profits—if it can be conceived as possible for peace and profit ever to fall to the lot of a Theatrical Manager! He received the two friends with a kind of stage dignity a reminiscence of many mimic royalties—not in itself ungraceful, though rather marred in effect by his odd costume. He wore a black velvet skull cap, which he only took off when its place was supplied with a wig; a narrow cut coat, of nearly the last fashion, contrasted strongly with his antiquated head-dress; and his withered legs were thrust into a pair of "world-too-wide" small-clothes, that consequently hung about them in large folds. Notwithstanding the sixty years which might be plainly read in every wrinkle of his face, the worthy Manager did not appear to be quite dead to the little vanities of the world. His feet were cased in a pair of very comfortable, loose fur slippers, in which he walked, or rather slid, about the room, without any visible lifting of them from the ground; he advanced towards his visitors, as if moving on skates.

"I had already received notice of the intention of her Most Gracious Highness to honour me with her commands," said the Manager, after the Count had acquainted him with the object of their visit; "and, as far as it lies with me, I had resolved that nothing should be wanting; it is my ambition at all times to please my princely patrons; but yet, I would respectfully beg to remonstrate against her Highness's present choice."

"How! you will not perform this opera!" said the Count.

"Heaven forbid I should be compelled to give it—it were a direct attempt at assassination of one of the princely house. No! If my word has any weight, this fatal piece should never be given."

"I could never have thought," said the Count, "that a man so celebrated as yourself would listen to this gossip of the vulgar. In my earliest youth I heard your name spoken of in distant lands. You were called the prince of singers, and I have always had the liveliest curiosity to see the man who had won such a title. Do not lessen the high opinion I had formed of you by avowing such superstition."

The old man seemed to feel flattered; a quiet smile stole over his withered face; he thrust his hands deep into his pockets, and took a slide or two in his large slippers up and down the room.

"You are too good, my lord; too good indeed. Yes, we have been somewhat in our time. We were reckoned a fine tenor, but all things have an end. Superstition you said; I should be ashamed to yield to such a weakness, but where belief is grounded on facts, it is not superstition."

"Facts!" cried both the friends together.

"Yes, gentlemen, facts! You seem not to be of this city or state that you have never heard of them."

"I think I remember hearing of some such tale," said the Major. "It is believed, is it not, that every time 'Othello' is played the theatre is burned down?"

"The theatre burned down!" said the Manager. "I wish a fire were all that came of it. Fire can be quenched; and then there are insurance offices; or, at worst, a fire is a calamity which we may survive. But death, gentlemen, death! that is something more terrible."

"Death!" said the Count; "death to whom?"

"Alas! to whom is no matter of uncertainty. All the city, the whole state, know well what has always happened," said the Manager; "as often as 'Othello' is played, within eight days afterwards one of the princely family always dies."

The two friends rose in astonishment from their seats, for there was something terrible in the deep and earnest tone with which the old man uttered the words. It sounded like a prophecy of the future made from a fatal experience of the past. But in a few moments they resumed their seats, and laughed long and loudly at what they called such an absurdity.

"You laugh, gentlemen," said the Manager: "crime, and death, and retribution, are excellent jests, are they not? But you are strangers, and know not the things that are to me but too well certified. Do you see that book? It is the journal of the theatre, kept by every successive prompter for a hundred and twenty years. Shall I read you a few extracts from it?"

"The grave history of a mimic realm—what tragedies it must contain! Let us see it by all means," said the Count, whom the proposal seemed vastly to amuse.

The Manager, with an unusual activity, went to the bookcase, and took down a large folio, strongly bound and clasped. Putting on a reverend pair of tortoise-shell spectacles, he opened the book, and, turning over a few leaves, said—

"There! it is entered

"Anno 1745, December 8. The tragedy of "Othello," by Shakspeare, was played. Charlotte Fandanrin, actress, was suffocated on the stage, being found dead on the couch in the last scene."

"How could this be," said the Manager; "Shakspeare's plays were first given to the German stage by Schröder, and that not till long after 1745?"

"Excuse me," said the Manager; "the reigning Duke, during a residence in England, while on his travels, had seen this tragedy, and, struck with its marvellous power, got it translated, and on his return it was performed. But, observe, the Chronicle proceeds:

"The said Charlotte Fandanrin had acted Desdemona, and in the chamber scene in which Othello stifles her, she miserably perished. God be merciful to her soul!

"He was not an accident, gentlemen; it was a deliberate murder. The story goes that the actress was very beautiful; the Duke was a libertine, and the Count prejudice; Fandanrin was his mistress. Warned by the fate of many others who had been heartlessly abandoned and cast off, she had, in his day of passion, procured from him in writing a bond, containing some terrible conditions, to which he bound himself also by an oath, to be executed if he ever forsook her. But sin was in the plot; and it did not avail her with others, as was it with her. With time came indifference: and what had been passion became coldness and neglect; and the Duke sought to rid himself of a tie that had grown irksome. But, relying on the secret bond, the artful mistress' life; she even spoke of printing the awfully-worded document, and given sting it throughout Europe. She told him, too, that copies of it were already in safe hands in several different cities; that she had only to send a certain token, and the exposure would be made immediately. In the posture of his state and family affairs at the time, the exposure would have been fatal.

"Duke Nepomuck—for that was his name—was not a man to be safely threatened. His passions were fierce, and in hate or vengeance, his hand was as swift as unerring aim: he was above human laws, and those of God he held in mockery. He made secret plans for getting his mistress' life by poison; she was on her guard, and they failed. But she knew not what instruments of crime are at the beck of power. He bought one of the tragedians to his purpose with a large sum of money, and arranged his plan with the cunning and atrocity of a demon. He ordered Othello to be performed; his creature acted the Moor, and played his part with a too fearful truthfulness. The tragedy was real—the murder of the last scene no fiction—from that couch Desdemona arose no more!"

The Count shuddered, and exclaimed, "Can this be true?"

"Ask any of the old residents in the city, and you will hear the story exactly so narrated. The actor was arrested, and would have been tried, but the Duke forbad all inquiry, took the murderer into his service, and gave out that the catastrophe was quite accidental. But eight days after the fatal play the only son of the Prince died—a child twelve years of age."

"A mere coincidence," said the Major.

"Call it so, if you please," replied the Manager, again turning over the leaves; but listen: for two years "Othello" was not played. For it brought back recollection of what the Duke wished to be forgotten. But after that period he was reckless enough to order it again to be performed. Here is the entry:—

"The 28th Sept., 1749, 'Othello, the Moor of Venice.'"

"And here observe in the margin—

"On the 5th of October, died the Prin—s Augusta, exactly eight days after the performance of 'Othello,' in the two-year-since died the late Prince Frederick."

"Is this accident, gentlemen?"

"Merely accident?" said the Count and the Major.

"Another proof, then," said the Manager. "On the 5th February, 1748, 'Othello' was again given: suppose the same consequence followed? And it was even so—for here is the note of the prompter in the margin, and in the same hand:—'Terrible! the spirit of the departed yet avenges her: Prince Alexander died suddenly on the 14th—eight days after 'Othello.'"

THE THEATRES.

LYCEUM.

Two new pieces—at least new to the English stage—were brought out at this theatre on Monday evening, and both were successful. The first was a three act drama, entitled "By Royal Command," a translation of a French piece, "La Cardeuse des Dindons," by Messrs. A. Dartois and Bicville. In the first act we find Gothé (Mrs. Keeley) planning her livelihood in an Austrian village by fattening turkies, and attached to Herman (Mr. Emery), a young woodcutter, who is of a very jealous disposition. The Emperor of Austria, Leopold the Second (Mr Diddear), is about to visit the village where Gothé resides, upon a hunting excursion, and the Burgomaster, Von Splatterkirk (Mr. Meadows), determines that his daughter shall present him with a bouquet, according to custom. But a rival Lord Chamberlain, Count Newberg (Mr. F. Vining), passes himself off for the Emperor, and sends an intimation of his wish, from a contiguous hunting lodge, that Gothé shall present the bouquet. This she is delighted to do, as she thinks that she shall be able to solicit the appointment of ranger for Herman. On her return she is accused by the Burgomaster of an improper intimacy with the Emperor. Herman, maddened by jealousy, tears up the appointment which she has got for him, and, overwhelmed with the reproaches of all his fellow-villagers, she flies from the village, driving all her turkeys before her—a situation which concludes the act, and which was very droll, being managed with great cleverness. In the second act, we are introduced to an apartment in the palace, and here Herman is discovered in conversation with Leopold and the Burgess Mayer (Mrs Fairbrother), who informs the former for his supposed liaison with Gothé. Of course, the whole affair is an enigma to Leopold, who is not aware that Count Newberg has been assuming his name. This gives rise to a little jealousy on the part of the Emperor, which is dispelled by the arrival of Gothé, who gets into the palace in a turret-key left in the hunting-lodge. To unravel the mystery, Leopold places her behind a screen, which he pokes a hole with his cane. He then determines to call together his hunting party; and, giving her a bell, tells her to peep through the screen, and ring it when she sees the impostor. Various gentlemen of his suite enter in succession, and, lastly, Newberg, upon whose appearance Gothé rings the bell with most amusing vivacity. Upon this a detection, the Emperor orders Newberg to marry Gothé forthwith; and as he is on the old Baroness Lauer (Mrs Woolgar), to whom he owes a debt, he is glad to get off the bargain upon such terms. With the preparations for the nuptials the second act finishes. The action of the third act passes in the interior of the Royal Hunting Lodge, where we find Gothé, in powder and white satin, awaiting the bridal. Herman, for some cause or another, has resolved upon entering into a conspiracy to murder the Emperor, and gains admittance into the lodge for that purpose, when Gothé, not aware who he is, and still retaining all her old affection for him, makes the confession that she loves him, and ever shall. This leads to a happy denouement, and Herman receives the ranger's appointment from the real Emperor, whilst Count Newberg is, after all, compelled to marry the old Baroness.

The piece was admirably acted, and, apart from the burlesque, we have not for a long time seen Mrs Keeley in a part so capitally adapted to her peculiar talents as this of the turkey-girl. Her embarrassed assumption of her fine clothes and high-heeled shoes, was delicious; and the bit of pathos in the last scene, where she recalls her old love for Herman, was so touching and natural, that it made us regret that we had not more frequent opportunities of seeing her in this line. The other characters were exactly played, calling for no particular remark, except that the Herman of Mr. Emery was acted with much intelligent sturdiness and good effect. The piece has been carefully got up, and the plot is very well worked out; but it is much to be regretted that the piece of language is not a little smarter. Nothing can be more common-place than the dialogue, and several points, where capital hits might have been made, were entirely lost sight of. A very little extra care would have remedied this.

The second novelty was also a translation of the vaudeville "Parlez moi Pottery," by Messrs. Dennery and Lafontaine, under the title of "Enquire Within." Antonnius Dodge (Mr. Meadows) is an Englishman, who has got a situation as porter in a Parisian lodging-house, the court of which, by the way, is very well represented. He writes circulars to every body whose name he finds in the Directory, going through them alphabetically, and telling them that somebody dear to them is trifling with their affections. In consequence of this, all sorts of quarrepos arise; the first one being the arrest of Captain Bravo Brut (Mr. Emery), a blustering husband, and Mr. Bowing (Mr. Turner), a lachrymose one, at finding their wives (Miss Arden and Miss Grove) in the house, on what is apparently a clandestine visit to a refugee, Count Armand, (Mr. Kinloch). It is, however, discovered subsequently, that the foreign nobleman, being in reduced circumstances, has merely been teaching them the Polka, which is beginning to make a stir in Paris. But Dodge has made a good harvest by his scheme, as well as reconciled various parties to his marriage with Fanny (Mrs Wigan). Mr. Meadows was sufficiently quaint as the porter, and Mr. Turner made a great deal out of nothing in the part of Bowing, while Mr. Emery blustered about in the most approved fashion as Captain Brad. The piece is pleasantly written; more smartly, indeed, than the one preceding it, but lacking the construction. It was played with general applause, and we can fully understand that it must have been a great favourite in Paris, where the idiosyncracies of the different characters would more directly excite the sympathies of the audience. The house was very well attended.

A new comedetta is announced to be in rehearsal; as well as a new comic drama, called, "The King's Wedding; or, Up to Supper." This, we expect, will prove to be nearly the same as the piece underlined at the Adelphi, "The Boy King:" both of them being translations of a vaudeville which has been playing at Paris, with much success, called, "Un Souper sous Louis XV."

ADELPHI.

"Mr. Caudle at Home and Abroad," who was to have made her curtsey to the audience of this theatre on Monday evening, was prevented by Mr. Wright's indisposition, came before the public on Monday. We are sorry that we cannot award to the piece the same praise which Mr. Selby's pleasant productions have usually drawn from us. Not that there was any lack of the usual ingredients which experience proves are best calculated to excite the approbation of the house, indeed, the scenes in which the author had drawn upon his own inventive fancies, instead of upon Mrs. Caudle's lucubrations, were received with the most general laughter. But the same fault, which we have pointed out in all the other adaptations of the "Caudle Papers," was here also apparent. The real spirit of the original was entirely lost sight of; and, consequently, the sympathies of the audience were never enlisted in the action of the piece. "Caudle Lectures" acquire their popularity from many causes, than which nothing can be more totally undramatic. They are filled with quiet hits at domestic life, founded on keen observation, but perfectly unfitted to excite laughter on the stage. Then the privacy of the scene of their delivery; the play afforded to the theatre, hence the non-existence of all the varieties and here we write advisedly. The diverting italicised echos of Mr. Caudle's replies; the hopeless looks of compulsion in which he listens to them—all these things are entirely lost in the dramatic representation of a single chapter of the "Caudle Papers." Over, and in which a number of people in white wigs wander about a lighted room—room, and go in and out doors, and talk of camp rucks and letters de cachet, to the complete bewilderment of the audience. Louis XV. (Madame Celeste), aged fifteen, leads a revolt against his tutor, aided by a number of young noblemen, personated by Misses Woolgar, Ellen Chaplin, Taylor, &c.; and, by filling up the number of guests, with the names of some Co rt interpreters, send them to the Bastille, and eat a supper prepared for them. The prisoners final y escape, and all are made friends. The main object of the drama was to introduce a number of little children as soldiers, who marched about to the music of a band of juveniles in a very creditable manner. The place has been spendidly mounted: indeed no expense appears to have been spared in its production: it is therefore the greater pity that it is not to bring a corresponding return to the treasury. The applause at the fall of the curtain was pretty general, mingled, however, with some disapprobation.

SADLER'S WELLS.

Another success—honourable and unqualified—has been achieved by the Misses Melesville and Cheverly, who produced on Thursday evening, under the title of "The Boy King; or, Petite Peccadilloes." We are sorry that we cannot record its complete success. It is one of those pieces, founded on an anecdote that dies with its single chapter of the "Caudle Papers" at the period of ever, and in which a number of people in white wigs wander about a lighted room—room, and go in and out doors, and talk of camp rucks and letters de cachet, to the complete bewilderment of the audience. Louis XV. (Madame Celeste), aged fifteen, leads a revolt against his tutor, aided by a number of young noblemen, personated by Misses Woolgar, Ellen Chaplin, Taylor, &c.; and, by filling up the number of guests, with the names of some Court interpreters, send them to the Bastille, and eat a supper prepared for them. The prisoners finally

A RAMBLE IN THE REALMS OF CHAT.

The light and dark shades of life are presented to us in the aspects of foreign politi.s—the very lamentable and the very ludicrous! The dightful promise and progress of our Queen's visit to Germany is contrasted in the northern states by a semi-revolution at Leipsic, and the shedding by the sick bull and the torturing of geese; in Madrid there are martial law, famine, closed shops, and public executions. In France there is every appearance of peaceful demonstration towards England;—there is more than friendliness, there is almost affection from Louis Philippe to Victoria; while in England, Lord Palmerston and the partakers of his pseudo panic are talking of a French invasion, and talking so loudly that the Times has thought two leading articles not thrown away in undeceiving the national apprehension! If some of these points are not lamentable, if the last is not infinitely ludicrous, then have our senses most grossly belied our judgment.

At all events, we shall have a Chat upon these subjects—all and sundry—with our readers; and as the French Invasion presents the liveliest aspect of pleasantry, we will commence with that, and strike our terrors into the form of a

SONG

What! will you invade us, then, beautiful France?
And will you come over to teach us to dance?
Has Louis declared so? ... has gentle Guizot?—
Or is it the furor of Butcher Bugeaud?

Will he come on a steam bridge of fearful dimension?
Or will he throw over a bridge of suspension?
Oh! do let us know if he means to throw over
A bridge of suspension from Calais to Dover!

Will his troops land at Deal—all alive, not a man ill;
Or will his steam navy sweep all down the Channel?
Will their hopes never waver, their hearts never bend,
Till they land, unresisted, at gallant Gravesend?

The Marshal's a bright one as ever was sunn'd on;
Pray, mayn't we consider him almost in London?
Won't he coop us alive in our dungeons and towers,
And give us a roasting for forty-eight hours?

Do say, when he once lands his troops from the-main,
Will he come by the road—will he travel by train;
And did he send forward an order from Calais,
To get him clean quarters in Buckingham Palace?

Our army are traitors—our navy is done—
And they both have agreed to be beaten like fun;
Not a man of-war's seen on the waves now to dance,
But has made up its mind to be taken to France.

We've got no militia—and pray ye or urge ye
Ye wont get a bit of fight out of the clergy;
While the whole of the lawyers have pack'd up their rags,
And are hiding their heads in their very blue bags!

Then as for the people—Bugeaud you may come!
They are pottroon, pacific, low spirited, dumb;
So my blood thirsty Marshal you'll have no occasion
To take too much pains with your British invasion!

We suppose we can afford our joke over this formidable expedition of menace as being a bugbear of our own creation—a Palmerstonian mare's nest; and we suppose France can as well afford to laugh at the banter, as England to bestow it. Thanks to good manners, good feeling, and the march of civilization, the two countries are never likely to be engaged in a war of invasion, whatever other quarrels may spring up between them.

It will be seen that the Queen of Spain keeps up her bull-fighting; and, indeed, is generally fond of, riveted upon, and delighted at, all kinds of exhibitions of torture. She has five geese slung up at a boat-race, that the boatmen may leap up as they pass under the line, and he who wrings off the goose's neck bears away the prize. A number of competitors try the experiment, and fail, her Angelic Majesty sitting in maidenly contemplation of the torture of the writhing bird. At last a strong man consummates the slaughter, and the Queen pays him for the work of blood! As for the bull-fight, she prefers the theatre of that pastime to the Church of her God, and was a reluctant absentee from one of these exhibitions to partake of an imposing ceremony in one of the temples of her creed. In the morning she had gazed applaudingly on the wanton butchery of eleven beautiful horses—seen the lives of as many of her subjects put in peril—cheered on the dogs of blood against the bulls—and smiled at the enthusiasm of the multitude when those bellowing victims reared and roared under the agony of the fiery darts that were driven into their reeking flesh. And all this time the entrails of the horses were hanging upon the ground! And at this august spectacle her Mother and her Minister assisted, so that young and depraved Royalty was ably seconded in its Christian delight! And in the capital of her kingdom was placed in a state of siege—the shops shut—the people in insurrection -the merchants idle—provisions short—the soldiers in the silent streets in occupation—and executions ordered without compassion, and —arrests progressing -and executions ordered without compassion, and effected without remorse. And yet all these horrors do not reach the measure of disgust inspired by the blood-love of that girlish Queen.

Very different causes moved the disturbances in Leipsic. We should as soon have thought of an Alderman revolting against turtle or turbot, as of Leipsic against the governing power. The great book shop of Germany—the Paternoster row of the people—the mart of cheap learning and quickening intelligence—the native-home of the arts of peace—to dismiss its muses, cancel its printed reams, throw away its parchment and calf-skin, gag its presses, bind up its crayons, make faggots of its pencils, dissolve its Artpresses, bind up its crayons, make faggots of its pencils, dissolve its Artunions, and bash its counters with a breast -and all this to rush to the sword, and the armour, and the war, certainly produces a surprise in our minds somewhat akin to that which the weaver felt when his work couldn't be carried on because his head had been carried off! Yet it was fact, and that strange revulsion of the order of affairs was all brought about for conscience' sake, and proves how powerfully religious feeling exercises their authority over the German mind.

No disturbance, however, has occurred to interrupt the happiness and tranquility of our beloved Queen's visit to the family home of her princely and popular consort. All has gone smoothly and well, if, indeed, we except the laughable difficulty of slow travelling experienced on one or two stages of the journey. We may have our joke at the expense of travellers from Mayence to Wurzburg:—

Ye who travel in Bavaria,
May find time to sing an aria;
Nor your feelings let it hurt, oh!
If you hear a whole concerto
'Twixt the time you fix to start
And that when you do depart.

Then it won't be in your power
To go quite five miles an hour;
The calèche you have to sit in
Would excite a groan in Britain;
Broken down, with wheels depending
More on straw and rope for mending
Than upon the hazy wood —
Then, it's oversplash'd with mud!

When you're shoved and tied inside it,
Soon you find you can't abide it;
And you have to look sharp, mind you,
At the luggage lash'd behind you,
Like a boat lash'd in the rigging—
People there are up to prigging.

Well, at last you're off, and sleeping
On the road; the horses creeping —
Did you hear? the carriage jumbles—
Flop! what's that? the luggage tumbles—
Ropes give way—don't, for your fame now,
Let your temper do the same now!

This, believe me, least of shocks is
See!—they're picking up the boxes.
Be so kind as lend a man' to Lift inside here that portmanteau.
But it's muddy! Yes, I know it!
Now, all right! Postilion, go it!

And in this style, and after this fashion, did all who followed her Majesty have to "Drag their slow length along."

But her Majesty made them put on the steam, and astonished them into ten miles an hour, in spite of themselves.

There—we have had such a long ramble over foreign matters, that we shall not trouble ourselves about "our domestic affairs."

DISCOVERY OF A PICTURE.—A painting, of extraordinary merit, if not of the high character attributed to it, has lately been discovered in Lincolnshire. It appears that the worthy heir to the Revesby estates having resolved to build a new mansion on the property, the materials of the old house were sold by auction, when Mr. Tewson, of Boston, purchased, among other lots, a large old cupboard, from the Housekeeper's Room, the back of this cupboard, Mr. Tewson found to be a picture on oak panel, with the painting inside, although it was nailed to the shelves. These he carefully removed, and found there to be twenty-two figures in the composition -the Adoration of the Shepherds, and very like the work of Raphael. The picture has been removed to London, and when restored, it will be exhibited: it is supposed to have formed the altar-piece of the abbey-church at Revesby, and to have been placed, for security, in the time of the Puritans, in the situation where it has just been found—church paintings being special objects of the fury of the Parliament, during the Civil Wars.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS, RECENTLY DECEASED.

SIR ALEXANDER FERRIER

This gentleman, who bore the rather sounding title of Lord Conservator of Scottish Privileges, was formerly her Majesty's Consul for South Holland and Zealand. He was made a Knight of the Hanoverian Order in 1834, and a Knight Bachelor in 1835. He died on the 17th instant at Rotterdam, in the 73d year of his age.

MAURICE ZEDEKAUER.

Some fifty years ago, Maurice Zedekauer, a member of the Hebrew persuasion, came to Prague a penniless adventurer. Unassisted by aught but his own industry, sagacity, and energy, the poor Jew contrived to connect himself with the merchants and mercantile pursuits of Prague; and, step by step, ascended Fortune's ladder, until he became the wealthiest and most eminent merchant in all Bohemia. He made a noble use of his gains: during his lifetime the larger part of his immense revenues were devoted to the encouragement of science, art, and national industry, and to the relief of the indigent, without distinction of religion or race. M. Zedekauer died recently at Prague, at the age of 77, and he has left behind him seven million of florins—£700,000; nearly half of this he has bequeathed amongst the benevolent institutions of Bohemia. The honour and affection which this Jewish merchant enjoyed from his fellow-citizens were unbounded. He was followed to the cemetery of his nation by men of all ranks and beliefs—by the poor of course, by the civil and military authorities of the capital, by all its distinguished men, and also by many clergymen of various Christian denominations. Sectarian spirit was disarmed, and charity alone prevailed over the grave of a man so excellent as Zedekaur.

THE REV. RICHARD WARD.

This estimable clergyman, who was incumbent of Cromford, in the County of Derby, for near half a century, was the author of a popular work descriptive of Derbyshire: he died at Brandon, in Suffolk, on the 1st inst., in the 83th year of his age. The reverend gentleman was grandfather of Mr. Francis Redfern, of Manchester.

MARIE SCHILLYNCK.

This extraordinary woman, who recently died at Ghent, performed, for seventeen years, military service during the wars of the French Empire. Marie Schillynck was born at Ghent; she was present at twelve battles, received six sabre wounds at Gemappe, and was taken prisoner in Italy. At the passage of the Bridge of Arcola, she received a musket ball in the thigh. Her sex, although known, did not prevent Napoleon's conferring on her the rank of lieutenant. At the battle of Jena, she obtained the decoration of the Legion of Honour, and a pension of 700 francs. The Emperor, in bestowing the Cross upon her, said, "Receive from my hands the reward of the brave, which you so well deserve." Then, turning to the officers, he bid them honour this courageous woman, for she was one of the glories of the army. The Philanthropic Society of the Officers of the Empire, established at Ghent, have, to perpetuate the memory of Marie Schillynck, entered her name as an honorary member of their society.

M. SELLEGUE.

M. Sellegue, as a man of science, displayed great knowledge and skill, and was rapidly rising to the highest reputation, both in France and abroad. He was the author of a great variety of scientific applications to the purposes of trade and manufacture. He died recently at Paris, aged 59, and his loss is universally regretted.

POLICE.

FORGERIES ON THE SOUTH MIDLAND, NORTHAMPTON, AND LEICESTERSHIRE RAILWAY COMPANY.—On Saturday, Edmund Thomas Yeakell was again examined at CLERKENWELL, charged with having forged the name of Col. Howard Stanley, of Home park, Windsor, to the subscription contract deed of the South Midland, Northampton, and Leicester Railway Company, for the amount of £500 Some particulars of the case were given in our paper last week. In addition to the evidence already taken, Mr. Charles Stuart Bowles, solicitor, of Windsor, was called He knows Hon.e Park, Windsor, which is a portion of her Majesty's domain. In May last it was occupied only by her Majesty's servants. No such person as Col. Howard Stanley or Mr. Carkson (to the prisoner) resided there.—Prisoner: I am ready to admit that the name of Col. Howard Stanley is all imagination—quite a fiction, a creation of the brain.—Mr. C. Lander was charged with a forgery on the same company, under similar circumstances. Messrs Clarkson, Stevens, and Pearson, solicitors, proved the forgeries; and Mr. Humphries, the solicitor, for the prisoner. Mr. Henry Stanley, secretary to the South Midland and Northampton and Leicestershire Railway Company, gave evidence as to the meeting [illegible] at which the name of Ferdinand De Lisle, Esq., the merchant and banker, in May last, with the address "Russell House, Balham-hill," for shares, which were allotted. Mrs. Shaw, who, with her husband, had the care of Russell House, gave evidence to show that her husband was formerly acquainted with the prisoner, and that he requested her to allow him to direct his letters there, which was granted, until a subscription across that there was something wrong going forward. He gave his direction "Mr. C. Lander, 11, Webber-street, Blackfriars road." -Mr. Greenwood remanded the prisoner for a fortnight, but, as in the other case, he would accept responsible bail to the amount of £500 himself, and two housekeepers in £250 each.

A STRANGE LETTER WRITER.—At LAMBETH office, on Tuesday, Crispin George Pentlade, a singular-looking young man, was charged with annoying his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, and his grace's domestics, at Lambeth Palace. by forwarding by post, and also calling with, various letters and parcels for his grace, and endeavouring to effect an entrance into Lambeth Palace. The prisoner, who is small in stature, wore a thick pilot coat, which was buttoned close to the chin. His features are small and sharp, with dark piercing eyes, and altogether he presented a singular appearance.—George Lipscombe, porter to his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, deposed that about ten o'clock that forenoon the prisoner presented himself at the principal entrance to Lambeth Palace, and demanded an interview with his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury. Having been in the habit of frequently calling at the Palace with letters and parcels for his grace, and also having refused to give any account or explanation of his object in addressing his grace, witness stopped him, and, in order to put an end to his further annoyance, and fearing, also, that some one might get in at the wicket gate, he availed himself of an opportunity of getting access to the Palace, he (witness, gave him into the custody of a policeman.—The policeman who had charge of the prisoner here produced a large square parcel, covered with great care, sealed up, and directed to "His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, Lambeth Palace," which Mr. Henry directed should be opened. This was done, and, upon the paper being removed, a most beautiful lady's work box, of very considerable size, was exhibited. In fact, it was a splendid specimen of art, taste, and genius, and must have occupied the unfortunate prisoner several months in its completion. It is oval, and sides of small portions of the variegated wood, were of the most tasteful and beautiful description.—Henry Hutchin, an assistant to Mr. Mathews, a pawnbroker, in Princes street, Princes road, Lambeth, said that he had known the prisoner for two years and upwards, and, though somewhat eccentric, he believed him to be perfectly harmless person. He had pledged a table at his (witness's) master's shop, for six guineas, which was inlaid with woods in the most beautiful manner. And he believed it to be his invariable practice to pledge all the work he did, as it was not his wish that it should get into the market, and become common.—Mr. Gunn, the clerk, then read the following letters, which was written in a careless and indifferent hand, and addressed to his Grace the Lord Bishop of Canterbury:—

"My Lord,—You will question me what object I have in view. I shall be able to tell more better what I am fit for when my mind is more settled. Should I ever [illegible] you will be able to make something of me—I think I shall be fit for a member of parliament, or else a magistrate.

"My Lord, I want to be away from here, can you lodge me anywhere. I wish some one would come up to my house. The next time I come to the Lord's meal to come for good. There will be time for me to remove to-day, after you have received this note.

I am, My Lord, your obedient servant,
"C. G. PENTLADE."

"August 19, 1845.

"My Lord, -My object in sending to you is to gain a seat. Will the favour be too great for me to wish to be numbered with your rank of society. If you can decide -mind early I shall be glad.

"I am, My Lord, your obedient servant,
"C. G. PENTLADE."

Mr. Henry remarked he should call upon the prisoner to find good bail; but his impression was that he was insane, and he should, therefore, send him with an officer and the letters produced, before the medical gentleman belonging to the parish of Lambeth to ascertain the real state of his mind. On Tuesday evening, Pentlade was taken before Mr. Duke, the surgeon of Lambeth parish, and that gentleman, after a short examination, and putting some questions to the unfortunate man, pronounced him insane. He was, in consequence, taken into the workhouse, preparatory to his being placed in some asylum.

BRING BACK MY FLOWERS.

"Then glee she forgot that her treasures were growing less, and, with the swift motion of childhood, she flung them upon the sparkling tide, until every bud and blossom had disappeared; then seeing her task, she sprang on her feet and, bursting into tears, called aloud to the [illegible] "Bring back my flowers!" —Lucette Orlee.

Her fairy boat moving serenely along,
A child sat, weaving flowers;
The sweet spring time was on her brow
When sunshine gilds the hours.

The band of flowers was soon complete,
That pleasure past, soon
Upon the streamlet at her feet
She threw them, one by one.

The music of the water stole
O'er her, like sunlight's beam,
And as it passed upon her soul
The flowers fell in the stream.

She laughed, with merry child like glee,
To see them onward glide,
As if to dark oblivion's sea,
Fast down the sparkling tide.

But soon upon the stream the last
She flung, in rosy show'rs

The gayest, as from her sight they pass'd
Exclaim'd—"Bring back my flowers!"

She listen'd—but the stream roll'd by,
As fled the passing hours,
And, echo answered to her cry—
"Bring back—bring back my flowers!"

'Tis thus with us; we, children, stand
Beside Life's stream, and careless shower
The gems that smile in pleasure's hand
Upon the streamlet, flower by flower.

And when the last loved pleasures fly
From our weak sight in rosy showers,
With grief beside the bank we sigh,
And cry—"Bring back my flowers:"

Will the stream stay?—The flowers are gone!
Will [illegible] return the rosy hours?
No!—Echo answers, and a sad tone
"Bring back—bring back my flowers!"

THE GREAT PATRON OF LITERATURE.

Fierce is the strife as to who is the greatest patron of literature in the present day. Various names are mentioned. None of th m, in our opinion, are entitled to the glory. The real man is Sir James Graham. We unhesitatingly affirm that no individual has of late so pre-eminently distinguished himself for his love of Letters that he should be ever resign his office of Secretary for the Home Department, the place we suggest for him is that of Keeper of the Seals.—Go a Head Journal.

CULTIVATION OF TEA IN CEYLON.

The last India papers state that the cultivation of the tea-plant had been commenced, and great expectations were entertained of the result of the experiment. According to other opinions, although the tea plant will grow within the tropics, and maintain a flourishing appearance, the leaf is said to be totally destitute of flavour, and therefore useless.

LOUIS PHILIPPE AND HIS FAMILY.

The King of the French is at present the grandfather of eleven children—namely, the Duke of Orleans, 2; the Queen of the Belgians, 3; the Duke de Nemours, 2; the Princess Marie (dead), 1; the Prince de Joinville, 1; the Duchess of Saxe-Coburg, 2

ELECTRICAL RAILWAY TRAIN INDICATOR.

At a recent meeting of the Academy of Sciences in Paris, M. Dujardin, the inventor of an electrical telegraph, submitted a plan for rendering this invention valuable as a means of indicating the precise position of a railway train upon different parts of the line. He proposes that as a locomotive, passes by certain places, it shall touch a spring in connexion with the wire and thus communicate with the index of the station by certain signs previously agreed upon.

A LIGHT IN THE EAST.

A newspaper is about to be established in the city of Jerusalem. In commenting upon this fact, one of the papers says, Solomon, with all his wisdom, never dreamt of such a thing.

ARTIFICIAL PRODUCTION OF OYSTERS.

A letter from M. Carbonel was read at a recent meeting of the Paris Academy of Sciences, in which he asserts that he has discovered the means of producing oyster-beds in fresh water ponds and basins, so that every man who has a few feet of ground to spare for the construction of a basin may always obtain fresh oysters!—[This extraordinary discovery must astonish the natives].

LILLYUTIAN DEER.

A specimen deer has recently been brought home from Java, the proportions of which are more likely to excite the interest of the naturalist than the gusto of the epicure. It is only 9 ght inches high, and weighs but 3lb. 1oz., and is pronounced a mouse deer. It is perfectly domesticated, following its owner like a spaniel, and is said to be the only one of the species in England.

CURIOUS PHENOMENON.

A Correspondent says:—"A few days since two swans, the property of a gentleman residing at Petersfield, Hants, kept on a large piece of water in that district, were observed to rise steadily from the banks to the height of about 70 feet; then darting out across the country, made a circuit of about five miles, and then returned once more to their aquatic home with a rapidity of flight that would not have done injustice to a swallow."

CHEAP POSTAGE IN AMERICA

The United States Government has adopted a reduced and uniform system of postage. The rates are, for any letter under half an ounce in weight, going less than 300 miles, five cents (9½d.); above half an ounce, ten cents, above 300 miles the cost is doubled. The weight allowed to be carried is as much as three pounds. In New York, they have adopted a postage label to represent the five cents; it bears a portrait of Washington, and is somewhat larger, but not so ingeniously engraved as those used in this country.

A GENTLEMAN.

A day or two ago, in the Insolvent Debtors' Court, one of the bail, residing in Kensington-gravel-pits, was described in his affidavit as a "gentleman." Mr. Commissioner Law declared that the Court did not know such a description. If it was meant that the party was in no business or profession, it had better be mentioned. He would not take an affidavit from an attorney or a military officer with such a description.

A TOWN LIGHTED BY NATURAL GAS.

Fredonia, a town in America, of 1,200 inhabitants, with neat white houses and churches, is lighted up with natural gas, which bubbles up out of the ground, and is received into a gasometer. This gas consists of carburetted hydrogen, and issues from a black bituminous shale in the beds of the Hamilton group of the New York geologists, or part of the Devonian formation of Europe.

MARVELLOUS EFFECTS OF GUANO AND ELECTRICITY.

A Yankee lad whose father was a farmer, went into a barn to play a short time ago, and being detained a prisoner by the thunder storm, hefell asleep on a bag of guano. The old gentleman, when the storm was over, went into the farm-yarn to look after his son, and met a gaunt, eight feet high, coming out of the barn. "Hallo! who are you?" he demanded; "what are you doing here?" "Why father," squeaked the Goliah, "its me; don't you know Tommy?" "You!" the astonished parent exclaimed: "why, Tom, how on earth did you get so long so as to reach almost a time;" "Why, father,' replied the boy, looking down upo i the gaping old man, "I slept upon them bags of guano as you put in the barn, and that and the lightning together has done the business."

RAILWAY WITHOUT STEAM OR FIRE.

The proposed railway from Callao to Lima, in Peru, will neither require the agency of steam nor the aid of fire. The ground has a gradual and unbroken rise the whole way. Above Lima there is the river Rimac, which passes through a part of the city in its way to the sea near Callao. This river, though not navigable, affords at all seasons of the year a hundred times the water power necessary to work any traffic that can possibly come upon the rail. The saving of the usual expense of fuel is thus effected; and the cost of the steam-engines, and, what is no small item in railway expenditure, the charges for their after management, are entirely avoided.

THE PHŒNIX AND THE DOVE.

My wings are bright with the rainbow's dyes,
My birth is amid perfume;
My death song is music's sweetest sighs;
The sun himself lights my tomb.
My flight is traced in the clouds above,
The grave teems with life for me;
I stand alone.—Alone? cried the dove,
Oh! I then can but pity thee.

EYE GRAFTING.

A Dr. Pionvies, of Lille, has recently tried some experiments in what the French call Kiraoplastie, which consists in replacing a diseased cornea by a portion of the cornea taken from another individual, and which, in fact, is a kind of animal grafting. Dr. Plouvies, states that he recently performed the operation on a female, 33 years of age, and who became blind at the age of three years. He removed the cornea, and substituted by suture that of a young dog. The grafting process was entirely successful, but it does not appear that much benefit was derived from it. The girl does not see well enough to move about without a guide, and the only difference between her present state and that before the operation is, that she can now just distinguish night from day.

A TRUE AND A FALSE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

A vigilant and jealous eye over executory and judicial magistracy; an anxious care of public money, an openness, approaching towards publicity, to public complaint: these seem to be the true characteristics of a House of Commons. But an addressing House of Commons, and a petitioning nation; a House of Commons full of confidence, when the nation is plunged in despair; in the utmost harmony with Ministers, whom the people regard with the utmost abhorrence; who vote thanks, when the public opinion calls upon them for impeachments; who are eager to grant, when the general voice demands account; who, in all disputes between the people and the Administration, presume against the people; who punish their disorders, but refuse even to inquire into the provocations to them. this is an unnatural, a monstrous state of things in this Constitution. Such an assembly may be a great, wise, awful Senate; but it is not, to any popular purpose, a House of Commons.—The Wisdom and Genius of Edmund Burke.

ROSENAU.—FROM HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS PRINCE ALBERT'S DRAWING

Palace is a neat private chapel, in which the English spectator is surprised to see the crucifix on the altar, as in Catholic churches. But this is a very general custom in the Lutheran churches of Germany.

[In our Journal of August 16, we engraved the exterior of Schloss Kallenberg: we now present to our readers the interior of the palace-chapel, with its antique carved pulpit, pierced gallery front, &c.; both scenes being from his Royal Highness Prince Albert's drawings.]

The place on which the festival was held yesterday presented, throughout the evening, and till a late hour at night, the appearance of a fair. The whole meadow glittered with lights, and there were long lines of booths and drinking tables, all filled with merry people. An odd and grotesque addition to this scene of nocturnal revelry presented itself in the shape of al fresco cooking places, where, on fires made of heaped fir branches, enormous gridirons were continually covered with still more enormous sausages, which were handed round among circles of greedy purchasers, on whose faces the lurid light of the fires produced an effect quite Rembrandt-like. Then there was also a travelling theatre à la Bachelet, where tumblers and posture-makers performed their feats to a gaping audience; and gigantic merry-go-rounds, with hobby-horses and carriages, mounted or filled with people of both sexes, produced the most absurd combinations of effect possible, as they whirled madly round, to the music of polkas and other airs, played by a capital band. And although the people were as merry as they could be, what made this German fair so pleasing was, that there was no drunkenness or indecorum. The people here seem always to remember what is due to themselves; they do not, in the midst of their enjoyment, lose by excess the faculty of enjoying

Several of the Paris papers publish letters respecting the Royal Visit, some of which contain some pleasant gossip.

The Constitutionnel says that Queen Victoria must have been stunned with the deafening salvos of cannon which were fired in honour of her arrival on the banks of the Rhine; it appears that at Antwerp her Majesty entreated that the guns might be allowed to "hold their peace" during her passage, but in vain. When the Royal party arrived at Coblentz the crowd were too much engaged in listening to the roar of the cannon and musketry combined to utter cries of rejoicing. "The Queen of England," says the writer, "ought to be well satisfied with the quantity of powder exploded in honour of her Majesty since she set foot on the banks of the Rhine. It is certain that the English artillery has never been so prodigally fired for any of the foreign Sovereigns who have lately landed on the shores of England; and the reception given to the French King at Portsmouth last year was not half so important, as far as noise was concerned, as that with which Frederick William II. has just honoured the presence of his ally, the Queen of Great Britain, at Coblentz."

Another Paris paper asserts that a ridiculous incident signalised the reception of her Britannic Majesty at Mayence. The Fairy steam-vessel was nearing the place of disembarkation, when it was discovered that the carpet which covered the platform by which the Royal party were to land—composed as it was of a patchwork of unequal fragments, and completely worn out by long service—was unworthy of being trodden by the august, though fairy feet of the illustrious Queen of Great Britain and Ireland. All hands were immediately set, and ordinance upon ordinance was issued, for the purpose of procuring a more suitable carpet. Three or four "brans" (new ones were speedily brought, but they were hastily constructed of planks, wretchedly joined together, and which, covered with fragments of tarpaulin, presented a truly miserable appearance. "The Municipality of Mayence assuredly did not draw their purse-strings very freely in honour of the august ally of the Duke of Hesse Darmstadt, although it is true that the visit of the Queen of England was not paid to them, but to the Prince of Prussia, the Governor of Mayence for the Germanic Confederation."

The Queen and Prince Albert were very closely pressed by the populace on their way to the Palace, and they were unable, in fact to enter its precincts until the Generals and their Aides-de-Camp had performed the duty of gens d'armes, and forcibly repressed the too ardent curiosity of these eager sight-seers. "What must Queen Victoria have said?" asks the French writer, "she who gave such evident signs of her displeasure last year at the vulgar curiosity of the inhabitants of Brighton, who would fain see whenever she went out?"

An enthusiastic writer in the Presse speaking of the fêtes at Bonn, exclaims, "Liszt is the Schiller of his art, as Thalberg is the Veit! What are! What spontaneity! What grace! What force! Liszt was never finer in his life!"

The same amusing gentleman writes: "A number of toasts were drunk (at Bonn) to the health of the king of Prussia, Beethoven, and Liszt. The latter at length rose, but his emotion was so great that he positively forgot to mention the French nation in the course of the generous tribute of thanks which he addressed to all those who, like ourselves, were assembled to fête the immortal Beethoven. M. Clavel, a French artiste, recalled to the memory of Liszt, in a speech full of dignity and moderation, this flagrant omission. Liszt wittily replied, saying that he owed his fame to France, and that the French would excuse him, when they were informed that, moved by the marks of esteem with which he had been honoured, he had even forgotten his own native country—the proud and noble Hungary! The health of the Queen of England had been drunk. These German gentlemen are usually ungallant towards the ladies. There were no less than two hundred at table, amongst whom Paris (not the city, but the son of Priam) would have been greatly embarrassed to make a choice. Yet you will hardly believe, my dear fellow, that not one of these orators had the gallantry to propose a toast in honour of our pretty table companions! I had a great mind to include the healths of all these females in that of our excellent and revered Queen, Marie Amelie, but I did not wish to give the pleasure of toasting our Queen to these Germans, who had actually forgotten, in their emphatic speeches, to pay a compliment to Auber, who sustains their lyrical drama, and to Meyebeck, who has done more for the glory of Beethoven than all Germany united. I therefore brangued familiarly with my own heart; and the cherished remembrance of my mother, mingled with that of the mother of all suffering French people, caused a sentimental tear to fall into my silent glass!"

CHAPEL AT KALENBERG.—FROM HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS PRINCE ALBERT'S DRAWING

OFFICIAL ACCOUNT OF THE ROYAL VISIT TO GERMANY.

(From Tuesday's Gazette).

The Right Hon. Sir James Graham has received a despatch from the Earl of Aberdeen, K.T., dated Rosenau, near Coburg, 20th August, 1845.

The Queen and his Royal Highness Prince Albert arrived at Rosenau, from Wurzburg, on the evening of the 19th; and her Majesty has not experienced any fatigue from the journey.

Her Majesty, after taking leave of the King of Prussia, at Stolzenfels, on the morning of Saturday, the 16th, ascended the Rhine, as far as Mayence, in the Fairy yacht. On Sunday her Majesty rested at Mayence, and attended Divine Service at the English chapel.

On Monday, the 18th, the Queen slept at Wurzburg, and was received, on her arrival at the Palace, by Prince Luitpold of Bavaria, in the absence of the King, who was detained at Munich. During the passage of the Queen through the Bavarian territory, her Majesty was treated with great honour and respect.

On the arrival of the Queen and his Royal Highness Prince Albert in the Duchy of Coburg, they were met by the Reigning Duke, and were greeted with universal demonstrations of joy and attachment.

GENERAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY.—The half yearly general meeting of this corporation, was held on Tuesday at their offices, 69, Lombard-street. Mr. Wilkin in the chair. The directors' report and a statement of the accounts for the half-year ending the 30th of June last, were read to the proprietors, of whom there was a numerous attendance. It appeared that the operations of the company continue successful—the workings for the first six months of the last year, though highly satisfactory, had been far surpassed by the workings of the corresponding period of the present year; and the general aspect of the company's affairs was calculated to give great satisfaction. After announcing the customary dividend, the cordial thanks of the proprietors were voted to the Chairman and Directors.

LONDON AND CROYDON ATMOSPHERIC LINE.—A series of experiments have just been made on this line of railway, as to the power of ascending inclines, and have proved successful. A train was brought to the foot of an incline of one in fifty, and stopped, so as to deprive it of any power it might have acquired from the impetus of its previous progression. It was then propelled by the atmosphere up the incline, and that which many of our most eminent engineers have declared an impossibility was accomplished with the greatest ease imaginable. Among other results that have been obtained, we may mention that the five miles' length of tube has been exhausted in its whole extent, the barometer being at the time 27½, and that the piston has traversed its whole length. The experiments, as far as they have gone, demonstrate, not only the practicability, but the superiority, of the atmospheric mode of propulsion. The train was frequently propelled at the rate of eighty miles an hour.

JUDGE LYNCH ON RAILWAYS.—A correspondent of the New York Evening Post, urging certain corn plants against the Washington and Bait more railroads, says:—"I am at a loss which to recommend to an insulted community, the tearing up of the rails, or hanging the president and directors at suitable and appropriate distances along the line." The hint seems to have been taken by the "insulted community," for a few days afterwards several of the rails were torn up, and the fact was discovered only just in time to prevent an accident which must have been attended with the most fatal consequences.

FULFILMENT OF PROPHECY.—It is very remarkable that Monsieur Arago the French astronomer, whose prediction that the Seine would be frozen over this year on the 6th of March, was so singularly realised, has been equally right in his anticipations as to the very day when the wet summer (which he also predicted would end. He foretold that the weather would change on the 20th of August—and so it did after a storm which has left behind it fearful traces in France. If the brilliant September which M. Arago now announces come true, there will be nothing to retard the development of British industry in the dearth or dearness of food, for never was the ground so laden with produce—the green crops, vegetables, and fruit, being even more abundant than the grain.

SUMMARY OF RAILWAY FACTS.—The Duke of Cleveland has issued the strictest orders to all his tenants and servants, on no account to allow any railway engineer to make a survey through any part of his property, by giving all who attempt to do so, notice to desist; and if this is disregarded, commencing immediately an action for trespass against them.——The amount of traffic last week on the 1800 miles of railway, was £166,251, of which £80,873 was received for the conveyance of passengers, and £22,060 for the carriage of goods; being an increase over the corresponding week of last year of £17,108.——The number of passengers carried over the German lines in June last, amounted to 1,163,000, being 87,000 more than in the previous month. The largest increase arose on the Baden line.——The railway king in France, the French Hudson, is an odd looking, but keen observing individual, of the name of M'Kenzie. He is a great favourite of Louis Philippe.——There is some activity in the Irish lines. A project for running a line round the entire bill of Howth has been entertained. It has been surveyed, and it is said the engineering difficulties are not formidable.——The Limerick and Waterford line begins to be worked between the town of Tipperary and Limerick; the line adjoining Waterford awaits the opinion of Sir John Rennie and the rest of the Board of Works.——The whole line of the British and Irish lines, from Dumfries to Portpatrick, has been laid off for examination by different engineers, who are busily employed making up their respective surveys.

EXECUTION IN FRANCE.—The appeal of Jaques Burrhus (condemned for murder) to the Court of Cassation having been rejected, the execution was fixed to take place at Colmar (Haut Rhin) on Monday week at six o'clock, and at a quarter past five, the culprit having been roused from his sleep, the fatal news was communicated to him, which he received with great apparent calmness, merely saying, "I am prepared. This is my birth day. I die at twenty four years of age." Before leaving the prison a glass of wine was offered him to support his strength, which he refused saying that he did not need it. On arriving at the Champ de Mars he cast a melancholy and hasty glance at that lovely promenade, never again to be trodden by him; the next object that met his gaze was the guillotine, to the platform of which he ascended, accompanied by the pious curé, M. Maimbourg. Burrhus then embraced M. Maimbourg, and prepared himself to receive the fatal stroke. In an instant after he had ceased to exist. The priest was so moved that he nearly fainted, and required the assistance of two men to descend the steps of the scaffold.

The Courrier de Marseilles of the 18th, states from Naples that the Government of the Two Sicilies has definitively abolished the tax on sulphur

SKETCHES ON HER MAJESTY'S ROUTE.

The sketch-books of our artists who have attended the Royal Tourists en route from Antwerp to Coburg, and the majority of the interesting events and incidents of the Visit, have already been transferred to our pages. The annexed sketches from "the highways and bye-ways" of Cologne, Bonn, &c., will convey an accurate notion of the characteristic costumes of those towns, and the peasantry of the surrounding district—many thousands of whom flocked into the cities, to witness the arrival of our beloved Queen. It has been sensibly observed that, "of course, these characteristics would have been the same under any other similar circumstances; but it is not every day that there is an event of sufficient interest to collect so many persons together, or to bring such elements of the picturesque into direct contrast."

It may be added, that in the Netherlands and Germany, the costume of the people is generally found to be modernized, and reduced to the condition common in London and Paris. It is principally among certain classes of the fishing population, and the peasantry, that any striking peculiarity exists.

The first engraved group have been sketched on board a steam-boat on the Rhine; and they present five average specimens of tourists: first, we have the shrewd-looking passenger with his high stock, and round-crowned hat; then the pursy voyageur, with the cap and cloak, the "consolations of travel;" next the bearded youth, with slouched hat and cravat à la Byron, cigar-in-mouth. But, where is the pipe?—why in the mouths of the two remaining characters, one of whom wears a cap of almost eastern cut, whilst the other has the real cap of travel, which, by the way, is of German origin, and has become the travelling-cap of Europe.

In the second line of figures, the first group shows three students of Bonn; the small cap, jauntily placed upon a pile of hair, the short quaintly cut morning coat, and natty trowsers.

The second group consists of women of the middle class; and in the third, the lady has on a morning bonnet, with a long "curtain," and a sort of polka pelisse; such as are worn in the country: the fashion is seen, in miniature, in the child's dress. The hat of the gentleman is of unmistakeable Continental magnitude. The two latter groups have been sketched from the streets of Cologne.

The next sketch is from the Place d'Armes at Cologne, and shows a group of Prussian officers, their Kasern (barrack), &c.

The general change from ancient to modern costume, to which we have briefly alluded, is thus referred to in a graphic account of her Majesty's arrival at Antwerp:

"Strange was the contrast between these picturesque old streets and the gay-looking modern population with which they were thronged as the cortége of the Queen drove slowly through them. If association led the mind to dwell on the image of the broad-built, leathern-jerkined, casqued soldiers of Alva, frowning grim terror among the crouching people, the jerk was sudden which brought it down to contemplate one of the "Braves Belges" with his staring uniform of blue, red and yellow, his heavy black flower-pot hat, or his merry chat and pleasant laugh with the bloused and moustachioed people around. In place of the grave burghers to whom such antique houses should belong, it was amusing to see lolling in the window the negociant, half-dandy, half-bourgeois, smoking his cigar and passing his comments on the pretty Belgians or blooming Flemings who here and there graced the houses around. Two classes alone among the motley groups who filled the streets retained their ancient costume, and were in keeping with the unchanged city. There was the tall, gaunt curé (not always tall and gaunt, but sometimes short and oily), stalking along the streets in his shovel-hat and long black soutan, the most inelegant of all the clerical costumes; or there, mingled in the throng, the neat, clean Flemish woman, paysanne or domestique, with her gay contrast of colours—scarlet, blue, and pink—and her pure white cap of lace, its broad border shadowing the rosy face, and falling over the shoulders like the mailed casquet of a knight. On these costumes the imagination could dwell, and call up scenes of strife which those old houses had witnessed when many a deadly struggle devastated this city of the commerce of the European world. Before the oppressed people could finally drive out out their oppressors. Comparing them with the records of dress which exist in the pictures of contemporary painters, it seems that they are what they were three centuries ago."

FASHIONS FOR SEPTEMBER.

It is no easy matter to describe the fashions as they exist at the present moment. They present a singular mixture of summer and winter apparel, and in some cases a revival of that worn early in the spring. The toilettes we had noticed, as appropriate to the summer season, no sooner came to light, than the cold winds and gloomy atmosphere caused their withdrawal. The fair leaders of fashion in dress and the marchandes de modes have been alike unprepared to meet such exigencies, and, consequently, toilettes in general have varied from the lightest to the darkest colours—the thickest to the most transparent materials, according to the taste of each fair wearer. Now, however, we hope for a better state of things; the summer costumes, which caused so much expense of taste and forethought to their possessors, will, perhaps, burst forth in all their brilliancy in this month, which, according to the weather-prophets, is to be fine and warm enough to compensate for all past disappointments.

Straw bonnets for country residence, for the sea side, and watering places, are universally worn, as best adapted to such purposes. They are frequently, as in the accompanying plate, trimmed with black velvet ribbon, crossed simply over the crown, with a bow behind, and often edged with three narrow rows of the same ribbon. The tour de tête inside is also composed of black velvet ribbon. This style of trimming is singular in its very simplicity, and much favoured by young ladies. Sarcenet ribbons are also worn as trimmings for these bonnets.

In spite of the bad weather, however, a more light and tasteful toilette has been sometimes imperatively necessary, as, for example, at weddings, which take place in all seasons. On these occasions crape bonnets, in blue, pink, or dust colour, trimmed with light gauze ribbon, and shaded feathers, are much worn; but it is only in Town that such articles of costume are allowable; they would not, by a real é é ganté, be considered simple enough for country wear.

Barège dresses in good designs, especially those in which the colour blue cobalt predominates, are very recherché, and are frequently made without flowers, as being more adapted to the country. For dinner dresses, gros de Naples glacé in two shades are much in vogue. The favourite mixtures are dahlia and white, sapphire blue and white, wood-violet and china green. These dresses are made high; the sleeves are tight down to the elbow, and enlarge gradually towards the waist, with an under sleeve of muslin trimmed at the wrist, with embroidered insertion and two rows of lace.

FASHIONS FOR SEPTEMBER.

Poil de chévre brochée, in different colours, is also a favourite material for dinner or evening dresses. For the latter, they are made with short sleeves, and have large flounce, headed by a quilling of ribbon of the same colours as the dress.

MORNING CAPS are often made in embroidered muslin, trimmed with lace, and plain sarcenet ribbon of either cerise, blue, Japan rose, Persian lilac, or straw colour. These caps are placed on the back of the head; are made flat over the forehead, and full at the ears.

There is but little novelty as regards mantlets or scarfs for the promenade, they are often made in white cashmere, with a coloured design. For travelling or for the seaside, cashmere scarfs in deep colours, trimmed with a broad band of black velvet, are also in vogue. They are made, as in the accompanying plate, with a hood, likewise bordered with velvet.

FASHIONS FOR SEPTEMBER.

We have given to our fair readers all the information that can at present be collected on this topic. We hope, however, ere long, to be enabled to afford them more detailed descriptions as the fashions for the autumnal season assume a more decided form.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

GALLANT CAPTURE OF A PIRATE SLAVER—NINE MEN KILLED AND FOURTEEN WOUNDED.

A gallant and successful engagement has taken place on the west coast of Africa between the boats of one of her Majesty's ships and a large pirate slaver. The boats engaged in the affair belonged to the Pantaloon, 10, sloop, Commander Edmund Wilson. The prize is a remarkably fine vessel, of about 450 tons, polacre rigged, with immense sails. She is of great celerity on the coast, is armed with four 12-pounders, and had a mixed crew, composed chiefly of Spaniards, amounting to about fifty; and was equipped for any villainous service, whether slave dealing or piracy.

The Pantaloon had been baffled in her chase of this vessel, supposed to be a slaver, for two or three days; and it appears the pirate, after leading the Pantaloon away to St. Thomas's, and outstaying her, doubled on the cruiser, and then ran to Lagos; but Captain Wilson was too old an officer on the coast to be so taken in, and on the 26th of May the sloop and the stranger caught sight of each other about two miles distant, off Lagos, becalmed. The pirate hoisted no colours, and the captain of the Pantaloon, desirous of renewing his attentions, sent the cutter and two whale-boats, under the command of the first lieutenant, Mr. Lewis de T. Prevost, with the master, Mr. J. T. Crout, and the boatswain, Mr. Pasco, with marines and seamen, amounting to about thirty altogether, to make a more intimate acquaintance with the stranger, taking especial care, however, to be fully prepared for a warm reception.

The pirate gave the boats an indication of what they were to expect, as they neared, by opening on them a heavy fire of round shot, grape, and canister, in such a spirited style, that, after returning the compliment by a volley of musketry, the boats prepared for hard work. Animated by the show of resistance, each boat now emulated the other in reaching the enemy, the pirate continuing a sharp fire as they steadily advanced, the marines as briskly using their muskets. In half an hour from the discharge of the first gun from the pirate, the boats of the Pantaloon were alongside, Lieutenant Prevost and Mr. Pasco on the starboard, and Mr. Crout, in the cutter, on the port side. The pirate crew, sheltering themselves as much as possible, nevertheless continued to fire the guns, loading them with all sorts of missiles—bullets, nails, lead, &c., and amidst a shower of these our brave sailors and marines dashed on board.

Lieutenant Prevost and his party in the two boats, notwithstanding their hot reception, were soon on the deck of the prize. The master boarded on the port bow, and, despite the formidable resistance and danger, followed by one of his boat's crew, actually attempted to enter the port as they were firing the gun from it. He succeeded in getting through, but his seconder was knocked overboard at the discharge; the gallant fellow, however, nothing daunted, was in an instant up the side again, having part with the master, who was engaged in a single encounter with one or two of the rascals. Having gained the deck, after a most determined resistance, they now encountered the pirates hand to hand, when the cutlass and bayonet did the remainder of the work.

Lieutenant Prevost finally succeeded in capturing the vessel, but the pirates fought desperately, and it was not until seven of their number lay dead on the deck, and seven or eight more were severely wounded, that they ran below or yielded.

A fine able seaman, named Henry Jackson, was killed, and a private Royal Marine was so severely wounded, that he died a very short time after. The master was severely wounded; Pasco, the boatswain, was slightly wounded; as were also four others—Carrick, the captain's coxswain; Soughton, a quartermaster; Harmer, an able seaman; and a marine, named Freemantle. An able seaman, named Jones, was severely wounded.

The affair has excited a great sensation on the coast.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

The Dutch papers contain numerous accounts of the devastation caused in various parts of Holland, by a hurricane or waterspout that came from the south. The houses have suffered enormous damage—the roofs are carried away, and the windows smashed to pieces. It is impossible to estimate the damage, for not only the stock in the barns, but also what corn was mown and still in the fields, was taken up and scattered far and near. A small vessel on the Rhine, on board which were a man and his wife and three children, was turned upside down; the mast of it was fixed in the bed of the river.

The Rev. Dr. Joseph Wolff has taken up his residence at Malines, and has accepted the chaplainy of the English Protestant Chapel there, where he will perform divine service every Sunday.

Count Viennot de Naublanc, one of the most distinguished members of the Legislative Assembly and a member of the Council of Five Hundred, and Minister of the Interior under Louis XVIII., died at Paris a few days ago, aged 69.

The Rhine Gazette states, on the authority of a letter from Coblentz, that whilst the King of Prussia was at the château of Stolzenfels a Council was held, at which several political questions of high importance, and also the question of the religious differences in Germany, were discussed. Prince Metternich, says the letter, presided at the Council, and the Earl of Aberdeen and Count Bresson were present.

A letter from Leipsic dated Aug. 15, says:—"Their Majesties the King and Queen of Saxony arrived here yesterday from Dresden. His Majesty mingled among the people, and was heartily welcomed by them. The King promised to have the strictest investigation made into the late events, and consoled the mother of the person killed with the prospect of being provided for. His Majesty then went to the hospital, and conversed with the wounded. It might be easily imagined what a soothing effect this generous conduct of his Majesty's upon the people."

We learn from Bonn, that Queen Victoria, before her departure from Cologne, subscribed 3800 thalers (about 14,000*fr.*, towards the completion of the dome in that city.

A terrible fire has just laid in ashes the ancient city of Luczk, in Volhynia. The fire commenced in the chimney of the Convent of St. Bridget, and has destroyed many precious monuments of the ecclesiastical history of past times, in which the convent has played an important part. It has, among other things, consumed the valuable library, containing a number of documents concerning church history, the Polish Diet, the incursions of the Tartars, and the conquests of Persia and Russia.

In virtue of a convention with the Persian Government, French ships will henceforth be received into the ports of Persia upon the footing of the most favoured nations, and the produce of the industry of France will be admitted on a duty of 5 per cent. The Persian Government always puts this charge upon imported articles, in order to restrict the introduction of such as may tend to effeminate or vitiate the people.

Recent accounts from Constantinople describe several provinces of that empire as in a very disturbed state. In the province of Van, and in the neighbourhood of Bagdat, numerous disturbances have taken place. A new poll tax imposed on the Chafais, or Kurds, is the principal cause of the outbreak in Van. Bahri Pacha has been sent with troops to reduce them to obedience.

Asia Minor is at the present moment suffering all the horrors of a famine. For the last two years the crops have failed, and water is so scarce that the quantity required for the consumption of a small family costs an enormous sum.

A letter from Insterburg dated Aug. 13, says:—"The distress in Poland must be extremely great. The poor people penetrate in crowds into our provinces, and fall on the fields of grass and potatoes; the peas are immediately devoured raw—the stalks of the potatoes are cut down, and boiled and eaten in the field. A detachment of troops has been sent to protect our frontier. It is said the fields in Poland, so far as the eye can reach, lie desert, and therefore the distress must increase in the approaching winter."

The last Cape of Good Hope papers contain a report of the trial and conviction of John Reas Thompson, storekeeper at Cape Town, for embezzling £10,929 10s. 8d., the property of the British Government. The prisoner was sentenced to be transported to Van Diemen's Land for 14 years. His father (the late Sir John Reas Thompson, Knight) was originally a clerk in humble circumstances, at Leith, and by dint of assiduity, perseverance, and zeal, became a commissioner of the late navy board. On the abolition of that appointment, the Lords of the Admiralty, to mark their sense of Sir John's distinguished services, bestowed on his son the joint appointment of naval storekeeper during the war, agent victualler at Simon's Bay, Cape of Good Hope, where he arrived in 1809, to enjoy a salary of £700 per annum, free house, &c.

Letters from Malta of the 15th inst. make mention of a rumour having been spread that a hostile meeting had taken place at Corfu between two officers of the Rifles, in which affair one had been so seriously wounded as to render it expedient for his antagonist and second to keep out of the way; but neither names nor dates are mentioned.

The Portafoglio Maltese of the 16th inst., brings news from Tripoli of the 9th. On the 7th, the American frigate Cumberland, bearing a Commodore's flag, arrived in that harbour; on the following day, two Ottoman ships of war merely touched there on their way to land two Turkish naval officers, and in the evening a zebeck reached from Tunis, with three French passengers, and despatches for the Consul of France. The most contradictory reports were in circulation. The Pasha, it was said, intended to attempt a coup de main on the island of Gerbi. A body of 3,000 well armed and equipped Arabs was encamped outside the walls of the city, and other troops were expected from Constantine.

Accounts from Berlin state that the Government is endeavouring to put down the religious excitement, by preventing public meetings. A meeting of the "friends of the light," which was to take place on the 20th, was stopped by the police, at the moment when the people were assembling. A declaration to that effect is to be published by the Government. The latest accounts from Leipsic merely state that the commissioners appointed to inquire into the origin of the disturbances in that town have not yet made their report. The town is now quiet.

Admiral Canaris, the Minister of Marine, had refused from the Cabinet. Admiral Canaris, the Minister of Marine, had also expressed his intention of resigning, but had been induced to withdraw the letter containing his resignation. Three persons lost their lives; the damage done to effects and furniture, and to the fronts of the Castle is very great.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE, Friday. The accounts which have reached us this week, from nearly the whole of our wheat growing districts, are highly favourable, and in the southern and western counties—are, on the whole, of a favourable character. In Essex, Kent, Hampshire, Devonshire, &c., large quantities of wheat have been carried in good condition. North of the Humber, very little wheat has as yet been cut. Since Monday, the arrivals of wheat of home produce for our market coastwise, and by land carriage, with those reported on several previous weeks; nevertheless, they have proved reasonably large. A few speculative purchases having been effected in the article on Wednesday last, the show of samples here, to-day, was by no means large, yet fo by adequate to meet the wants of the buyers. On the whole, the factors were disposed to submit to lower terms; consequently, very little business was transacted at unaltered prices, and a clearance was not effected. The duty on foreign wheat having remained stationary at 18s., very few parcels have been entered for home consumption this week. For every description—fine as well as middling—the demand was very dull, yet prices of the former have undergone no change. 2880 quarters. We had a very limited show of barley, the sale for which was tolerably steady, at previous rates. There was an increased supply of malting, chevalier, and distilling, for which the demand was very dull, yet prices of the former have undergone no change. 2880 quarters. We had a very limited show of barley, the sale for which was tolerably steady, at previous rates. There was an increased supply of malting, chevalier, and distilling, for which the demand was very dull, at previous prices. A very large import of oats as taken place from abroad, viz., 20,000 quarters; but, as on our own coasts, as also from Ireland, scarcely any parcels came forward, the trade was extremely inactive, and previous rates were barely supported. Beans, peas, and flour moved off slowly at unaltered figures. We had a few parcels of new seeds offering, in fine condition. The seed trade ruled dull, yet prices were not lower. The accounts respecting the new crop were somewhat more favourable.

TEA. There have been offered at public sale this week about 14,000 packages, about 600 of which found buyers, at previous rates, with the exception of Gunpowders and Imperials, which declined 1d. to 1½d per lb. The imports continue on a moderate scale, with large deliveries. Privately, the single parcels are very small. Low and middling Congous are selling freely, but all other kinds of teas are very dull.

Sugar.—Only a moderate business has been doing in West India sugar this week, and the speculations have declined from 6d to 1s per cwt. In Mauritius, very little is doing; but all other descriptions are in good request, at full prices. Brown lumps are selling at 66s, and standard do, 75s 6d per cwt.

Coffee.—Good ordinary Ceylon has been steady, at 46s to 47s per cwt. In Jamaica, only a moderate business is doing; while the foreign market is very inactive, but prices are not lower.

Cocoa.—Owing to the present high rates, very little is doing in this article. Small lots of West India have sold at 43s to 44s for good ordinary Trinidad, and 45s 6d to 46s for good red.

Rice.—We have to report a very slow inquiry for this article, which may be purchased on very easy terms.

Provisions.—The stock of Irish butter being large, and the arrivals extensive, the demand is heavy, at a further decline in value of 1s per cwt. Nearly the whole of the late imports of foreign butter have been taken at full prices. There is rather more doing in bacon, though at a decline of 1s per cwt. Prime sizeable Waterford, 48s to 49s, inferior ditto, 44s to 47s, and heavy, 43s to 45s per cwt. Hams and lards dull, and rather lower. Other kinds of provisions inactive.

Tallow.—This market has ruled very steady, but no further improvement can be noticed in the quotations. Town tallow, 42s to 42s 3d per cwt. The shipments, at St Petersburgh, are progressing in about the same ratio as those of last season.

Oils.—There is more business doing in nearly all kinds, and prices have an upward tendency, especially for southern and linseed.

Hay and Straw.—Coarse meadow hay, 45s 6d to 46s 6d; useful ditto, 48s 6d to 49s 6d, fine upland ditto, 46s 10d to 48s 6d; clover hay, 46s 6d to 49s 6d; oat straw, 26s 6d to 27s 6d; wheat straw, 26s 6d to 27s 6d, per load. New meadow hay, 40s 10s to 44s 12s 6d., and new clover hay, 42s 6d to 46s 5s, per load.

Hops (Friday).—The accounts which have reached us to-day from Mid Kent are to the effect that the blue is looking very unpromising, and from all other parts, our advices are, comparatively speaking, favourable. For most kinds of hops, we have a ready demand at fully previous quotations. A packet of new hops, grown at Hoesley, in Sussex, was on offer this morning by Mr Dunk. The quality was good, and the sale; price 40s per cwt. The duty is stated at £175,000. Sussex Pockets, 42s 8s to 49s 6d; Weald of Kent, 49s 8s to 56s 6d; Mid Kents, 49s 10s to 58s 6s; East Kents, 49s 10s to 59s 6s.

Potatoes.—The supplies are large, yet the sale is steady, at from 40s to 80s per ton.

Beef, Pork, &c. (Friday.)—In to-day's market the supply of beasts on offer was, for the time of year, moderately extensive, but of no fine quality. For a breadth of demand rather heavy, Monday's prices were with difficulty obtained. From Holland we received 60 beasts, being very large; by 300 less than three months since. The number of sheep was also large, but the sales were somewhat sluggish. The number of calves was small, and the sales not a shade improved. From Holland we received 60 beasts, 300 sheep, and 24 calves, from Scotland 100 Scots, mostly in fair condition. The number of sheep were large by 300 than three months since. In this city nothing

HER MAJESTY'S VISIT TO THE CATHEDRAL, AT COLOGNE.

HER MAJESTY'S VISIT TO COLOGNE CATHEDRAL.

In our Journal of the Royal route, we briefly described her Majesty's visit to the Cathedral (Dom Kirche) of Cologne, which, though in an unfinished state, is one of the finest and purest Gothic monuments in Europe.

The Royal visit took place on Wednesday afternoon (the 13th), but press of other illustrations of her Majesty's progress prevented our inserting the accompanying representation in our paper of last week.

The Queen and suite, accompanied by the King of Prussia, left Brühl for Cologne, in order to see the Cathedral and some few other of the remarkable sights of the city. By an order from the authorities, which was previously promulgated in the papers, a procession was formed of the Dombau-Verein, or committee for superintending the completion of the Cathedral, together with the workmen employed under them. They formed in a long line, two or three abreast, in a small square near the Cathedral, so that when the Royal party came up they were ready to precede them. The carriages drove slowly round the area in which the Cathedral stands, the Queen being thus enabled to see the full beauty of the structure, which, although, as every reader knows, it is unfinished, is nevertheless magnificent.

The great design of the architect for the whole building is marked out with tolerable clearness, but nearly all that is necessary to give it an ensemble of architectural beauty is unfinished. The great tower, which is a miracle of lightness and elegance for so gigantic a mass, was to have been 500 feet high, but it is cut short at about 160. It was to have had a companion tower of the same height, which, however, was not even commenced. From the top of one of the towers, the Royal flag waved, and, singular to say, from the crane which was left by the workmen at the top of the tower when the work was left unfinished in the very early part of the sixteenth century.

BAYEN THURM, COLOGNE.

In the second Engraving, we gain a glance at the picturesque river scenery of the suburbs, and its industrial population; for they attend to matters of more import than dancing and beer-drinking at the guinguettes. In the distance is seen a steamer, strangely jostling with the Roman Colonia, and the times when Cologne was called "the Rome of the North."

As the Queen now passed round the Cathedral, a vast crowd of persons lined the way. They behaved with the utmost decorum. As soon as the circuit of the exterior had been made, her Majesty and the other distinguished personages left their carriages, and entered the Cathedral. The bells were set tolling at the time, and their blended tones, more deep, and, at the same time, more soft than those of the finest organ, produced the grandest harmony conceivable.

The choir of the Cathedral is remarkable as one of the most perfect specimens of Gothic architecture extant. Here, also, is the famous shrine of the Three Kings of Cologne. All these things, and many more, which are familiar to travellers, and the circumstantial particulars of which are to be found in the guide-books, were visited by the Royal party.

"J. H.," Newbiggin.—It is not contrary to the laws of Chess to Castle the King after he has been in check. The position sent is utterly deficient in point or purpose. In a problem, the best defensive moves must be given to the beaten party, and he must be mated by force in despite of them, or the problem is nought.
"Bookworm"—Not of Dr. Parr. The anecdote, which we remember reading in the "Quarterly Review" some years since, is told of Archdeacon Coxe, and is to this effect:—Shortly after he first left college, he spent a few weeks at Margate; upon his return, a lady, hearing him speak enthusiastically of Chess, remarked that he should have been at Margate lately, where a melancholy gentleman was to be seen playing Chess by himself in the public library for hours together. "Did you know his face?" asked Mr. Coxe. "No, indeed," said the lady; "but I can remember his back, and should know that in a moment." Mr. Coxe placed himself in the attitude of the Chess player, and was immediately recognised as the melancholy individual of the Margate Library.

"Hawthorn."—Try the following:—White King at his 3rd, Rook at Q B 6th, Kt at Q Kt 7th, and P at Q 2nd; Black King at his 4th, and P at K B 4th. Having placed the men thus, show how White mates in seven moves.—Another: White King at his B 6th, Q at her R 3rd, Rook at Q R 4th, Pawns at K B 6th and K Kt 5th; Black King at his R square, and P at K R 2nd. In this situation, White engages to give checkmate with his Kt's Pawn in ten moves without taking the Black Pawn.—Again: Place the men precisely as in the last problem, except the White King, which must stand on his B's 5th instead of 6th square. Here, also, the Mate is to be forced with the Kt's Pawn in ten moves without taking the Black pawn. These last stratagems are extremely difficult.
"A Lover of Chess."—*Confessedly knowing little or nothing of the game, would it not benefit for the amateur to devote the time he can spare for Chess to his own improvement, rather than to animadversions on games, the beauties of which he does not seem to understand? The present variation occurs originally, we believe, in Koch's Treatise, published at Magdeburg, 1828, but it has since been carefully analysed, and much improved, by the great Indian player, Ghulam Kassim. HER MAJESTY AT GOTHA.

Gotha, August 28.

BY AN early hour, yesterday, her Majesty left Coburg, en route for this place, stopping at Meiningen at two, to lunch with the Duke and Duchess; and sleeping at Reinhardtsbrunn, a seat of the Duke of Coburg and Gotha. Her Majesty arrived there at eight o'clock last evening, and is expected at Gotha in the course of this afternoon. In consequence of the détour to Meiningen, made by the Royal party, some of the towns and villages on the Coburg and Gotha road were greatly disappointed, all their preparations of flowers, arches, and flags having been thrown away. Here all is gaiety and bustle, the whole city being in gala dress — all festoons and garlands, from one end to the other. At a short distance from the gate by which her Majesty will enter, a large and splendid arch is erected across the road; and from thence to the gate itself the way leads under a roof or arcade of wreaths and flowers. Here the Queen will be received by the municipal and military authorities of the place, with the usual ceremonies. There will be a public festival during her Majesty's stay, and a grand ball at the theatre; but no fixed arrangements are yet made.

Gotha, August 29.

Yesterday was a "great day" for Gotha; though Kings and Princes walk about its streets without either parade or remark, the expected arrival of the Queen of England set the whole population astir. As a beginning, the citizens raised a subscription of some six thousand crowns, for money is as much the sinews of festivity as war, and, that to work with, old Gotha was decorated as it never had been before. The style was generally the same as at Coburg, wreaths and garlands disposed along the fronts of the houses; with the addition (in some of the streets) of poles planted along the trottoirs, with evergreens twisted round, and a mile or two in length of festoons of the same suspended between them. These preparations extended along the roads two or three miles from the city; every village had its arch, or more or less of decoration. The pines, which abound here, were laid under contribution very extensively; and the dark green of their branches, when relieved by clusters of the bright red berries of the mountain-ash, had a very pretty effect. The barriers across the roads for the collection of the chausse-geld, were raised aloft, and converted for once, by aid of wreath and garland, to the purpose of ornament. Between the city and Reinhardtsbrunn, on the road by which her Majesty was expected to enter, the preparations were the most elaborate. At the point where it joins, almost at right angles, the high-road, a short distance from the city gate, a Triumphal Arch, in imitation of stone, on a much larger scale, than such fabrics created for the moment usually are, was erected. (See the engraving at page 152.) In front of it, towards the city, two stages were placed, one for the municipal authorities, the other for a band of music. The road is shaded on each side by lofty trees, and the avenue from the arch to the city gate was transformed on this occasion into a perfect bower, by garlands suspended across it. It descends to the city in a gentle sloping, and enters it in front of the Palace of Friedenstahl, the residence of the Dowager Duchess of Coburg, where her Majesty is to stay. (See the engraving at page 153.)

The people had evidently resolved that the day should be a festival; the villagers and peasantry were thronging into the city from six o'clock in the morning, in omnibuses of shape and make that would rather astonish Paddington and the Bank, but of wonderful containing powers; and carts and waggons of the most primitive structure, but which, with the good horses and fine roads of this country, do all a vehicle is required to do as well as better. This continued throughout the day, and as all the peasantry donned their best array, and gayest head-dresses, and as every village has a different one, the variety of costume was immense. As groups gathered at the corner of some quaint old street, hung with wreaths and flowers, the scene was more like one of the stage than of actual life.

In the morning, many parties drove out to Reinhardtsbrunn, for a chance of catching a glimpse of the Queen, during her usual drive. The residence is about eight English miles from Gotha. It was once a Priory, or religious establishment, founded by Reinhardt, a monk, whose name it still preserves. It is beautifully situated, just where the plain, in which Gotha stands, begins to rise into pine-clad hills of the same character as the whole of the Thuringian range of mountains, of which the scenery and character are completely Swiss. The mansion is half castle, half country-seat—irregular, but picturesque. (See the engraving at page 153.) On the evening of her Majesty's arrival, a body of the miners from the neighbouring hills, paraded the gardens and forest-paths, around the Chateau, with lighted torches.

Here her Majesty spent the day quietly, while the good city of Gotha was in a perfect ferment: crowds parading the streets—Lancers galloping to and fro, as if the fate of a battle depended on the message they bore—the Burger-guard mustering, and doing their best to look as little like respectable tradesmen as possible. At two o'clock, they took up their ground, lining the roads.de, from the city gate to the Arch; here they stood in our weary hours, under arms, during the tedium of duty by smoking profusely and drinking beer extensively—for the day was hot and the road dusty. It must have been a great support under their arduous duty, but it detracted somewhat from their martial appearance. It is beyond the power of belt and buttons to make a respectable, middle-aged German look like a hero; it requires short coats, tight trousers and a pipe—a combination of which there were several instances.

As the afternoon wore on, the crowd gathered into a compact mass along the wide footways; the Municipals, with the Burgomaster, in a Court suit, occupied the platform raised for them; they were accompanied by several clergymen, in their gowns. At last, a distant cannon announced the departure of the Royal cortege from the Residenz Palace. Firing was repeated at different points along the road, as they advanced, and at last the head of the procession appeared in sight. It was headed by a body of gendarmes on horseback—a number of coaches, then a very respectable carriage for two; the Duke's chasseurs, mounted, the Duke himself, on horseback, and the carriage of Her Majesty, who was accompanied by the King and Queen of the Belgians, and Prince Albert. At the Arch the procession stopped, the Burgomaster descended to the side of the carriage, and welcomed her Majesty in a speech to the following effect :—

"Happy in the consciousness of your Majesty's presence in our town, we lay our most heartfelt devotion at the feet of the great Sovereign of the British Empire. Happy are we that the kind sympathies of the mother and the wife, have never lost their truth or their intensity amid the splendour of the greatest throne of the world. To those sympathies we owe the incomparable pleasure of this day—that of welcoming to the home of a beloved Prince, the greatest and at the same time the most amiable of Queens, as his consort. Little is it in our power to convey to your Majesty the delight that fills our hearts in welcoming such illustrious guests to our humble town. Still we have the consolation of knowing that had the utmost been done in outward demonstration, it never could have equalled the fervency with which we say hail to Victoria, hail to Britain's Queen."

Her Majesty bowed her thanks repeatedly during the address, and at its close the procession moved on, and her Majesty alighted in the courtyard of the Dowager Duchess' residence.

GOTHA, August 30

The visit of her Majesty is well timed for participating in the public amusements or national festivities of Germany. At Bonn, the inauguration of the statue of Beethoven had drawn together a vast concourse of celebrities, and the ceremony itself was a memorable one; and here the Queen has arrived in the midst of the vogel-schiessen, or the bird-shooting, a fête annually held by a society formed for the encouragement of skill in rifle shooting. It begins on the last Sunday in August, and continues for a week, which is one of great gaiety. The club has a spacious house about half a mile from the town, and, on the square in front of it, a very joyous fair goes on while the fête lasts; business is slightly mixed with pleasure, but the latter predominates; there is a little trading, but only in the light wares, that seem manufactured on the same principle all the world over—to look as bright with as little value as possible, for great and universal is rustic simplicity; and the Autolycus of the stall, with ready tongue and nimble hand, is not wanting; the head-dress of the female peasants of Gotha must be seen to understand the importance of ribbons in rural commerce; a dozen yards per head is a moderate quantity, and, but for the Zollverein, the demand would make the fortune of Coventry. Other nick-nacks, needless to specify, are here in abundance, to say nothing of shows of conjurors and automats, marvellous monsters, and music; and the eternal roundabouts which seem the German peasant girls' paradise, and are much more elaborate affairs than with us. All this, however, is but the accompaniment of the fête, of which a brief description will suffice.

Every one knows, from Weber's "Freischütz," what importance is attached to winning a prize at these contests of skill as a marksman. In Switzerland, the desire to excel amounts to a perfect passion, and there is scarcely a village without its shooting place; and the triennial match of all the cantons is a national solemnity of no slight political influence. There are many societies of the same kind in Germany, and that of Gotha is one of the best. Their house is a spacious mansion; the ground-floor is fitted up as a shooting room, if the term is admissible, where the rifles are loaded—a very nice operation, as much depends on the proportion of the powder to the weight of the ball. From the side of this apartment, looking into a garden at the back of the house, a little recess is thrown out, open towards the garden, with an upright beam, to which is fixed a rest for the rifle, which can be raised or lowered at pleasure. The marks are targets of various sizes, figures of animals, that can be put in motion by cords and wheels, as it were, running; and, as at present for the fête, the figure of an eagle on a high mast, with outspread wings, the firing at which resembles that in the contest of the popinjay, described by Walter Scott in "Old Mortality." Any one may fire, paying for each shot, the money forming a fund from which prizes are given, either in cash or articles of value. There is a stock of rifles on the establishment, but every one may bring his own if he chooses; they are of all sizes, from the lightness of a fowling-piece to a weight almost impossible to hold without a rest. The fête is commenced by a shot from the deputy of the Duke, generally his favourite chasseur, and then it is free to all. As a sport, it does not seem very exciting; with a still mark, a heavy piece, a sight that guides the most unskilful, and a trigger that acts with the touch of a feather, it appears almost impossible to miss; to get a prize is not so easy, as the ball must strike certain defined points, which throws an element of chance into it. As an amusement, to excel in it requires more nerve, but scarcely so much skill of eye and hand as billiards. As a means of offence and defence, the value of the rifle is well known in every army of Europe.

The fête was proceeding merrily when her Majesty arrived, and it was resolved to take advantage of the concourse of people from the surrounding country who thronged to it, to furnish the Queen with a sight of the peasantry. A platform in front of the Shooting House was arranged with seats, and served as a large dais, on which was her Majesty, surrounded by all the Royalties at present here. There is a square open space in front of the house, the centre of which was occupied by the crowd: along the three sides, the front of the terrace making one of them, a clear roadway was railed off; the whole area was surrounded by the booths and stalls for the holiday makers. The Royal carriages arrived on the ground at two o'clock, and as soon as her Majesty had taken her seat on the front of the terrace (and behind a short quickset hedge), the head of a procession appeared, the like of which, probably, never passed in review before Royalty. It was composed of the farmers, peasantry, and labourers of all the districts and parishes round Gotha: the farmers rode, the peasantry came in their long narrow waggons, gaily dressed out with arches and leaves for the occasion. They were filled with men, women, and children. The national costume being general among the girls and women, there was no attempt made to produce a greater effect, by selecting the best looking or the best dressed as a show, in any part of the procession. The gayest and richest dresses might be seen in the same waggon with the most ordinary; in fact, the whole seemed arranged in family parties, or friends and neighbours from one village, without any distinction whatever. The men are a strong, sturdy, sunburnt race, and the same description will apply to the farmers; the last were well mounted, the horses here being generally good, but less neatness is displayed in the matter of bridle and saddle than might be wished, where there are ample means of securing it. The procession passed in defile before her Majesty for nearly two hours in one continuous line, and the arrangements were so well made, that no stoppages or confusion occurred. It entered at one corner of the enclosure, passed round in front of her Majesty, and left by the opposite side, changing the plain in another direction, on their return to the city or their homes, and looking in the distance like a camp of Scythians in motion. As each carriage came in sight of the Royal party, great was the speculation among the peasant girls as to which was really the "Königinn"—whether it was the lady in the pink bonnet, or the blue. Their doubts were not set at rest till they approached near enough to be assured by the bow and smile which her Majesty had for all, appearing highly delighted with the whole proceedings. The Queen certainly never gave a reception on so large a scale before. The number of waggons alone was a hundred and twenty, and, taking a moderate average, they held twelve persons each; the detachments of horsemen were very many, and they passed on and on till it seemed as if it would never end.

shortly before four, when her Majesty and the whole party left the ground in the same order as they had arrived.

GOTHA, August 31.

Her Majesty attended yesterday a grand hunting in the forest, about four miles from Reinhardtsbrunn.

Every one has read of German hunting, for descriptions of it swell the pages of each tourist and romancer, who has placed his fictions or his facts in the land of the Saxon kindred. We have heard of the gigantic scale on which all the appointments for the chase were made, of the numbers engaged in it, and of the immense amount of game slaughtered; and we picture to ourselves an exciting scene, which a true Nimrod would freely cross oceans to witness. If he once saw a Treibjagd or battue of deer, he would be sorely disappointed, and for the course of his natural life would never cross a street to see another.

Custom reconciles us all to many things, which, to a stranger, appear repulsive, and those who are to the "manner born," cannot conceive what he finds to be offended at. Thus, an Englishman's ideas of what is sport, are totally different from those of Germany: we hunt for the excitement, the exercise, and the danger, which has, of itself, a charm; the German makes the Jagd on a principle that produces neither of them; the game is driven in for him by servants, it is confined without the possibility of escape, and shot by a party standing at a table as if they were in a saloon, listening to the waltzes and polkas of Strauss, played by a band in attendance to make the thing as agreeable as possible! All this is far from our notions of what hunting is; but here the practice is established; all who take part in the exclusive amusement, are brought up in the system, which is not the only one, for the real "chase," with hound and horn existing also here, but followed with less intensity than in England. If the object of the battue is to thin the large herds of deer by killing a portion of them in the shortest time and with the least trouble, it is quite successful; but of the interest and animation of a hunt, it has none whatever.

Reinhardtsbrunn lies at the edge of the large tract of forest that clothes the mountains of Thuringia, the timber of which produces to the Duke, or rather the State, an immense annual revenue. The mountains are steep, and the pines stand so close that it would be impossible to pass through them on horseback; the great difficulties of riding such a "country" may have tended to encourage the battue. On the present occasion, a beautiful spot was selected for the purpose. It was the crown of a hill, lower than the mountains around it, but still high above the valleys around, forming the area of a kind of natural amphitheatre. The character of the scenery is Swiss—all pine and rock; through an opening in the mountains the view extended to the fertile plain beyond as far as the horizon. The comparatively level space in the centre of this hill was cleared of trees and bushes, except a few not high enough to give any shelter, and inclosed on three sides by a high net-work, with canvas behind it. In the centre, a small circular pavilion was built, open on all sides, carpeted, and fitted up with easy chairs for her Majesty, the Queen of the Belgians, the Duchess of Saxe Coburg and attendants. It was slightly raised from the ground, and around it on the outside was built a fence of pine boughs three or four feet high, forming a kind of gallery, within which stood the marksmen of the highest rank—Prince Albert, the King of the Belgians, Duke Ferdinand of Coburg, and the Prince of Leiningen; for here the field does not level distinctions, and the sport is regulated with all the pedantry of etiquette. Lower down the slope a table was placed, covered with flasks and all the materials for loading, with attendants for each. Next of Nobles, Princes, and Counts who were permitted to join the Royal party, but not those of the first rank of honour. A band of music was stationed among the trees, and played at intervals during the whole battue.

For some time previous to the arrival of the shooting party, the drivers, in the uniform of chasseurs, assisted by peasants, had formed a line in the woods, gradually closing in and driving the deer into the enclosed space. They first appeared in straggling parties of three and fours, but the main body was driven in about three o'clock. On emerging from the thicket into the cleared space, with men before and behind, and hemmed by the firing and the clang of music, they seemed, after one or two attempts to escape, to become frantic. They rushed rapidly in a long line across the enclosure, and a whole volley of rifle balls was fired into them at little more than pistol range. Very few, not more than three, fell on the spot; but many were severely wounded and fell at different parts of the enclosure. Those who escaped, dispersed in various directions, some huddling closely together among the few bushes that had been left standing, apparently stupified with terror, or as if they knew that any effort was useless. When the firing ceased for an instant, the attendants cut the throats of the wounded animals that had escaped notice, and remained struggling in agony, piteous to witness, for a long time. The contrast of the slaughter that was going on with the stillness of light timber had something shocking in it, and altogether it was a scene which no sportsman would like to take a part in.

At four o'clock, the Jagd closed; the dead deer were brought up and laid in the centre, in a line from the Pavilion. Some of them were fine animals; the number killed, large and small, was forty-eight; but it was thought some others would be afterwards picked up and brought in.

Besides the Royal personages before mentioned, the following were at the shooting party:—The Duke of Saxe Weimar, Prince Reuss, Prince of Hohenlohe-Langenburg, Prince of Hohenlohe-Waldenburg, Prince Leopold of Saxe-Coburg, Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, Prince of Reuss-Ebersdorf, Duke of Wurtemberg, Prince of Parstenberg, Count Mensdorf, and a host of others equally Royal and noble.

The following are some additional particulars of the route from Coburg to Gotha :—

The Royal travellers left Rosenau, on the 27th ult., at eight o'clock, to proceed by Meiningen to Gotha. The weather was pleasant, and the ride through a fair country.

Nearly all the villages and the little towns along the road were decked in wreaths and festoons, and the inhabitants, men, women, and children, turned out in their Sunday attire to greet the cavalcade of the Queen.

A few miles beyond Rudach, the first stage from Coburg—a lifeless, tumbledown looking collection of wood and plaster houses—the road passes into the territories of Meiningen. The boundaries, indeed, are marked by stakes, here run in a curious zig-zag fashion. Morsels of different principalities and duchies in Lower Saxony, so that in the course of a few miles travelling you may have journeyed through the lands of half a dozen powers.

At the Meiningen boundary the authorities of the state were in waiting to receive the Queen, under a triumphal arch, a few gensdarmes and state postilions joining the cortege.

Hildburghausen is the first town you pass in the Duchy of Meiningen. Here everything was in a bustle—every house within its quiet walls—for the reception of Brit ish Royalty. The civic authorities were in full fig, a sort of local National Guard of citizens lined the street, a band dressed in bourgeois discovered very respectable powers, and a pretty double row of little girls, all white muslin and ivy wreaths, were arranged along the principal street.

From Hildburghausen to Gotha you can go by two distinct roads. Her Majesty took the longer in point of distance, and the more interesting in point of romantic scenery, with the view of making a passing call upon the Duke of Meiningen, at his Palace, situated in the capital of the duchy.

The Royal party arrived at Meiningen at two o'clock, lunched there with the Duke, and proceeded on to Reinhardtsbrunn, which they reached shortly after eight o'clock.

They arrived at the Palace of the reigning Duke, at Gotha, about four or five o'clock on Thursday afternoon (the 28th ult.)

Her Majesty looks remarkably well, and, despite the wonderful gallantry of her Lutheran host, who endeavours to shield her from the scorching rays of the sun, yet, from continual exposure to the air, the al fresco breakfasts and dinners at Rosenau, the drives and walks in the country, her Majesty's complexion has assumed a glow of health, the pure and eloquent blood speaks in her cheeks so fervently, that her subjects will scarcely recognise their Sovereign on her return to the Isle of Wight. Prince Albert has lost his habitual pale cast of thought, and looks as if he enjoyed the tonic bracing air of the Thuringian hills.

The Queen brought at Gotha models of the picturesque costumes of the peasants. Whilst her Majesty was inspecting them, the Queen of the Belgians observed, "How pretty our Alice will look—she must indeed be anxious for our return."

Our last mistake will certainly be corrected by the Royal visit to Gotha. The revenues of the Coburg family will no longer be represented as amounting to such an insignificant sum as it has been erroneously supposed. The Reigning Duke has to keep up the establishment of fourteen palaces, and his property in the Thuringer Wald produces £70,000 per annum in the sale of timber.

The Queen was to leave Gotha on Wednesday last (the 3rd). Her Majesty was to sleep at Fulda on the first night, and at Wiesbaden or Frankfort on the following night. From thence to Cologne, and, perhaps, pass a day at Brussels, or at the Palace of Laeken, with King Leopold; but the interior portion of the route has not yet been definitively arranged, although it is certain that her Majesty will embark at Antwerp.

Great festivities are also going on at the chateau of Rumpenheim, near Frankfort. The Duchess of Cambridge is staying there with a large party of friends and relations. The Duke of Cambridge is expected to join the party, there is little doubt, as the Queen of Hanover, who is at Lucerne, the land of Savoy, would not leave his own kingdom, as it was his intention, to come to pay his respects to the Queen of England at Gotha. He sent the Baron de Gersdorff, who was formerly Saxon Minister in London, to Coburg, to compliment the Duke and the Queen, and to carry his apology.

HER MAJESTY'S RETURN TO ENGLAND.

According to present arrangements, her Majesty and Prince Albert will arrive at [illegible] on Saturday next, and embark on board the Royal Victoria and [illegible] steamers, [illegible] and [illegible] to Ostend, and proceed [illegible] to Brussels, where they will remain [illegible] on the 9th inst., when the vessel will again anchor, and her Majesty and his Royal Highness will disembark on Monday morning, and proceed to Osborne House.

The Peregrine, Captain Bullock; the Black Eagle steam-yacht, Master Commander Cook; and the Lightning steam-tender, Master Commander Fairley, are ordered to proceed to Antwerp, to attend on her Majesty on her return to the Isle of Wight. The Monkey steam-tug will also proceed to Antwerp, to assist in conveying the Royal luggage, &c., to this country.

THE FESTIVAL OF ST. GREGORY, AT COBURG.

Although our Correspondent at Coburg described this very interesting Festival in one of his communications of last week (see page 130 of our Journal), we have availed ourselves of our Artist's sketch-book to picture this very engaging scene. We subjoin a few additional details:

As soon as the promenade was over, and the promenaders had returned to the pavilions, the children's turn came. They formed once more in procession, and walked slowly round the inclosure to the music of the bands, passing severally by the Queen. It was a pretty sight. The little fair-haired girls in their chaste costume of white and ivy wreaths; the strange, often grotesque, mixture of the fancy dresses of the boys; the uniforms of the gendarmerie, and of the officers who attended the party; the music, flags, and the general stir and excitement among such a multitude of people,—rendered the whole thing one of the gayest and most animated scenes we ever remember to have witnessed. The procession was a sort of Eton Montem show in miniature, but with the graceful addition of the girls; and the whole ground on which the festival took place, with the shows and booths, the music, and the gay crowds of people sauntering about and enjoying themselves, looked like a fair, but without its rude license.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Wednesday.

Louis Philippe has been assuredly bitten by some archeologist. For some time past he has been [illegible] season that leaves France for Greece or Egypt is commanded to keep his eyes open, and to beg, buy, borrow, or steal, any statue, or torso, or bas-relief that may come within his ken or beneath his fingers. The result has in some instances been successful, but the Cit zen King has come rather too late in the field of antiquity to gather much from the well-gleaned harvest. The possession of the Elgin Marbles by the English seems to have awakened the true Egyptian thirst; and though no new well has yet been discovered, a spoonful of the element is better than eternal drought. A really splendid specimen, however, of antique Egyptian statuary arrived last week at the Louvre. It is of black granite, and represents a divinity, with a lion's head. The body is that of a female, exquisitely proportioned, and bearing on the bust the ancient symbol, styled Polos. Various hieroglyphics ornament the seat of the goddess, and the angular cross is twice repeated. I rather fancy it to be a statue of Isis, who is frequently represented with figures of different animals. It is to be given to the Musée de Antiques, the sculptures and inscriptions discovered by M Lebas during his sojourn in Greece, will be placed in the Museum of the Louvre. The King has described that these monuments of the time "When Greece was young," should be placed in the Lower Hall, near to the spot where stand the antiquities of Nineveh. M. Lebas has been wonderfully successful in his search. Many of the specimens are exceedingly fine, and as the ILLUSTRATED NEWS has achieved the reputation of an Art Journal, a slight reference to the subject may be acceptable to your readers, en gr —

1. Basso relievo representing Theseus naked, invoking as the heroic protector of Attica. This statue is perfectly executed, and in admirable conservation, belonging to the best days of Grecian art. Its excessive delicacy does not admit a doubt of its age and attributes.

2. A funereal stele of a good epoch, representing a young girl bidding farewell to her parents, who are grouped around her bier.

3. Fragments of a frieze supposed to have belonged to one of the lesser temples of the Acropolis, which time or the disasters of war have effected the disappearance. The subject is an amazonian combat.

4. Basso relievo (votive) from Cortyne or Crete, and in the best school—Jupiter seated with Hebe and Mercury—or, I should say, Ecrope and Cadmus; for such the latter received offerings from the former. In the corner is a person habited in a flowing mantle, and of lesser stature than the three divinities, in a supplicatory attitude.

5. Fragments of a small statue, of which the head and a portion of the arm are wanting, but of which it is easy to recognise Hercules seated on a rock; for on the rock is spread the lion's skin, and on the left leg is the club. It is admirably executed, and is very interesting, as it will doubtless ultimately cast a light on the person of the famous Belvidere Torso, to which it bears a great analogy both in form and pose.

6. A low-relievo, of the Nine Muses with their attributes, between Mercury and Apollo. As the inscription on the plinth proves, it was a votive monument, consecrated to Apollo. The workmanship is wretched, and of a late epoch. It cannot, properly speaking, be deemed a work of art, but rather an interesting page of the history of the decadence of art among the Greeks, and a proof of the obstinate persistance of the religious practices of the Heathens until the very verge of Christianity.

To the above, M. Lebas has added twelve marbles, bearing Greek inscriptions, all of which were discovered at Mylasa and Cairo. These are of historical importance, especially three of them, which contain three decrees of the time when the famous Masale was King of Cairo. There are three dates: the first, of the reign of Artaxerxes; the second, Mnemon and Artaxerxes; the third, Ochus; proving they belong to the years 367, 351, and 338 before our era. These are valuable acquisitions. Some or them, I confess, as an Englishman, I should be glad to see transferred to the British Museum. But, after all, art is universal, and every nation of Europe should join in the good work of conservation. Had not this been the case, many of the finest works would have been destroyed by barbarians, and the rarest specimens been consigned to the building of outhouses or cattle-sheds, for some stupid Turk or dirty Egyptian.

Architecture seems to be the besetting rage of the present race of Frenchmen. Streets are removed, houses are taken down, and all sorts of improvements are contemplated; in fact the English mania has passed to this country, increasing during its trajet to a perfectly rabid state. I must do France, however, the justice to acknowledge that in almost every instance a positive good—accomplished; for instance, at this moment, in the Rue Traversière or Saint Antoine an edifice is nearly completed—an office in a singularly severe style of architecture. There are seven or eight immense surface. It is a new model prison, to be called the "Nouvelle Force." The plan of this model penitentiary reminds one of the ribs of a fan; five grand wings of buildings radiate in a half circle from a central centre, whence the inspectors can see every thing that passes in the long galeries upon which the doors of the cells open, which amount to upwards of twelve hundred. The whole is the most perfect system ever conceived that exists either in Europe or America. It is warmed equally throughout by a powerful steam apparatus, with ventilators in summer. There is a chapel in the centre, and the cells or buildings for officers are vast and commodious; there are green swards for daily exercise; and water, air, and gas are abundantly distributed. This important edifice, which is nearly completed, was, I am credibly informed, intended to receive its tenants in 1846. When possession of this new prison is taken, the ancient one of "la Force," situated in the Marais, will be consigned to the hammers of the destroyer. Humanity will gain by the change, for you can have no conception of the combination of filth and wretchedness of the majority of French prisons.

The unpleasant affair of the Duke and Duchess of Stackpool is now exhausted. In the first instance judgment was given by default. The result was, that the lady was to receive, for herself and her two daughters, an alimentary pension of 12,000 francs, and an additional provision of 60,000 francs. This allowance was, however, contested pendant lite; but the final decision of the Tribunal is, that if the Duke of Stackpool resumes his former residence as a French citizen, and applies the necessary sums for the upholding the dignity of the Duchess, the former judgment to be reversed; but in default of such engagement, that he be condemned to allow the Duchess an annual pension of 48,000 francs, and 4000 francs to be paid monthly. The whole business has been disgraceful, and the Duke is rightly served. He will now perceive the folly of French naturalisation, and the eccentricity of French bull-fights under the paternal government of Louis Philippe, a man of gallantry. When the lady was accused of having a peculiar penchant for display, and in the habit of giving splendid fêtes, and indulging in outrageous expenses—as a French critic phrases it, "des soirées with petits soupers, &c. &c., it was answered by the legal dignitary, that all these things and many more, were the natural and proper result of her social position, and that while trade benefited by the outlay, no moral dam. ge followed. A Daniel come to judgment!

A most painful act of suicide has excited a considerable sensation for the last few days. The place selected by the wretched person was the highest tower of Notre Dame. The following are the particulars that I have been enabled to gather of this melancholy event. At about ten o'clock of the morning a young man twenty-five years of age, presented himself to the keeper of the Towers of Notre Dame, and requested to inspect the interior of the edifice. The keeper ran the bolt, to inform the man who [illegible] watch the visitors, of the visit [illegible] project he had conceived. In spite of the apparent tranquillity which till then he had assumed, in an instant he scaled the parapet of the tower, and precipitated himself from it. The unfortunate victim turns out to have been the Baron Achille Maynard, the possessor of a hand some fortune, and who, but fifteen days since, married the daughter of Comte d'Esparron. He had but just purchased an equipage, which was to serve for a contemplated journey, in company with his wife and sister, to the banks of the Guarente, where he has a chateau, and every one is lost in conjectures as to the cause which could have induced so dreadful a resolu tion M. Maynard was the author of two volumes of poetry, dedicated to M. de Martine: for many years he had furnished articles to the Gazette de France, and to the Nation.

The time is rife with prophets. Two days since, about four o'clock in the afternoon, a respectably dressed individual appeared on the Boulevard St Martin, at the corner of the Rue du Temple, bearing a large wooden cross, painted white, upon which was painted, in large red characters, these words :—" Counsel to all! Misfortune to the Great City! That which has been written in on the point to be accomplished." The crowd began to evince some interest in the strange announcement, and grouped around the man, when several sergens de ville appeared, who quietly carried him away. The grotesque nonsense seemed to have a wondrous effect on the population of this intellectual and enlightened city.

FRANCE.

We find by the Paris papers that M. Guizot has resumed his duties as Minister of Foreign Affairs, and an ordinance has been published relieving Count Duchatel, who had been appointed to the office temporarily, from the further occupation of it.

The Constitutionnel has the following interesting article on the compara tive state of the French and English steam navy, grounded upon the report of the French naval commission, over which the Prince de Joinville pre sided :—

"The commission formed by the Minister of Marine to examine questions connected with steam navigation has recently terminated its labours, and in consequently dissolved. The Prince de Joinville has presided at almost all the sittings, and has given the deepest attention to the subjects under con sideration, some details of which have transpired. The first point submitted to the examination of the committee, was the present state of our steam force, and everything connected with the merits of the fleets which we possess. There was only one opinion on this subject; our present materiel was unanimously condemned. The conclusions of the pamphlet of the Prince were admitted without reserve, and to their fullest extent. It is not a steam fleet which we possess, or scarcely anything resembling it. Our two largest specimens have far from realised the opinion formed of them, and the frigates of 450 horse power are wanting both in force and speed. There is no one of them which can be considered as a fighting vessel capable of contending with advantage against an enemy. They are more useful for purposes of transport than those of war. The Gomer, the Asmodée, and the Infernet are the only ones of this class of vessels afloat, have none of the qualities on which confidence can be reposed. If steam power is to be used as an effica cious arm, models must be sought for in which the motive power should be more in harmony with the purposes for which the vessel is required, and where the exigences of speed should not be constantly opposed to those of armament. This opinion of the members of the commission on the first class vessels enables us to anticipate pretty correctly what their ideas of the inferior class would be. The only steamer of 320-horse power, the Sane, has been always regarded England, the greatest maritime country in the world, the commission has had to point out the same faults, the same weakness, the same errors. The steam fleet of our neighbours is little more than double of ours. There have been on the other side of the Channel, as on this, several experiments at once onerous and unfortu nate. Several steam-frigates have been rebuilt as many as three times, and others have been condemned as unserviceable at the moment of launching. Vessels of inferior speed. Private builders have alone improved in England; those of the Government have been left far behind. It is private builders who have made the paddle of 30 feet as the rate of thirteen or fourteen miles an hour; it is they who have applied the screw, and who are every day making fresh improvements."

The comedy of Madlle. Plessie, the actress, to M. Arnould, a literary gentleman, was published at Paris on Sunday last.

A shocking murder was committed, last week, in the rue Godot-de-Mauroy, by a man of the name of Lemaire, as yet unknown. The wretch, armed, it is seized a large hammer, and struck his wife three tremendous blows on the skull, which killed her on the spot. On attempting to arrest him, he snatched a knife, and attempted to kill himself by stabbing himself in the breast, but was happily prevented and secured. Jealousy is thought to be the cause of this crime.

The Duchess de Nemours left Cautarets on the 28th ult. for Luz and Saint Sauveur, after giving a dinner, at which the Duke de Rianzares (Munoz, the husband of Queen Maria Christina) sat on the right hand of the Duchess.

Judgment was given, on Monday, in the Tribunal of Commerce of the Seine, in the case in which the M. Pepin Lehalleur was defendant, and certain subscribers to the railroad company for the Great Northern line plaintiffs. The Court decided that as the subscribers who now complained had not paid their deposit money within the time originally fixed by the company, and as any further delay allowed by the defendant was a matter of favour and not indulgence on his part, the demand for the plaintiffs must be considered as un founded; that in consequence the Court decided them to be nonsuited, and sentenced them to pay the costs.

The Moniteur announces that Louis Philippe continued to take much exercise. On the 30th ult. his Majesty, after walking through the large park and the plain of Rhalmaison, mounted his horse at Tréport and continued his ride until half-past six o'clock. On the 31st, the King, accompanied by the Duke of Saxe Coburg Gotha, walked for two hours in the park, and afterwards drove to Tréport and Mers, and having alighted at one of the gates of the park, continued to walk until five o'clock.

The weather in Paris has been beautiful, and the most sanguine, and probably well-founded, expectations are entertained of a plentiful harvest.

On Saturday last the Prince de Joinville, accompanied by M. Dumon, the Minister of Commerce, and M. d'Houndetot, the King's Aide de Camp, arrived off Havre in the Pluton, Government steamer. His Royal Highness had been in this vessel from Tréport to Brighton, and other points on the English coast, and had inspected at Brighton the damage lately done to the floating breakwater. The Prince, on returning to Tréport, found he could not land from the state of the sea, and therefore seized the opportunity of running along the coast to Havre, in order to gain some desirable informa tion, and landed at M. Normand's shipbuilding yard. After examining the frame work of a beautiful iron yacht being built for the King, his Royal Highness went to the Hotel Frascati, where he had a long conference with the chief naval engineer on the projected improvements of the port. At seven o'clock his Royal Highness set out by land for Tréport, where the Pluton returned on Sunday.

SPAIN.

Our letters from Madrid, of the 27th ult., state that the capital was tran quil at that date. The Queen and Royal Family were at Mondragon, in good health. The accounts of the events at Madrid, which had reached Saragossa, had not produced any effect there, as everything was perfectly quiet. There was a report in circulation, that the shopkeepers intended to close their shops again on the following day, unless the pay which had been granted for the payment of their taxes, and that they were about to try to have a subscription opened on their behalf.

TURKEY.

The advices from Turkey are important. Our letters from Constantinople of the 17th ult., state that Riza Pacha has been dismissed from office No whisper had reached the Ministry of their impending fall, when, on the evening of the 7th, Seim Bey, a household officer of the Royal Palace, was despatched, in the name of the Sultan, to demand of Riza Pacha his Nishan or decoration of office. This form of receiving was an act of dismissal to the Minister the most unceremonious. On the following day Hafiz Pacha, the Capitan Pacha, received also his dismissal; and there is no doubt enter tained but that Saffeta Pacha, the Finance Minister, and Chekib Effendi, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, will follow. To fill up the vacancies which have been made by the dismissals just named, Rifat Pacha, formerly in the cabinet, has been appointed President of the Council, Sulyman Pacha being made Commander in Chief, or Grand Seraskier, to make room for him; and Mehemet Ali Pacha, the Sultan's brother in law, has been appointed Captain Pacha, or Grand Admiral; whilst another of the brothers-in-law of the Sultan, Achmet Feti Pacha, some years ago ambassador at Vienna, is to succeed Mehemit Ali as commandant of the arsenal at Tophany. The successor of Saffeta Pacha will be, it is said, Hadj Sahib Effendi, who held the post of Finance Minister under Reschid Pacha, and Alii Effendi, formerly Secretary to Reschid Pacha, is designated as the successor of Chekib Effendi.

The French papers assert that Riza Pacha was dismissed in a very con temptuous way by the Sultan, but, according to other accounts, the Sultan had granted him a pension of 30,000 piastres per month, and expressed him self highly pleased with his services and loyalty.

The Augsburg Gazette gives his version of the affair, in a letter from Constantinople, dated August 13 :—" On Friday last, soon after Riza Pacha had received his dismissal, he was ordered to go to the Palace, but, on his entering it, the Sultan said, 'Take the Nischan from this dog, and turn him out.' The order was executed whilst Riza Pacha was in a fainting state. It is difficult to explain the disgrace in which the ex Seraskier has fallen. It is only known, that two days before his dismissal he received an order never more to visit the Palace, and the next day in the council he was reproached with all the troubles that had broken out in the empire : Riza Pacha, irri tated at this language, quitted the council, but was far from expecting the storm that was about to burst over him. All his clerks and servants were arrested when he was gone to the Palace, and when he returned he found his house deserted, and soon afterwards came an order for him not to quit it. His papers were seized, and his fortune, which is large, has been con fiscated. His horses were sold yesterday. It is supposed that he will be exiled to Konieh."

THE ISLAND OF MADAGASCAR.

Accounts have been received from the Island of Madagascar, from which it appears that Ranavalo Manjaka, the Queen of the island, issued an order in the beginning of May, to the effect that all the English and French residing within her dominions must, within eleven days, become her su bjects, by having themselves registered and naturalised, or, on refusal, were immediately to quit the island. On the arrival of this intelligence at the Mauritius, the Governor, Sir W. Gomm, without an hour's delay, dispatched her Majesty's schooner, Thunder, to the Cape of Good Hope, with information to the Admiral of that station, giving the requisite instructions to call in on his way at Tamatave, in Madagascar, to inform the affrighted foreigners that he and the French Governor of the Isle of Bourbon would send them succour without delay. According to arrangements, therefore, her Majesty's frigate Conway and his French Majesty's ships Zelee and Berceau met in the roads of Tamatave. Less harsh conditions having been asked from the Queen, she granted to her demands; after which, hostilities immediate ly commenced. Three hundred and fifty men, of whom one hundred were French soldiers, and the crews of the respective vessels, under the command of Captain Peisick and Lieutenant Hoselins, advanced across a plain, under a sharp fire from the fort and battery of grape and musketry. The enemy, however, were soon dislodged, a id the guns all spiked. For a time the fort, which mounted thirty guns, was kept possession of, but having no means of breaching the wall, and the men falling fast, it was deemed better to relinquish the island. Having burnt the custom house, guard-house, and a considerable part of the town, they landed next day and carried off all the Europeans, with their property, the wounded were likewise brought off, but the heads of those who had been killed were placed on spikes and planted on the beach. The whole merchan's in harbour, with the men-of-war, shortly after set sail, no doubt with the view of paying again an early visit when better reinforced. The casualties in this affair have been somewhat severe— English, a man killed, and 1 officer, and 11 men wounded. French, 3 officers and 14 men killed, and 1 officer and 42 men wounded. The dead were mu tilated by the Owas, who stuck their heads upon pikes, on the spot where the French and English had landed.

TAHITI.

We have received numbers of the Oceanie Francaise of Tahiti to the 20th of April last. The position of affairs was not very favourable. There was still great excitement among the natives, and a disposition to rise on the first favourable opportunity. The Oceanie publishes a curious address of proc amation by Governor Bruat, on receiving the news of the victories of Mogador and Isly, and the exchange of visits between the Sovereigns of France and Great Britain. It was made, he said, a new cf reason at the same time a strong impression of the power of France and of the friendly rel tions between that country and England, so as to remove the belief on the minds of the natives that the English native agents posed to give them encouragement and support in their resistance to the French authorities at Tahiti. The proclamation is in the native language. We translate it as literally as possible. It is as follows :—

"The Governor of all the French lands in the Pacific Sea, great orator of the King of the French, near the King-woman of all the Islands of the Society, to all the chiefs and all the men of all the lands of the Society, Friends, health to you all. This is my speech to all of you. Two great battles were gained by the armies of the King Louis Philippe, the protecti r of you all, and of us the Sovereign, the one on land, and the other below on the sea. In the battle on land were beaten 40,000 soldiers of the kingdom of Morocco by 10,000 French soldiers. The son of this great land of Mo rocco was the great chief of all these soldiers. At the other battle were ravaged two towns by the cannonading of the French ships of war, com manded by the son of Louis Philippe, Prince de Joinville, French Admiral, and in the great conversation of the enemy demanded by him peace. Eight hundred men of Morocco were killed, and 2000 and upwards wounded, and the enemies lost their ground muskets (cannon) which were taken; and a glorious treaty for the French was concluded afterwards on that land.

Here is another speech :—"There came the King-woman of Britain in to France a few moons since, and then went also our King, your protector, into Britain to visit Victoria. And where the honours given to these Kings in France and Britain, and well felt one for the other the two Governments. Such is the true speech that I make known to you all, that you may not be deceived by lying words."

The Moniteur contains the following :—

"Despatches have been received by the French Government from the Governor of the French establishments in Oceania, dated the 23rd of April last. Down to that period no fresh act of hostility had taken place at Tahiti on the part of the native population, a portion of which still continued in the intrenched camps of Punavia and Paperoo.

"At the Marquesas, a tribe of Noukahiva, irritated at having been fin ed for the plunder of some cattle, and the only one when had not frankly sub mitted to our authority, murdered by stabbing three of the garrison on the 8th of January. A detachment of troops, sent to avenge their death, pursued and dispersed the culpable tribe, and were assisted in that operation by all the other natives of the island. The principal murderers were arrested, their chief, Pakoko, was sentenced to death, and was executed. The others were transported. Tranquility had not been since disturbed. The sanatory and material condition of the establishments of Taohai and Vatahu was more satisfactory."

COUNTRY NEWS.

FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE BIRMINGHAM AND GLOUCESTER RAILWAY.

Last Saturday evening, a melancholy accident took place, about ten o'clock, on the Birmingham and Gloucester Railway, near the Cofton Hill station, which is situated within thirty three miles of Birmingham and twenty of Gloucester, by which Joseph Ward, a fireman, and Miles, a car penter, lost their lives; several persons were injured, and, indeed, two carriages burnt, and two fine engines very nearly destroyed. A luggage train, in the charge of Joseph Ward, engine driver, left Gloucester at nine o'clock for Birmingham, and on arriving at Defford it ran into a heavy truck which had most culpably been left in his way. The shock was so great as not only to throw the truck on the oppo site rails, but to cause the tender to project above the engine and fall upon it. Poor Ward was pressed against the engine rails by the tender, and twenty minutes elapsed ere he was extricated, and not till life was extinct. He was conscious for a good many minutes after the effect which was making to save him. The truck which caused the first accident was thrown on the opposite rails, and whilst in that position a train from Birmingham came dashing on. The driver jumped off and escaped, but the carriages were thrown above each other, two of them caught fire, some of the passengers were scalded, and all were more or less injured. One man, of the name of Miles, a carpenter, going home to his wife and family at Cheltenham, was much cut, bruised, and scalded, that he did not live more than a few hours. Six or seven others were severely cut and scalded, and all in the train very much shaken. About three o'clock on Sunday morning, three of the carriages having arrived, one of them was conveyed to the infirmary, but the others went home. The stoker was very much cut and scalded, but escaped, with his right arm broken in two or three places

The accident must have arisen from one or other of the following mis takes: either the signals were imperfectly given at the Defford station, to indicate that an obstruction had to be guarded against, or that given to the men at all; or that the engine driver fell a sacrifice to his own recklessness in pushing on in spite of the warning

James Hurd, the man who acted as fireman to the unfortunate Ward, makes the following statement :—We left Gloucester at nine o'clock on Saturday night with the luggage train. When we got to Ilerden the pump s of the engine got bad, and, by our attending to them, we were delayed very much; but by the time we got to Eggington the pumps were working pretty well, and Ward said he would push on and get the fire filled up. I then com menced filling up the fire, and he assisted me by opening and shutting the fire door as I put in the coke. I am not exactly sure whether it was at the bridge at Defford, or when crossing the Avon, that Ward said to me, "Jamie, there's something wrong" and speaking to the guard on the other side. On observing this I began to reverse the engine, and what I did no more than I was thrown off it. As I was falling I felt something strike my shoul der; it was very dark at the time, and I regarded again to see what it was, but by the pouring of water over me. On looking up I saw engines and carriages heaped upon each other, and some of them on fire. I asked the person who assisted me if he could tell me anything of Ward. He said, "Stranger, we will take you to the station, you are not fit to enquire after your friends" Hurd attributes the accident to imperfect signalling at Defford

It appears from a subsequent account that William Mills, a carpenter em ployed by some of the contractors, who was in the down train, was so dread fully scalded that his death took place early on Monday morning; another person named Miles, also in the down train, was severely scalded and bruised. Gloucester Infirmary, a fourth lies very ill at Pershore; and others are more or less injured. An inquest was held on Tuesday morning before Mr. James Best, in the village of Defford. Parties were present who were represented by Mr. Wheatley, their solicitor, Mr Saunders, their secretary, Mr Swaine, Mr. M'Connell, and Mr. Faine. Genera. Pasley, the Government inspector, was also present.

The inspector at the station, the porter, and the guard of the luggage train, were all examined; but it was resolved to postpone the inquiry till the 15th instant, Mr Crawford, the foreman of the locomotive department at the Gloucester, having announced on his arrival during the afternoon that Hurd, the stoker, would not be in a fit state to be examined till about that time.

The evidence given confirmed the details we have given above.

Ward, the unfortunate engine driver, was reckoned one of the best hands on the line. He had been a considerable time in the employment of the company, although intervals had occurred during his engagements. This line is once more in good working order.

A WOMAN EMPLOYED TO BREAK STONES IN OXFORDSHIRE.—Maria Oliver, of Stonesfield, Oxon, a young female, has been for some days at late working on the public highways for the surveyors of that parish. Her pay is sixpence a day. The poor creature's employment is stone-breaking : Edward Oliver, her brother, a lad, has been similarly employed, and at the same wages. It appears that their mother is a widow, with a family, and they have been chargeable to the parish as inmates of the Woodstock Union poorhouse.

SUICIDE OF A LADY AT BRAINTREE HEATH.—On Friday morning week, the body of Miss Sarah Trott, aged about fifty years, was discovered hang ing by a silk handkerchief, in a stable, upon Mr. Trott's premises, at Brain tree, Essex. The deceased was a respectable inhabitant of the town of Rom ford, connected with her two sisters in a scholastic establishment, which they have conducted for many years. She had been very unwell for a length of time, but about a week back left her home upon a visit to her brother, at Braintree Heath, for the benefit of her health. An inquest was held upon the body on Saturday afternoon, before C. C. Lewis, Esq., at the Travellers' Inn, Braintree Heath. The jury returned a verdict, "That the deceased destroyed herself, being at the time labouring under insanity."

POISONING BY FUNGI AT NORWICH. A poor man named Walker, and his wife, Denmark-lane, Norwich, have during the last week been poisoned by eating fungi instead of mushrooms The man had been after work into the country, and, on his return, brought with him, as he thought, some mushrooms. They stewed and ate them for supper, and on the following morning were very ill. Mr. Firth, the surgeon, being sent for, found that the disease had been occasioned by eating fungi. The poor woman died on Friday last, but the husband was at that time so bad that scarcely a hope of life could be entertained; but on Sunday he was still living, and some hopes are now entertained of his restoration.

THE ANDOVER UNION.—An inquiry has been proceeding for some days before Mr. Parker, an Assistant Poor-Law Commis-ioner, with a view to elicit, the mode in which paupers are treated in this union, and also to ascertain the truth or falsehood of certain allegations against the master. Notwithstanding the time already employed, there seems little prospect of the inquiry approaching its termination; and, from the rambling and dis connected manner in which it proceeds, it is very difficult to make out the purport of the evidence extracted from the witnesses. The proceedings hitherto have not been of much interest, nor has anything transpired to materially affect the master of the workhouse, so far as the bear ing of the disconnected evidence could be understood. The principal witness examined was a woman named Hannah Mason, who was known in the union as "the devil," from her harsh conduct to the pau pers in the sick ward, where she was nurse. There appears to have been as yet no inquiry into the practice of bone-crushing, which brought this union into notice, and was the cause of the investigation.

CONFLAGRATION NEAR WINCHESTER.—On Saturday (last week) a fire, which has consumed several dwellings, and deprived seven respectable families of their homes, occurred at a village called Micheldever, seven miles from Winchester, on the Basingstoke-road, and within two miles of the mansion of S.r Thomas Baring, Bart, Stratton Park. The fire originated in the falling of sparks from the flue of an oven belonging to the bake house of Mr. Groom, baker, who, at the time, was raking the wood embers. Pieces of these fell upon the thatch of an adjoining cart house, which in stantly burned, and the fire communicating itself to the long line of con tinuous thatch, the whole was speedily in a blaze. Very soon after the outbreak of the fire, information of the occurrence was sent to the seat of Sir Francis Baring, and the Hon. Francis Baring immediately repaired to the scene, having given orders that the engines belonging to the mansion should be promptly conveyed to the spot, with twenty-two men employed from the demesne, who were despatched with them to work them. Mean time, while these arrangements were effected, the flames progressed fear fully. The fire continued to burn until every particle of furniture and stock was destroyed, the houses being gutted, and several valuable pigs, poultry, and domestic animals sacrificed. The loss will be most severely felt, as none of the occupiers are insured. The owner of the houses, Sir Francis Baring, is insured in one of the county offices.

ACCIDENTS ON THE LANCASTER AND CARLISLE RAILWAY.—On Wednes day week, a dreadful accident occurred on the Lancaster and Carlisle Rail way line, at the cutting through a large hill upon the Shap Fell, Westmore land. A portion of the rock had been charged with gunpowder, for the pur pose of blasting, when, from some cause or other, the charge would not explode, and two of the workmen returned to it and commenced drilling the stone, to force out the powder. One of the men had unfortunately neg lected to pour into the hole a sufficient quantity of water to keep the stone moist, and the consequence was that the jumper became heated from the friction, and ignited the powder. One of the poor fellows was blown into the air a height of thirty or forty feet, and came down upon a heap of stones, after which he rolled into a gullet twelve feet in depth; and the other, by the force of the blast, was driven to a considerable distance. The unfortunate men did not exhibit any signs of life until medical assistance was obtained, when they partly revived. The injuries, however, are of such a description as to leave but little hope of the possibility of their recovery. On the same day, another labourer upon this line, called William Magee, was killed close to Shap, within four miles of the other accident, by the falling of a large crane upon him. The back part of his head was much bruised, and his right cheek bruised, and his right leg broken, besides being severely crushed on other parts of the right side.

WAREHOUSE ROBBERY AT MANCHESTER.—Yesterday week a daring rob bery was committed on the premises of Messrs. Henry Whittaker and Sons, cotton spinners and manufacturers, of Hurst, a village about two miles from Ashton-under-Lyne, and who also occupy a warehouse in Portland-street, Manchester. The men were at work on Friday night till nine o'clock, when the whole of the premises were locked and made secure; and on the follow ing morning, about ten o'clock, the robbery was discovered. The firm al ways collect their accounts on the last Friday in the month, and this being the time chosen for the robbery leads to the conviction that the thieves were aware of this fact. The cashier, before leaving the warehouse on Friday night, locked up all his drawers and iron safe, in which he deposited £4778 18s. 9d. in cheques and cash, but fortunately of the latter only £3179 4s. 6d. was there, the remainder having been taken away by him, and also opened the safe and drawers by the same means; and having extracted cash only, locked them up again and left them as secure as they found them, but with the valuable contents. There was a large quantity of moveable property in the place, some of it very valuable, but not a single shilling's worth was removed. The locks were not in the least degree injured, and the doors were opened by the men in the morning without difficulty; and it was not until the cashier went to his safe that the robbery was discovered. Informa tion was given to the police, but no trace of the thieves has yet been ob tained. Between eight and ten o'clock on Saturday night, the whole of the cheques, amounting to £4302 7s. 3d. were put into the post office at the receiving-house in Great Ancoats-street, and of course are now in the pos session of the police.

THE WEATHER.—During the last few days the weather has been less warm and bright than previously, while the wind on each day, between mi dnight and morn particularly, has been boisterous. On Tuesday the wind was northerly, very cloudy, and but little sunshine, with the barometer and thermometer falling On Wednesday it was very cloudy and the sun not more than occasionally visible, with the barometer declining to " change," and the thermometer at no time having a greater elevation than 62 degrees. Thursday was rather dull.

SUMMARY OF RAILWAY FACTS.—The Journal des Chemins de Fer states that the amount of the Paris and Strasburg and the Tours and Nantes Railroads will be adjudicated in the month of October. The administrators of the Northern Railway Company, presided over by Admiral Rosamel, have sent instructions to their agents in Belgium for the commencement of the road to Lyons, under the name of Company of the South. —A project has been talked about for forming a line of railway from Alexandria to Suez.

The Lyons Railroad was opened unsolemnly, as Paris and Rouen, and on the 26th ult. It was to be opened to the public on the 1st of September. —— Another line of railway has been projected in the West Riding of Yorkshire. It is to be named the Midland and Trent Junction Railway.——In the late session of Parliament acts were obtained for constructing 3,650 miles of new railway, viz.—Great Britain, 2030 miles; Ireland, 580 miles; total, 3650 miles. The capital authorised to be raised for the cost of these works is, for Great Britain, £31,680,000—or £15,600 per mile; Ireland, £6,320 000—or £15,200 per mile; total, £39,480,000, and the estimated yearly revenue to be derived from the full operation of the undertakings is, on the average, 8½ per cent., or £3,000,000 per annum. The present extent of all the railways of the British Islands is about 3000 miles, and they have cost, on the average, nine or ten thousand pounds sterling per mile.——The first formal ceremony in the construction of the Huddersfield and Sheffield Railway took place yesterday week at Penistone, where the first sod was cut by Lord Wharncliffe.——Two acts authorising railways last month, simultaneously, at Paris and Rouen, sels, on tenders for furnishing iron rail—in France for the northern railway, and in Belgium for different sections of the state railway—presented a remarkable contrast of the prices of the undertakings To the average, however was, that the cost of iron rail in France is 2½ per cent. above the cost of the same article in Belgium.——It appears from an official return of the railway mileage produced last session, that the total expenditure on railways up to and the money empowered to be borrowed, £18,678,038. —According to the Journal des Chemins de Fer, within two months of its inauguration the North ern line will be opened to Amiens, and the entire line to Lille and Valen ciennes will be completed before the 31st of February.——At the last Meeting of the line between Rouen and Havre will be opened on the 1st of May.——

Laying first stone for the elevation of the viaduct at Maintenon, for the Paris and Rennes line, was laid on Sunday, by baron de Jessaint, Prefect of the Eure-et-Loire, with all the usual ceremonies.

A WOMAN EMPLOYED TO BREAK STONES IN OXFORDSHIRE.—Maria Oliver, of Stonesfield, Oxon, a young female, has been for some days at late working on the public highways for the surveyors of that parish. Her pay is sixpence a day. The poor creature's employment is stone-breaking : Edward Oliver, her brother, a lad, has been similarly employed, and at the same wages. It appears that their mother is a widow, with a family, and they have been chargeable to the parish as inmates of the Woodstock Union poorhouse.

SUICIDE OF A LADY AT BRAINTREE HEATH.—On Friday morning week, the body of Miss Sarah Trott, aged about fifty years, was discovered hang ing by a silk handkerchief, in a stable, upon Mr. Trott's premises, at Brain tree, Essex. The deceased was a respectable inhabitant of the town of Rom ford, connected with her two sisters in a scholastic establishment, which they have conducted for many years. She had been very unwell for a length of time, but about a week back left her home upon a visit to her brother, at Braintree Heath, for the benefit of her health. An inquest was held upon the body on Saturday afternoon, before C. C. Lewis, Esq., at the Travellers' Inn, Braintree Heath. The jury returned a verdict, "That the deceased destroyed herself, being at the time labouring under insanity."

POISONING BY FUNGI AT NORWICH. A poor man named Walker, and his wife, Denmark-lane, Norwich, have during the last week been poisoned by eating fungi instead of mushrooms The man had been after work into the country, and, on his return, brought with him, as he thought, some mushrooms. They stewed and ate them for supper, and on the following morning were very ill. Mr. Firth, the surgeon, being sent for, found that the disease had been occasioned by eating fungi. The poor woman died on Friday last, but the husband was at that time so bad that scarcely a hope of life could be entertained; but on Sunday he was still living, and some hopes are now entertained of his restoration.

THE ANDOVER UNION.—An inquiry has been proceeding for some days before Mr. Parker, an Assistant Poor-Law Commis-ioner, with a view to elicit, the mode in which paupers are treated in this union, and also to ascertain the truth or falsehood of certain allegations against the master. Notwithstanding the time already employed, there seems little prospect of the inquiry approaching its termination; and, from the rambling and dis connected manner in which it proceeds, it is very difficult to make out the purport of the evidence extracted from the witnesses. The proceedings hitherto have not been of much interest, nor has anything transpired to materially affect the master of the workhouse, so far as the bear ing of the disconnected evidence could be understood. The principal witness examined was a woman named Hannah Mason, who was known in the union as "the devil," from her harsh conduct to the pau pers in the sick ward, where she was nurse. There appears to have been as yet no inquiry into the practice of bone-crushing, which brought this union into notice, and was the cause of the investigation.

CONFLAGRATION NEAR WINCHESTER.—On Saturday (last week) a fire, which has consumed several dwellings, and deprived seven respectable families of their homes, occurred at a village called Micheldever, seven miles from Winchester, on the Basingstoke-road, and within two miles of the mansion of S.r Thomas Baring, Bart, Stratton Park. The fire originated in the falling of sparks from the flue of an oven belonging to the bake house of Mr. Groom, baker, who, at the time, was raking the wood embers. Pieces of these fell upon the thatch of an adjoining cart house, which in stantly burned, and the fire communicating itself to the long line of con tinuous thatch, the whole was speedily in a blaze. Very soon after the outbreak of the fire, information of the occurrence was sent to the seat of Sir Francis Baring, and the Hon. Francis Baring immediately repaired to the scene, having given orders that the engines belonging to the mansion should be promptly conveyed to the spot, with twenty-two men employed from the demesne, who were despatched with them to work them. Mean time, while these arrangements were effected, the flames progressed fear fully. The fire continued to burn until every particle of furniture and stock was destroyed, the houses being gutted, and several valuable pigs, poultry, and domestic animals sacrificed. The loss will be most severely felt, as none of the occupiers are insured. The owner of the houses, Sir Francis Baring, is insured in one of the county offices.

ACCIDENTS ON THE LANCASTER AND CARLISLE RAILWAY.—On Wednes day week, a dreadful accident occurred on the Lancaster and Carlisle Rail way line, at the cutting through a large hill upon the Shap Fell, Westmore land. A portion of the rock had been charged with gunpowder, for the pur pose of blasting, when, from some cause or other, the charge would not explode, and two of the workmen returned to it and commenced drilling the stone, to force out the powder. One of the men had unfortunately neg lected to pour into the hole a sufficient quantity of water to keep the stone moist, and the consequence was that the jumper became heated from the friction, and ignited the powder. One of the poor fellows was blown into the air a height of thirty or forty feet, and came down upon a heap of stones, after which he rolled into a gullet twelve feet in depth; and the other, by the force of the blast, was driven to a considerable distance. The unfortunate men did not exhibit any signs of life until medical assistance was obtained, when they partly revived. The injuries, however, are of such a description as to leave but little hope of the possibility of their recovery. On the same day, another labourer upon this line, called William Magee, was killed close to Shap, within four miles of the other accident, by the falling of a large crane upon him. The back part of his head was much bruised, and his right cheek bruised, and his right leg broken, besides being severely crushed on other parts of the right side.

WAREHOUSE ROBBERY AT MANCHESTER.—Yesterday week a daring rob bery was committed on the premises of Messrs. Henry Whittaker and Sons, cotton spinners and manufacturers, of Hurst, a village about two miles from Ashton-under-Lyne, and who also occupy a warehouse in Portland-street, Manchester. The men were at work on Friday night till nine o'clock, when the whole of the premises were locked and made secure; and on the follow ing morning, about ten o'clock, the robbery was discovered. The firm al ways collect their accounts on the last Friday in the month, and this being the time chosen for the robbery leads to the conviction that the thieves were aware of this fact. The cashier, before leaving the warehouse on Friday night, locked up all his drawers and iron safe, in which he deposited £4778 18s. 9d. in cheques and cash, but fortunately of the latter only £3179 4s. 6d. was there, the remainder having been taken away by him, and also opened the safe and drawers by the same means; and having extracted cash only, locked them up again and left them as secure as they found them, but with the valuable contents. There was a large quantity of moveable property in the place, some of it very valuable, but not a single shilling's worth was removed. The locks were not in the least degree injured, and the doors were opened by the men in the morning without difficulty; and it was not until the cashier went to his safe that the robbery was discovered. Informa tion was given to the police, but no trace of the thieves has yet been ob tained. Between eight and ten o'clock on Saturday night, the whole of the cheques, amounting to £4302 7s. 3d. were put into the post office at the receiving-house in Great Ancoats-street, and of course are now in the pos session of the police.

THE WEATHER.—During the last few days the weather has been less warm and bright than previously, while the wind on each day, between mi dnight and morn particularly, has been boisterous. On Tuesday the wind was northerly, very cloudy, and but little sunshine, with the barometer and thermometer falling On Wednesday it was very cloudy and the sun not more than occasionally visible, with the barometer declining to " change," and the thermometer at no time having a greater elevation than 62 degrees. Thursday was rather dull.

SUMMARY OF RAILWAY FACTS.—The Journal des Chemins de Fer states that the amount of the Paris and Strasburg and the Tours and Nantes Railroads will be adjudicated in the month of October. The administrators of the Northern Railway Company, presided over by Admiral Rosamel, have sent instructions to their agents in Belgium for the commencement of the road to Lyons, under the name of Company of the South. —A project has been talked about for forming a line of railway from Alexandria to Suez.

The Lyons Railroad was opened unsolemnly, as Paris and Rouen, and on the 26th ult. It was to be opened to the public on the 1st of September. —— Another line of railway has been projected in the West Riding of Yorkshire. FOUNTAIN OF ELISE, AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.

AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.

Although the town of Aix-la-Chapelle owes its eminence to Charlemagne, it was known to the Romans: the warm springs were a sufficient inducement to fix that bath-loving people on the spot, and remains of their baths are constantly found in digging.

The Mineral Springs of Aix rise in the centre of the town: they are of two classes—strong and hot, and weak and cool; the first class, of 143° Fahrenheit, containing a larger quantity of sulphur than any other known in Europe. From this class is supplied the Fountain of Elise, a very handsome edifice, with a colonnade; serving or a pump-room and a café. The guests, or visitors, repair hither early in the morning to drink the water, which, though conducted in pipes direct from the Emperor's Spring, retains a temperature of 49° Réaumur. A band of music plays at the spot until the middle of September, which is considered the end of the season; and breakfasts and dinners are provided in the apartments during the spring. The building is named after the Queen of Prussia. Our Engraving was sketched during the recent Royal visit.

HER MAJESTY'S VISIT TO GERMANY.

Coburg, August 23.

One of the places visited by her Majesty during her stay here, was the Citadel, or "Festung," the old castle of the Dukes of Coburg, which seems to have been used for many purposes—a fortress, a hunting seat, and a prison. As a fortress, its day is gone, for the walls are old and weak, and there are no cannon; other and pleasanter hunting-seats have been built for the pleasure of the Sovereign; as a prison, it is still appropriated. It is a place, however, of considerable interest, and is always visited. To-day has been a very busy one for the warders, in consequence of the influx of people into Coburg from the surrounding districts.

Supposing it possessed no historical interest whatever, the admirer of beautiful landscapes will be delighted by the view from the walls, which is one of the most extensive and diversified in Europe. It reaches to the mountains of Bohemia, and the nearer hills of Thuringia; the country is either a richly cultivated plain, or hills clothed with "forestrie," or tracts that partake of the nature of both; the roads that stretch far and wide can be traced by the lines of trees planted along them; pleasant villages and hamlets appear at intervals, giving life to the scene; beneath, at the very foot of the mountain, lies the town of Coburg; and beyond, the Castle of Kalenberg. It is a "fair land," and the old Saxon Wittiken, who is painted in the Hall as the founder of the line of Coburg—he being the very root of the genealogical tree—must have had good taste, as well as a military eye, when he chose for his seat the strongest as well as most beautiful situation in his dominions.

Within the walls, there was rather more life than usual; numbers of the peasantry were standing about, or, availing themselves of the accommodation of the unfailing pendant of a garrison—a beer-house—were busy with glass and bottle, under the shade of an old tree, beneath which Luther may have sat, with a heartiness that would have delighted the heart of the old Reformer, whose religious fervour had not the slightest tinge of social asceticism. The sky is almost Italian, the air so soft and balmy, that it is difficult to believe it is not a more southern clime; and the reluctant summer seems to be here overtaken at last.

SKETCHED FROM COBURG.

SKETCHED FROM COBURG.

The interior of the Fortress has been renovated, and the chambers have an air of freshness hardly to be expected from the crumbling and decayed state of the exterior. The first hall, however, is rude enough; frameless portraits, in the style of the last century, of no great merit, are hung round the walls, in a neglected condition, reminding one of the lumber room of a family mansion, to which the effigies of forgotten grandsires have been banished, to be out of the way. A full-length of Maria Theresa, Empress of Austria, and a half-length of Frederick the Great, are all that possess any interest. From this gallery, the suites of rooms open, and they are finished and complete specimens of the style of the time in which they were built: the renovation has not been change. The floors are exquisitely inlaid, and as polished as mirrors; the walls are wainscot, of different woods, so beautifully worked as to cause regret that the style has been completely banished among ourselves. The most curious room is the "Horn-zimmer," or Horn Chamber; the most interesting, the apartment of Luther, who here found an asylum, while engaged in his struggle with the Catholic Church. The Horn Chamber is a trophy of the intense love of the chase, which distinguished the nobles of the Middle Ages in all countries; is one elaborate hunting-piece, every panel of the chamber is a representation of some scene of the "shadow of glory, dim image of war;" they are executed in a kind of marqueterie or inlaid work, of different woods, with the assistance of colour on the surface. They exhibit a contempt of perspective perfectly Chinese, but some of the outlines have a breadth and rude vigour very remarkable, considering the difficulties presented by the material. The starting of the game, the halt in the woods, and the meal in the open air, the death of the stag, the bearing home, the flaying, even the cooking of the venison, with formidable spits, and a most cheering number of cooks—all are there. One scene is a perfect picture of the modern battue, with its beaters and wholesale slaughter. There is not one event of the chase omitted; and the artist, if not a hunter himself, must have been directed by some Nimrod of his age—probably, the Duke himself; for skill in the woodland craft seems an hereditary quality in the line of Coburg. Great must have been the solace of this chamber on the days when no hunting was to be had; in the pictured scenes, the reality might be lived over again. There are some carvings, all of the same subject, that are in a much better style.

Another room contains a series of full-length portraits of Tilly, Gustavus, Adolphus, Duke Bernhard of Saxe Weimar, Wallenstein, and the Emperor, Charles V. They are all modern, but in imitation of the old style, and were painted by Schneider; the best, as a painting, is the portrait of Tilly—the most characteristic, that of Duke Bernhard; the head of Wallenstein is disappointing—it has a high, intellectual brow but the expression of the face is that of cunning, rather than the nobleness we attribute to Schiller's hero; it is, no doubt, a copy of an old likeness, and we have no right to expect a realization of all the idealities of the dramatist and the poet.

Two apartments are shown as those occupied by Luther; they look into the interior of the Castle. His sitting-room is elaborately ornamented with painting and gilding—rather too much so for the associations connected with the scene and the name; it might have been kept venerable, but has been made fine. On one side of the door is a portrait, on a panel, of the great Reformer, in a black robe, with the Bible in his hand; the countenance is very expressive. On the other side of the door is that of Catherina von Born, his wife, in a nun-like dress; her face is beautiful, but bears the trace of deep melancholy. Around the room are portraits of the champions of Protestantism—Melancthon, and the rest "who called Luther friend;" they are all in the same style—black on a ground of gold; a copy of an old painting of the Confession of Augsburg completes the decoration of the room. All is bright and polished, as if the finishing touch of the artist had been given yesterday, and it immediately occurs to the mind that it was not thus when the courageous churchman dwelt there; but respect for his memory has prompted the labour, and it is far better than indifference or neglect. The room in which Luther slept is preserved more in its integrity; the hand of the gilder has not intruded here, and several relics of his residence are still existing. His bedstead, broken and decayed, a few boards once belonging to it, and some fragments of a chair stand in the same position they occupied three centuries ago, when the stout frame of the overthrower of an ancient faith sank upon them exhausted by mental labour. The zeal of the Pilgrims to this shrine has been sadly destructive of the objects venerated; the posts of the bed are cut and hacked to half their original size, and the process is still going on; the German guides are even less respectful than the visitors, and have no scruple whatever in slicing off a piece as coolly as they would chop a billet of fire-wood. There is an ordinary stove in the room, and a bust of Luther stands on a table; but the whole apartment is much in the same state as when he left it. (See the Engraving at page 249.)

THE THEATRE, COBURG.

In the room mentioned above as containing the portraits of Tilly and other great Commanders, is a remarkable collection of drinking cups—more in keeping with an old hunting seat, than the relics of a theological controversialist. They are of all sizes, and many shapes—narrow topped and broad-bottomed, and the reverse; thick, burly, honest-looking vessels, fitted for the mouth and hand only of capacious drinkers; as Homer describes the stone cast by Ajax, by stating the impossibility of his own degenerate race to lift it, so the mighty cups of our ancestors, which we should fruitlessly essay to drain, prove what must have been our progenitors' powers of imbibition. If they were not "exquisite in their drinking," they were copious, and withal devout; many of these cups bear round them figures of the Apostles, and of scenes from Scripture; they would appear to us much out of place on a modern decanter; the Crucifixion on a claret-jug would partake of the profane, but it was not so of old; Scripture was the great source from whence artists drew their subjects, and to the present day a taste not dissimilar lingers among the lower ranks of German society. Some of these flagons could never have been made to drink from, for they are almost too heavy to lift. From some such vessel Yorick must have poured the "Rhenish" on the head of the gravedigger, "a pestilence on him for a mad rogue;" others are more portable—but good honest quarts are the lowest measures. Some have ancient golden coins let into their sides, others are carved and painted with most "delicate monsters;" all speak forcibly of many a goodly revel past. But they have not been filled for many a year; their pewter covers open with a sort of sigh from the void, and flap down again with the clamour of hollowness, leaving a faint smell—the mere shadow of a perfume—of spiced wines and fluids, of which we have forgotten the compounds. The semel imbuta dwells with them still, and there is a certain social piety in the wish that rises to see them replenished and circling the board once more; but that board must not be mahogany, and they would scorn the frail companionship of glass; the only tap worthy of them would be the Great Tun of Heidelberg, and the occasion nothing less than a revived hunting feast of old Duke Cassimer.

The Armoury is a small but interesting collection; it contains complete suits of mail for the knightly chief, and the corselet and jack of the vassal, cross-bows and bolts in great profusion, lances and spurs, and swords and daggers, in all the varieties of nicely calculated destructiveness. Among them is the sword of justice, or the beheading instrument of the state—a two-handed, short, broad and pointless blade—which is said to have decapitated a hundred criminals, and thus has won its retirement—a new sword being required after that number. It is dull and blunt now, but the steel is good, and capable of bearing a keen edge; it is balanced, so as in a skilled hand to deal a terrific stroke; it is embossed with devout emblems, and a skull and cross-bones.

In a dim-lighted room, under the part of the Castle used as the prison, are more relics of olden grandeur; they are the state carriages used by Duke Cassimer—who died during the Thirty Years' War—on the occasions of his first and second espousals. They are very primitive in form, but rich in decoration; carving and gilding have not been spared, and, as they are remarkably well preserved, they are interesting specimens of what a little in the way of comfort could at that time be compensated by a good deal of splendour. The same apartment contains a collection of sledges for the use of the Court—some of them as old as the coaches, others still in service; they are very fanciful in design, terminating in various figures, some of which appear chosen on the principle of contrarieties; one bears a figure of Summer—when they are never used; another a personation of Neptune—where the ocean was never seen. Above these royal properties are lodged the prisoners, fortunately not numerous, nor guilty of very aggravated crimes. They are employed in different trades; the "hard labour" is the occupation of rasping wood. The barred windows look into a garden, somewhat neglected, but still green and pleasant to the eye, through which strangers are continually walking. Is this a solace to them, or an aggravation of their punishment?

LUTHER'S BED-ROOM, IN THE CITADEL OF COBURG.

COBURG, August 26.

The visit of her Majesty to the Court of Coburg approaches its termination; to-morrow all are again on the wing for Gotha: a stay of five days there concludes the tour, and then the route will be homeward, with all possible speed, through Fuhlda, Frankfort, &c.

The last few hours of the sojourn here have brightened up into more gaiety than has been visible for the last few days; the whole Court were last night at the Theatre; to-day is the birthday of Prince Albert, and there is a rural festival at Rosenau; the authorities of the town pay their compliments to the Prince; and the day is to be wound up with two balls—one at the Residence (Rosenau), and the other for the worthy citizens, in a saloon just outside the gates of this miniature city.

The "Duke's servants"—for here the Theatre is in the same state as with us, when it produced a Shakspeare, the actors being as completely the employés of the State as the army—performed last night a comedy; it was the "Zopf und Schwert," of Karl Gutzkow. The scene of it is laid in the Court of Prussia, in the reign of Frederick William, the father of Frederick the Great; and the title of the piece indicates the two ruling influences of the period—the "sword," and the intrigues of the "pigtail" diplomacy of the time. Both are exhibited in action crossing each other, with the usual mingling of love, as opposed to policy, to add to the perplexities of the plot, all becoming merry as a marriage-bell at last. The company play better in the sock than the buskin, and the piece was a humanly put on the stage; there was elegance and finish in all the arrangements, to a degree rarely seen where theatrical management is a commercial speculation. Fredric William—his brutalities considerably softened down—was admirably played by a Herr Dobbelin; his stubborn will, military abruptness, and unkingly parsimony, were all well brought out, and coloured with a humour which his Majesty may or may not have possessed, but which the actor, at all events, lent to the character. The Princess Wilhelmine (Mdlle. Mügge) was lady-like and dignified; nothing less could have been tolerated in the presence of so many princely critics. The best scene in the piece, however, was a representation of one of the Royal evenings at Berlin, when King, Council, and Courtiers were in the habit of smoking and drinking together on terms of equality, in the style of "old Sir Simon" of ancient memory. The Monarch and his suite had each a veritable "clay," and the mugs were undeniably of the tap-room; it was characteristic, though kept far below the vulgarity and riot of the Royal réunions, as they are described in the memoirs of the time; and the author has contrived to give it a deeper interest, by a touch of feeling and sentiment thrown in at the close, which was highly effective.

Her Majesty was in excellent spirits, and laughed heartily at the "points"—for her knowledge of the language is perfect. At the fall of the curtain, "God save the Queen" was played by the orchestra and sung by the audience, with two additional verses, the product of some Coburg muse, as a "farewell greeting" (Abschiedsgruss) from all. This is not the only ebullition of poetry apropos of the Royal visit—odes and verses of elaborate rhyme hailed the arrival: like most productions of the kind, they have not strength enough to bear translation, and are, moreover, local in their allusions. There are better things in Uhland and Schiller—as the reader will readily believe. But the verses of the farewell song, sung last night by the whole audience, are brief and pleasing enough to be given in the original:—

Der letzte Ton verhallt—
Sie schwand zu rasch, zu bald
Das süsse Ziel.
Beglücken sind beglückt
Sah'n wir Dich, hochentzückt
Und nun—dem Auge entrückt
Weist Du bald weh.

Entrückt dem Augenstern,
Bleibst Du stets wenn auch fern
Den Herzen nah.
Der Wehmuth Zähre rollt,
Die aber strahle hold
Des Glückes Sonnengold,
VICTORIA!

It would be unpardonable to quit Coburg, without noticing one of the Lions of the place—which happens to be a collection of wild boars, kept by the Duke, in a pine forest, about two miles from Rosenau. All the Princes of Coburg have been mighty hunters; leisure and plenty of forest land tended to develop the taste. The late Duke was a first-rate shot, and the present Prince inherits his skill. THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 6, 1845.

It is always a source of pleasure to the members of a community so essentially mercantile as the great majority of the population of Great Britain is, to find the light of a liberal commercial policy extending, and making, if not rapid, at least steady, progress throughout the various nations into which civilised mankind is divided. But that feeling of honest pleasure and generous satisfaction, which the advance of enlightenment thus affords, is greatly enhanced, when the light of the true principles of commerce is found penetrating into those countries where, previously, th utmost darkness and most perverse ignorance, as far as relates to this subject, prevailed—where the smuggler, when the Government imposed absurdly high and restrictive duties on the import of foreign goods, stepped in, and corrected the abuse; where, in consequence, the fair trader and the honest dealer were condemned to poverty, and, but too often, to complete ruin; and the contrabandist alone prospered, while the interest of the consumer, badly understood, as the best, was totally disregarded on all sides. A gratification such as we refer to has been lately presented to us by an announcement which has recently appeared in the French papers, that the Government of his Holiness the Pope has modified the Roman tariff, and consented to admit into the ports of the Papal States manufactured goods, at a much lower rate of duty than that which has hitherto existed. Some of the articles, and the rates of duty at which they are to be in future admitted, are—cloths and woollen fabrics, other than the coarse articles manufactured in the country, twenty-five Roman crowns, instead of sixty, the former duty; mixed fabrics, of silk and cotton, &c., fifty, instead of one hundred Roman crowns; cotton velvets, forty-three, instead of sixty-five Roman crowns. There are, also, similar reductions on such articles as coffee, sugar, &c. &c.

One of the causes assigned by our foreign cotemporaries for this change of policy on the part of a State which, in every sense of the word, is the most Conservative in the south of Europe—since it conserves unchanged, not only its ancient institutions, but the long-established abuses of them also, as the age had rendered even them too venerable to be touched by the hand of the innovator and reformer of modern times—is the fact of the mirred Statesmen of "The Eternal City" having had their eyes opened to the folly of their ways by finding their treasury empty. Their Eminences have, it is said, at last found out that all the profits, be they great or small, which the trade of the Romagna yielded, found their way into the pockets of those profane gentry—the contrabandistas—alone, and that the customs revenue of the Pontifical States was represented by the word nil; and forthwith they set about righting matters which had so long gone wrong. At all events, whatever the motive be which has led to this incipient reform, we hail the fact as a good omen of what the future may bring forth for Italy; and, without any irreverence towards his Holiness, we may, on the occasion of it, say to him, in the ancient language of his own fair land, macte virtute.

The great number and variety of accidents which have recently occurred on several railways, both in England and Scotland, not only call for public animadversion, but also for the adoption, by the Legislature, of some effective means to put a stop to the carelessness which seems to prevail in the management of, we regret to be obliged to say, a very great many lines. One of the first measures which Parliament, in the next session, should immediately direct its attention to, is one the object of which should be to visit with heavy penalties all those parties engaged in the management of railways who, by their culpable negligence, or culpable carelessness, whether the accident consequent on such remissness were trifling or not. One of the most alarming of those accidents which it has been the painful duty of the journalist recently to record, occurred on the Edinburgh and Glasgow line; and, but that the train was at the time providentially near to a station, it would, in all probability, have been attended with the most disastrous results. When the up Glasgow mail train was about a mile from the Castlecarey Station, a cattle-box, filled with household furniture, and a luggage van, both of which were between the engine and the passenger-carriages, were discovered to be on fire; and, though the engineer was hailed by the passengers and the guard to stop, he, either not choosing to heed, or not observing the signals made to him, proceeded on to the station, where the fire was quickly extinguished; not, however, before the first van, with the furniture it contained, was consumed, the loss amounting, it was supposed, to about £200. The accident occurred in consequence of the grazing of the fire-box of the engine being so defective as to admit of large ignited coals being blown from it to the luggage-van, which was contiguous.

Fortunately, no person was hurt, with the exception of one passenger, who in his alarm leaped out of the carriage in which he sat, and was very much bruised about the face. The evil in this instance arose from a very slight cause, and could have been obviated by the most ordinary attention. It seems the act rather of insane than of rational men to place an uncovered van, which this is said to have been, containing feather beds, next to the engine—and that, too, an engine with a defective fire-box.

It is certainly due to the safety of the public, now that railroads are becoming almost the sole means of transit in this country, that the Government should interfere to insure better management than at present exists on many lines.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

The Queen Dowagerr.—Her Majesty the Queen Dowager will leave Bushy Park for Witley Court on the 16th instant. It is expected that her Majesty's illustrious relatives the Duchess Ida of Saxe Weimar, with the Princesses Anne and Amelia, will accompany her Majesty to Witley. Earl Howe, Lord Chamberlain to her Majesty, will be in attendance on the Court at Witley.

Drayton Manor.—Sir Robert and Lady Peel are entertaining a select party at Drayton Manor, Staffordshire.

Lord Stanley.—We regret to hear that Lord Stanley is confined to his residence, Walton-on-Thames, by a very severe attack of gout.

Christening at Stafford House.—On Monday afternoon, the infant son and heir of the Marquis and Marchioness of Lorn, the Earl of Campbell, was baptized at the mansion of the Duke of Sutherland, at St. James's. The Duke and Duchess of Argyll and Lady Emma Campbell, Lady Dover, the Duchess of Sutherland, and Lord Frederick Leveson Gower and Lady Constance Leveson Gower, Lord and Lady Hamilton, and a select family party were present at the ceremony. The christening took place in the spacious picture-gallery, according to the rites of the Scottish church. The noble infant took the names of John George Edward Henry Douglas Sutherland. The Rev. Mr. Story, chaplain to the Duke of Argyll, performed the ceremony.

Marriage in High Life.—The Earl of Caledon was on Thursday married to Lady Jane Grimston, youngest daughter of the Earl and Countess of Verulam, at Gorhambury, the seat of the Earl of Verulam, in Herts.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

Assessor to the Westminster Court of Requests.—On Boroding the election for this office took place at the Court House, in Castle street. Considerable interest has for many weeks been excited in Westminster by the contest. At the close of the poll (which was by ballot), the numbers were declared to be as follows —For

Mr. Moylan	44
Le Breton	26
A'Beckett	23
Keene	20
Powell	14

City of London Registration.—Mr. Thomas James Arnold is appointed revising barrister for the London lists, and he intends to hold his Court for the purpose in the Common Plea Court, Guildhall, on Monday next.

West London Railway.—On Wednesday the half-yearly and special meeting of the proprietors of this company was held in Abchurch lane. The report stated that an act has been obtained in the last session for leasing the line to the London and Birmingham, and containing provisions for referring all differences between the several classes of share holders to Mr. G. C. Glyn (chairman of the London and Birmingham), Mr. George Hudson, and Mr. G. Stephenson. All the debts and liabilities of the company, with the exception of four or five, have been settled, and there would be a surplus upon the whole of £50,000 to be received from the Birmingham, after their payment. The number of directors would, for the future, be reduced to five. Resolutions were passed nem. dis. ratifying the lease of the West London line to the London and Birmingham Company, who will forthwith commence working the line for their merchandise and mineral traffic.

The New Houses of Parliament.—It is understood that at the commencement of the session of Parliament the House of Lords will be ready for occupation; but with respect to the House of Commons, it is not probable that it will be ready so soon. Certainly, the centre hall and other parts of the building necessary for the accommodation of the Lords will be completed, and it will be for the consideration of Parliament, next Session, whether, under the circumstances, it will be advisable to indulge in such undue speed as shall be requisite to complete them in 1847, or postpone it for another year. The Committee rooms will be completed next year.

Metropolitan Improvements.—The new line of road from the London Docks to Spitalfields Church is now nearly completed. The curbs are laid down along its whole length, and carriage and foot traffic are carried on on nearly the whole of it. The new street will be continued through to High-street, Shoreditch, where it will come out on the southern side of the terminus of the Eastern Counties Railway, but no preparations are at present made for the formation of this part of it. The estimated cost of the construction of the portion reaching from Spitalfields Church to Shoreditch, is £40,200. It is projected that the line shall be further extended from the Railway Stations, across Curtain road, Paul-street, and Tabernacle walk, into the City road, at the point where it is intersected by Old street. This plan, which would give a direct communication between the eastern and western parts of the metropolis, would also serve as a junction to the two railways running to either side of England, and, it is expected, would ease the City of the burden of a great deal of traffic towards the waterside. The amount required for the completion of the project is £112,000. The plan of improvements in this quarter also includes a street from the Commercial road to the end of Red Lion-street, in Whitechapel road.

Bartholomew Fair.—The annual saturnalia were opened on Wednesday, at one o'clock, by the Lord Mayor reading the usual proclamation for holding the fair, in Cloth Fair, to the precincts of which district it was formerly confined. The reception of the civic dignitary was anything but gratifying, he being saluted with groans, hisses, and other discordant sounds, and more solid marks of disapprobation, in the shape of rotten eggs. There was a mob of between 400 and 500 persons assembled, and the iron gates opening into Smithfield were with much difficulty closed by the police. The site of the fair presented a sorry aspect, as no more than four stalls for the sale of gingerbread were erected, which, in the course of the afternoon, were augmented to nine. With the fair still lingers the old "Pie Poudre Court," the most ancient and expeditious legislative tribunal in this country. The court is still held at the Red and not Green pie house in Cloth Fair, but, instead of, as formerly, taking cognizance of "all matters pertaining to the fair," it is now confined merely to the taking of "pence and stallage" it was established as a very early period, the term "Pied Poudre" in Norman French signifying the dusty feet of the suitors, or that justice might be obtained as easily as it was possible to step off into the dust from the fair. With the fair, established in the time of the benevolent jester, Rahere, the founder of the magnificent endowment of St. Bartholomew's Hospital, will expire this sole vestige of early and prompt justice now left in the kingdom.

Mortality in the Metropolis.—The total number of deaths registered during the week ending on Saturday, August 30, was 825, a return which exhibits a marked decrease on the previous weekly annual averages, in which the numbers stand respectively 904 and 963. The deaths from diseases of the lungs and respiratory organs present a very considerable decrease, the numbers for the week being 186, while the averages stand respectively as 229 and 292. During the same period the number of births registered was 1291, being an excess over the mortality of 456.

The Present from the East India Company to the Pacha of Egypt.—A letter from Alexandria, dated Aug. 19, 1845, says:—"The magnificent silver fountain, presented by the Hon. East India Company, has at length been placed in the possession of the Pacha, to the last instant notice was issued by Captain Lyons, the East India Company's agent, that the ceremony would take place at nine o'clock on the following day; and at the appointed hour the greater number of the officers of the foreign residents repaired to the palace. The Pacha entered the reception-room at half past nine in the morning, where upwards of sixty persons had assembled to witness the presentation; and a suitable address having been read by Captain Lyons, his Highness expressed his thanks to the East India Company for having manifested the esteem in which he was held by them in such a costly present, and for services which he was pleased to say he did not conceive he had merited. His Highness appeared in excellent spirits, and much pleased with the beauty and exquisite workmanship of the gorgeous present.

Manchester and Leeds Railway.—The half yearly meeting was held on Wednesday at Manchester. A dividend was declared of 4 per cent. upon the half-year upon the paid up capital, viz., £2 18s. on the £100 shares, £1 5s. 4d. on the £50 shares, and 5s. per share on the Quarter shares, subject to the Income Tax. The report was agreed to unanimously. At the conclusion of the half yearly meeting, a special general meeting was held, for the purpose of authorising the directors to create 100,000 shares of £20 each, to be called Fifths, and to allot of such shares to each registered proprietor (less the fractional parts of a share) a value equal to 75 per cent. of the nominal amount of the aggregate stock standing in his name on the 20th day of this present September. For the Manchester and Leeds Railway, the Ashton, Stalybridge, and Liverpool Junction Railway, and the Wakefield, Pontefract, and Goole Railways respectively, amounting to £1,309,100; also for paying off the mortgages, which amount to £686,900. And for taking and deeming upon certain arrangements for leasing the Manchester Railway Company and the Leeds and West Riding Junction Railway Company, the West Yorkshire Railway Company, the Huddersfield, Halifax, and Bradford Union Railway Company, the Huddersfield and Manchester Railway Company, and the Leeds and Bradford Railway Company, in reference to the making of new lines in the West Riding. These recommendations were authorised.

Railway Speculation.—A Birmingham paper says:—"There is at the present moment a perfect railway mania here. The Manchester and Southampton Direct line through Marlborough to Cheltenham have not yet appropriated their whole number for Parliamentary purposes, but no less than 3,000,000 shares having been applied for. For the Southampton, Oxford, and Manchester (Bethell's line) above 2,000,000 have been written for, and nearly as equal number for the Manchester, Southampton, Gosport, and Portsmouth line, Parsons's line). It is rumoured that the Committee of the Stock Exchange are about to make a resolution that all scrip transactions (excepting, of course, registered shares) shall be dealt in only for money.

A Curious Eel.—Very like a Whale.—A Glasgow paper gives the following:—As a party of gentlemen from Glasgow were out fishing for eels on Saturday, opposite Hecambridge, one of them hooked a fish of unusual magnitude, which gave him a great deal of trouble to bring to the surface of the water. This being at length achieved, he was startled by observing an unusual appearance about the head of the fish—the fine large eel, at least seven feet in length, and of proportionate thickness, and called out to his companions to come to his assistance. By their joint exertions it was hauled ashore, and the eel, as if resenting the unwelcome disturbance, appears to have sudden y revived, and insinuated its body through the sleeve of a shooting coat which one of the party had left carelessly hanging over the gunwale of the boat. In another instant, and before any effort could be made to arrest its progress, it darted overboard, coat and all, to the no small an axement of most of the party, and to the consternation of the luckless owner, who was so unceremoniously deprived of his garment. In the pocket of the coat was a small whisky flask, a yellow silk handkerchief, some railway scrip, and a promissory note, just due, besides several letters, some of a tender nature. The gentleman was at first inclined to jump into the water after this extraordinary depredator, but was withheld by his companions, who forthwith rowed ashore. A reward was immediately offered for the apprehension of the eel with the coat on, and we understand that the boatmen of Helensburgh are making several unsuccessful attempts during the day to fall in with it. In the meantime, the hat of C. K. remains in proper custody, little the worse for its immersion.

POSTSCRIPT.

HER MAJESTY'S VISIT TO GERMANY.

Gotha, Sept. 1.

Yesterday, the Queen attended Divine Service in the Church of St. Augustine here. The chapel in the palace had been previously found to be too small, and would barely accommodate her suite and the household of the Duke, the Queen, with her usual kind consideration for the public, named the parish church. It is an old and simple looking Gothic building, without any external ornament, standing near the centre of the city. It was formerly an old monastic edifice, but the greater portion has been pulled down. The interior is fitted up with three ranges of galleries one above the other; the painting and ornamental portion being somewhat gaudy and theatrical, as is the case in many of the continental churches.

Her Majesty and the Prince arrived shortly after eleven o'clock, and were conducted to the ducal pew by the clergyman. With her Majesty came the Duchess of Kent, the Duke and Duchess of Coburg, Prince Ferdinand, and several members of the Royal suite. The Lutheran service was performed, the greater portion being chaunted, and all the congregation joining. The service terminated at half-past twelve; the Queen returned to the palace in her carriage, and the Duke and Duchess of Coburg walked back on foot, without a single attendant. Her Majesty afterwards drove out to Moisdorf, one of the Duke's chateaus, about 12 miles from Gotha, thence to Ohrsdorf, a hunting lodge, of which a portion stands in the territories of the Duke of Coburg, and a portion in those of Prince Hohenloe. The Royal party afterwards visited Tehrtbansen, where dinner was prepared, and partaken of, and the Queen returned to Gotha to dinner.

In the evening the Queen and the Prince paid a private visit to the the tombs of the Dukes of Gotha, where the Prince's grandfather and great grandfather are interred. The burial place is a vault under the altar, in the centre of the public park, and is reached through long hedge rows of beech and poplar quaintly cut and trimmed. There is a very large sheet of water, well stocked with water fowl, on the southern side, and a little floating bridge carries the visitor over to the burial ground in a few minutes.

THE QUEEN'S RETURN.

The Politique of Brussels has the following :—"A courier, who has arrived at Brussels from Coburg, brings the positive intelligence that Queen Victoria and Prince Albert will proceed direct from Cologne to Antwerp, and reach the latter city on Saturday, the 6th inst. (to-day). Their Majesties the King and Queen of the Belgians, the young Princes, and all the Court, will meet the illustrious guests at Antwerp, who will be accompanied by several high personages from Germany. The Queen of England and the Prince will be entertained at a banquet in the Palace of Antwerp, by their Belgian Majesties, and will remain there for the night. Queen Victoria will sleep on board the Royal yacht the Victoria and Albert, and leave early on the morning of the 7th. The banks of the Scheldt, and the tower of Notre Dame will be brilliantly lighted up during her Britannic Majesty's embarkation, and there is some talk of a fête similar to the one which took place at Cologne. Count d'Arschot and Mr. Conway, of the Royal household, have gone to Antwerp, in order to make some arrangements with the local authorities respect ng the fêtes, the expenses of which will, it is said, be partly defrayed by the civil list."

The Gazette of last night has this official intimation :—The Right Hon. Sir James Graham, Bart., has received a dispatch from the Earl of Aberdeen, K.T., dated Gotha, the 1st of September, 1845. Her Majesty continues to enjoy perfect health. It was the intention of her Majesty to leave Gotha on the 3rd, and proceeding by Fulda and Frankfurt to reach Mayence, and thence embarking in the Fairy yacht to descend the Rhine. Her Majesty's return to the Isle of Wight may be expected in the early part of next week.

SOUTHWARK ELECTION.—The following notice has been issued by the High Bailiff :—"In pursuance of a precept received from the Sheriff of the county of Surrey, for electing a Burgess to serve in Parliament for this borough, I do hereby give notice, that I shall proceed to such election accordingly on Wednesday, the 10th day of September, at the hour of nine in the forenoon, at the Town-hall, in St. Margaret's-hill, within the said borough, when and where all persons concerned are desired to attend. WILLIAM PARSONS, High Bailiff, and Returning Officer for the Borough of Southwark. Town hall, Southwark, Sept 5, 1845."

THE LATE BENJAMIN WOOD, ESQ., M.P.—The will of the late Hon. Member for Southwark was proved on Saturday last by the executors, Gordon Whitbread, Esq., and his nephews, William Page Wood, and Western Wood, Esq.: to each of them as well as to his brother, Robert Wood, Esq., he has left a legacy of £1000. To his sister, Mrs. Dunsford, £100 a year annuities to some of his nieces, and legacies to others, and a bequest to his sister, Mrs Watkins. The residue of his personal estate, which was worn under £30,000, he bequeaths to his wife absolutely. He also gives, devises, and appoints to her all his real estates, freehold or copyhold, to her and her heirs and assigns. The will was made in March, 1844. The deceased died at his seat at Dunk Lodge, Kent, on the 19th of August last, in the 68th year of his age.

EXPERIMENTS ON THE CROYDON ATMOSPHERIC RAILWAY.—Some experiments with this new principle of railway were made yesterday and Thursday, in the presence of Mr. Wilkinson, Chairman of the Company, and several of the Directors. Mr. Samuda directed the proceedings. Five carriages were attached to the piston carriage, the aggregate weight amounting to probably thirty tons. The first experiment was from Croydon to the Dartmouth Arms, but from some misunderstanding as to time, one of the stationary engines was not brought into action, and the vacuum obtained in the tube was in consequence imperfectly developed. The speed attained, however, was fully equal to that usually adopted in the working of the locomotive lines, being, on the average, 30 miles an hour. On the return, a greater speed was attained, the barometer, at starting, indicating above 21 inches, or 10½ lbs. of atmospheric pressure on the square inch of the piston. There was no stopping at any of the intermediate stations. The distance of five miles was accomplished in six minutes and a quarter, giving an average of forty-eight miles an hour; but part of this distance (quarter of a mile) the speed reached sixty-five miles an hour. The second upward trip was continued throughout at an equal speed, and the distance was accomplished in seven minutes, being rather above forty three miles an hour. The return to Croydon was equally satisfactory. The barometer indicated from 26 inches, the maximum, to 11 inches, the minimum, or from 13 to 15 pounds on each square inch.

MURDER AND SUICIDE.—On Tuesday afternoon an inquest was held at the Spread Eagle, Camberwell, on the body of William Blackburn, who attempted self-destruction, by cutting his throat, immediately after murdering his wife, at the village of Stondon Mopey, in that county, in June last, and committed what was termed a "Wilful Murder" was returned by the Coroner's Jury. The man and his deceased wife had lived as servants in the house of Mr. French, of Stondon Hall, and she was found in her bedroom, lying on the bed, dead, with her throat cut. The husband was nowhere to be found, and, later in the day, was met with near a neighbouring wood, having also inflicted a frightful wound in his own throat. A razor was discovered in the room, and he acknowledged committing the injuries. He was unable to take his trial for the murder of his wife at the late assizes. Latterly he became more rational, but exceedingly dejected. A nurse was constantly with him, and extreme exhaustion ended his days on Friday (last week). The Jury returned a verdict, "That the deceased died from the effects of a wound in his throat, inflicted by himself whilst in a state of temporary insanity."

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

SPAIN.—The Presse publishes a curious account of a dispute between General Narvaez and Senor D'Altuna. It appears that, at a ball at Mrs. Gregory's, in the old Basque fashion, which had been got up in honour of the Queen, Senor D'Altuna presented to General Narvaez and his officers a libretto of the performances, into which had been introduced eulogies of the latter. General Narvaez appears to have been greatly excited by this very natural exhibition of provincial patriotism, and to have made use of language which greatly surprised the two Queens. The Queen Mother more especially. Narvaez attempted to bully Senor D'Altuna, but he replied with so much boldness and dignity, that the President of the Council found himself in a wrong position. The Queen exhibited deep indignation at the conduct of Narvaez; and, on leaving the room, the Queen Mother cast upon the assembly a glance which was perfectly understood, and which was received with marks of applause. Letters from Barcelona mention that Bellera had entered that province from France, and was in the neighbourhood of Tarragona at the head of a body of his partisans. Troops had been sent to Barcelona to put down the movement.

On the 23rd ult. an aged Highlander, almost worthy, in respect to years, of being classed among the patriarchs of old, departed this life in the parish of Kintearn, Ross shire. This veteran, named Donald Ross, had attained to the vast age of one hundred and fifteen years. Among the memorabilia of Donald's life was his being sent as a special messenger with a letter from Lochbroom to Dingwall at the time of the rebellion in 1745. The old man retained possession of his faculties, and enjoyed uninterrupted good health till within a few days of his death.

ASSAULT AT THE EAST INDIA HOUSE.—At the MANSION HOUSE on Monday an investigation was made into the circumstances connected with a dispute which had taken place at the East India House a few days pre viously. Mr Parry appeared for the complainant, and Mr Cracraft attended for the defence. The matter excited a good deal of curiosity. Mr Parry, in stating the case as it appeared in the following evidence, observed that it was of extreme importance that gentlemen having a right to attend a Court of Proprietors of East India Stock, not convened by the Directors, should know whether they were to be liable at the caprice, or in consequence of the irritated vanity of any individual to be placed in an ignominious situation before their fellow proprietors and the public.—Mr Peter Gordon stated that he resided at No. 8, Barnsbury street, Islington, and has been since last June a Proprietor of the East India capital stock, to the amount of £1000, for which he had paid upwards of £2800. On Saturday the 23rd of August, a Court of Proprietors was convened by special requisition for ten o'clock. About half past nine witness entered the court and sat in the chair which the Chairman usually occupied. There were no Directors there at the time. Many other Proprietors entered, amongst whom was Mr G Thompson at ten o'clock Sir H Willock, the Chairman of the Board of Directors, and several of the directors came into the Court at the special entrance in a body. Witness continued sitting in the chair after the entrance of Sir Henry Willock, who said something to the purport of removing him from the chair, but witness could not remember whether the words were in the shape of an order or of a polite request. He was very agitated. Mr. Hogg, the member for Beverley, and Deputy Chairman of the Court of Directors, addressing Sir Henry Willock, prompted him to turn out witness, who was composedly sitting in the chair. Mr. Hogg was angry. There were several proprietors assembled, and witness said it was an important question, and it was for them (the proprietors) pleasure who should occupy the chair, and he had no objection to see Sir H. Willock in it. He thought he first proposed that Sir H Willock should take the chair, but Mr. Thompson subsequently proposed, and he seconded, that motion, and rose from the chair in order to make way. Whether Sir H. Wilock sat down or not he was not certain; but as Sir H. Willock was about to sit down Mr. Hogg and others of the directors said "No." Sir H Willock then said he would not take the chair by the vote of the proprietors, but as a matter of right he claimed it, and Mr Hogg said the Charles burial ground of the East India Company was as much raised by Acts of Parliament, and had a right to take the chair. Sir H. Willock would not take the chair. Witness vacated, and pointed to the seat, and then Sir H Willock refused to take it. Witness resumed it and kept it. Sir H Willock then threatened to remove him by force, and Edward Wilson, the other defendant, was called to perform that office. Wilson laid hold of him by the collar and dragged him to the door of the Court, and there let him go. He desired Wilson to take him to prison or before a magistrate, but Wilson said he had nothing more to do with him. Witness remained in the Court of Proprietors at the back of the chair, and the business of the Court proceeded. Mr Clarkson cross examined the witness, and then put the following copy of a printed hand bill into his hands.—

Corruption, Perjury, Treason—We all row in the same boat. The public are most earnestly invited to attend in their own interests, the East India House, at noon, on Friday, the 22nd of August, 1845, and there freely to express their opinion of the proceedings of the General Court, which is an open democratic Court, without rules or chairman, a Court to which every proprietor of India Stock, even under £500 has by the charter a right to speak freely. There is no law to prevent the Court from listening to any non proprietor in the gallery. It is, in fact, the Exchange of India. It cannot commit any one for contempt. The directors provide refreshments for all their supporters. Rajah Brooke will re open the case of the Bladens. George Thompson will again impeach the British Ambassador. The Secretary will age n plead in the stead and revenge for Highness the Prince of the Most Noble Order of the Lion and the Sun. His Highness' his will again quiver—his teeth will again chatter. Mr Deputy Salomons declares—"We all row in the same boat." Cornaglia, "The Pirate" Director, ment he keeps up for the chasse is a very large one, and among the animals preserved are boars, which have this advantage, at least, over the fox, that, when killed, they can be eaten. They are not so often hunted, however, as shot. Your boar is what the Fancy would call an "ugly customer," when hard pressed, and will neither come and be killed, nor let others come to him for that benevolent purpose: he turns at man, horse, and dog, and has been known to show good fight against all three, when the spear was the weapon. But the rifle has rendered the slaughtering of him quite safe, and, consequently, quite inglorious. Nevertheless, he is still preserved in a wild, or rather a semi-savage state, having a daily meal provided for him, of the food in which the species delighteth; and this induces a kind of subjection to man, which the true old boar of tapestry, painting, and romance, would have scorned with his heels: his trust was in snout and tusks alone, and his instincts were not played upon, to win him into an unconscious degradation.

The number of the animals here kept is about a hundred and sixty but it is only one of many preserves; the wood is enclosed or the crops of the neighbourhood would never find their way to the barns, but still gives the brutes an enormous range. Within these bounds are various feeding places; they are circular spaces railed in, in the midst of the thicket, with apertures for the animals to enter by; a rude wooden hut is raised from the ground in the centre, in which the keepers can conceal themselves; within this space, potatoes and grain are scattered at a certain hour every evening, and, with the instinct of the porcine race, which is remarkably keen in matters of feeding, they come to the spot at about the same hour with great punctuality. But if they are to be seen, extreme caution is necessary; the visitor is boxed up in the hut in the centre, and told not to speak above the lowest whisper, under pain of disappointment in the object of his coming. The boars, though partakers of the hospitality of man, do yet "suspect him very grievously;" the least noise would send them supperless to the woods again, and the stranger sightless home. When all is still, they approach gradually; the young litters, with the trustfulness and rashness of youth, happy as yet in their ignorance, make a rush in and begin the business of the evening forthwith; the elders of the herd are more circumspect; with uplifted snout and pricked up ears, they pause without, and scent the wind, to be sure there is not something in it; when a little assured, they draw nearer and repeat the experiment, and, at last, enter, and begin to feed. The pig, in his domesticated state, is not a favourable representative of his species; he is gluttonous, and a foul feeder, and comforts himself in a manner of which the pig of the woods would be ashamed. The boar, in his wild condition, seems to be a delicate eater, very difficult to please in his selection of a potatoe, and then only nipping out the best part of it. They keep up a strict discipline among themselves, their law being that of the strongest, any infringement of which is visited by summary punishment. On the present occasion, the oldest and largest did not condescend to appear, and the whole number did not muster a pair of tusks. Those who have formed their idea of the wild boar from paintings and story, would be disappointed; they are of brindled brown on the back, passing into black in the head and legs; they are rougher in the hair, stand higher, and are much larger in the snout, than the common hog; they are wild and shy, but do not differ so much as might be expected from the ordinary grunter of the English farmyard or the Irish cabin. In the enclosure where they are fed, they are shot when wanted; the entrances being closed after they have passed in, so that there can be neither sport, danger, nor excitement of any kind. In all hunting, the beast should at least have a chance of escape, either by cunning or swiftness, or both.

To-day, the anniversary of the Birth of Prince Albert, has been celebrated at Rosenau by a pretty fête in the open air. The weather is lovely—a brilliant sun, an Italian sky, and an air so pure and soft it is absolute luxury to breathe it; all tend to make it the most pleasant of celebrations—a rural festival, open to all: it seems as if rain and storm had been left behind, and that summer—real summer—had been overtaken among the hills of central Germany. The day began with a performance of music, by the military band, in front of the mansion; that concluded, a procession of the peasantry was seen advancing towards the residence, headed by their own band—a very good one, by-the-by. The line consisted of thirteen or fourteen couples—each lad with a lass—dressed in the extreme of the Coburg rural costume, that of the fair sex as usual far excelling in taste and arrangement. The head-dress was gayer in colour, with more black ribbons, and those far larger than are seen every day; the jacket-like boddice was more tightly laced and the skirt and petticoat fell in folds of scarlet and green. The peasant girls had evidently been picked for the occasion as the beauties of the vicinity; the faces of some of them were very beautiful. The men wore stout and healthy youngsters; but with nothing in their attire at all national or picturesque, except an immense deal of bright-coloured scarfs and handkerchiefs twisted round the common hat—an attempt to elevate the ordinary into the striking that was not successful. One alone had ventured on the "smalls" of interior yellow leather, which still cling to the legs of the old peasants, but which the young ones have discarded. They advanced up to the house in good order, and ranged themselves on the lawn in front; the Royal party had assembled on the terrace to receive them, as the visit was one of compliment and congratulation. Their band played a lively air, and the foremost couple advanced, each bearing a garland of flowers, to her Majesty and Prince Albert, presenting their graceful gift with all due courtesy. It was graciously received; the distinguished presenters—the hero and heroine of the day—retired to their companions, the band struck up, and in a moment the lawn was covered with waltzers, the bright coloured dresses and flowing ribbons flashing along in strong and agreeable contrast with the surrounding trees and shrubs. The elegance of the ball-room was not to be looked for, but they kept up the round with agility and perseverance, and in admirable time. When the band stopped, the military band commenced, and off whirled the waltzers again, shouting with glee, like the Irishman in the jig or the Highlander in the reel. They danced the ordinary waltz, and a variety which has a dash of the polka in it. They all acquitted themselves well; our friend in the "yellows" alone was not so skilled in gestic lore as might have been desirable for one so eminently conspicuous; but if he did not win the eye by his grace, he kept it by his singularity. At the close of the fifth or sixth waltz, the procession formed again, filed before her Majesty and the Prince; and, in the order in which it came, descended the slope to the little inn now occupied by the Royal servants, where a dinner was provided for them, and here they spent the day, as the phrase goes with us, "in the utmost conviviality." (See the Engraving at page 149.)

LITERATURE.

MEMOIR OF JOHN AUBREY, F.R.S. By JOHN BRITTON, F.S.A., &c. Published by the Wiltshire Topographical Society. 4to.

Events and circumstances have, of late, considerably extended the interest attached to the study of antiquities and antiquarian art. Notwithstanding the insatiable spirit of enterprise which is rapidly covering the country with a network of iron, and cutting up its most picturesque districts in every direction, there is still left a general respect for the works of our forefathers—the labours of other times than our own. True it is that, occasionally, some ruthless engineer levels a fine old edifice for a "new line;" but, little as engineers feel in common with antiquaries, the levelling practice, in raising "the standard of comfort," is the exception, not the rule: the ivy-clad keep, the mouldering church, and embattled wall, are still to be seen rising through the meshes of the vast net; whi at the railway excursionist of every class is glad to identify these memorials of "hoar antiquity" as an intellectual relief to the monotony of iron travel. Nay, in some instances, we are directly associating the merits of modern science with the mighty works of many centuries since, by borrowing their very nomenclature: the terminus and the station of a railway are both from the annals of Roman Britain; and, in certain cases, our railway engineer is, at this moment, tracking his "new line" by the magnificent military roads of our Roman conquerors.

We regard this assimilation of ancient and modern ingenuity as a proof of the growing liberality of the age; for, as quaintly observed by Southey, "they who care nothing for their ancestors, will care little for their posterity, indeed, little for anything except themselves." Article, unquestionably, fostered by the revival—this increasing love of symbolism and ornament. Meanwhile, antiquities have become universally popular; and even the utilitarian bookwrights are fascinated by the lore of "Old England." Institutions are formed for the preservation of ancient structures, as well as for the better illustration of our local history and its most attractive periods. The Wiltshire Topograph cal Society is one of these important and interesting results; and the work before us is a goodly specimen of what may be accomplished for antiquarian literature by this active spirit of provincial association.

John Aubrey, "credulous old Aubrey," as he has been ironically styled since the time of Anthony à Wood, is one of the Worthies of Wiltshire; and Mr Britton, also a native of this county, in seeking to set Aubrey in a fairer light, has performed a true service to literature, by reconciling many apparent contradictions, and correcting many errors, in former memoirs. In addition to the individual interest of the present work, we find in it some useful information, illustrating not merely Aubrey's life and writings, but the state of society in general, and especially the literary opinions and taste of the seventeenth century.

Aubrey is considered by Mr Britton to have been essentially an Archæologist, and the first person in this country who fairly deserved that name. "Historians, chroniclers, and topographers, there had been before his time; but he was the first who devoted his studies and abilities to archæology, in its various ramifications of architecture, genealogy, palæography, numismatics, heraldry, &c. No one before him investigated or understood the origin of the Celtic Temples at Avebury, and other monuments of the same class; and, certainly, no antiquary had preceded him in attempting to distinguish the successive changes in style and decoration, of ancient ecclesiastical edifices, or to ascertain by observing architectural features and details, to what era any particular building belonged." He was the first to pronounce Avebury, Stonehenge, and similar stone circles, to be religious temples raised by the British Druids; and his opinion has been generally received as sound and unshaken.

Antiquarianism and credulity, we suspect to be as near allied as wit and madness; and Aubrey's mind, certainly, presents the former association. In his peregrinations, too, he was too apt to "take for granted," that as early as the days of Hesiod, he obtained the low reputation of a "foolish gossip;" indeed, Ray, the naturalist, cautioned Aubrey against "a too easy credility." Hence, his "Natural History of Surrey" is little better than a bundle of fabulous narratives, tricked out with the science of the present day; and his volume of "Miscellanies" is a book of gossip to laugh at; or, as Mr Britton elegantly remarks, it has "long since been trodden down by the march of intellect." It may be as well to add that Aubrey's "Miscellanies" comprised fatalities, omens, dreams, apparitions, marvels, magic, oracles, second sight, corpse candles, &c.—matters of certain repute some two centuries since, about which time this volume was collected. Aubrey's biographical labours are entitled to much higher rank; but he himself has been strangely treated by his biographers: some of them have erroneously stated the date of his birth; and, until now, neither the day, nor even the year of his death, nor the place of his interment, had been correctly ascertained. This, however, Mr Britton has decided: with much labour and disappointment, it was, at last, almost by accident that he was directed, by a manuscript note of Dr. Rawlinson's, to the church of St. Mary Magdalene, at Oxford; on searching the registers of which, Dr. Ingram found the record of his burial! It really savours of perverse ingratitude in Aubrey's contemporaries, thus to allow him to pass away unheeded! Alack! what so foolish as the close of fame!—for we gather from this Memoir that Aubrey continued, to the bidding, his correspondents and friends all the distinguished persons whose learning graced the latter half of the seventeenth century; he was one of the founders of the Royal Society; and intimate with Evelyn, Hadley, Hunnaston, Hooke, Willis, Hevelius, Sir William Petty, Evelyn, Wren, Gale, Harvey, and Ray. Thomas Hobbes and Sir James Harrington, William Penn, and Isaak Walton, honoured him with their friendship. "The poets Butler, Cowley, Denham, Waller, D'Avenant, and Dryden, the antiquaries Dugdale, Wood, Gibson, Tanner, Plot, and Lhuyd, the artists Hollar, Cooper, Fairthorne, and Loggan; all held frequent [illegible] with Aubrey, who was, besides, extensively patronised by several of the peerless, ladies, and enlightened nobles of the age. His unpublished memoranda and correspondence contain various and interesting materials for further illustration of the characters and writings of many of those celebrated men." Surely, these MSS are worthy of the attention of the Camden or the Percy Society, and his remains an Archæological Antiquities are especially fitted for the journals of the Archæological Society.

Aubrey's life teems with memorable incidents: he was born of good family, and educated at Oxford; he helped to found a club of Commonwealth-men, who settled questions by ballot, this being the first instance of the use of the balloting-box in England. In 1660 he narrowly escaped shipwreck; by 1670, he had lost all his property, and was reduced to indigence, but he bore his adversity like a philosopher; he was generously [illegible] by his friends; [illegible] by Dryden, in Wiltshire, in whose house [illegible] he [illegible] his days. One of the sunniest spots in Aubrey's life was [illegible] York at Aubrey, when he received the Royal Command to draw an account of the famed Celtic temple. Every phase of Aubrey's life has been scrupulously examined by Mr. Britton, who has duly estimated his archæological labours, and set his character in a more amiable light than it hitherto occupied. In all this, there is an earnestness and sincerity which is very gratifying to the reader, whilst it is productive of a good and just result—vindication of character, and the establishment of truth. The work is produced in truly handsome style, and is embellished with a portrait of Aubrey, from a drawing by Fairthorne, his contemporary. It is, in good taste, dedicated to the Marquis of Lansdowne, whose princely seat, Bowood, lies near the native home of Aubrey, and of the author of the Memoir.

OVERLAND CIRCULAR; OR, HINTS TO TRAVELLERS TO INDIA.

This very useful brochure has been compiled by Messrs. Grindlay and Co., the army agents. It details the several routes, with maps, charges, &c.

MY MARINE MEMORANDUM BOOK. By HARGRAVE JENNINGS. 3 vols. Newby.

These are three volumes of lively, rattling anecdotes, scenes, and sketches, "afloat and ashore." The first volume is, however, occupied, by "Felicia Wayland; or, the Cuba Merchantman," in which there is a successful attempt at a sustained story of woe, interspersed with some clever sketched nautical incidents, and relieved by occasional flashes of grotesque nigger humour: the descriptive details of West Indian scenery, by the way, are highly graphic, and the sailors' eccentricities are dashed off attractively. The second volume consists of detached tales, of greater breadth, perchance, than that in its predecessor towards its close, there is a vividly-drawn picture of Portsmouth, "a walled Wapping, with an interjectory admixture of the militaire." In the third volume is a tale of a mysterious ship, which the author asserts was written in 1837, two years before Marryat's "Phantom Ship," or Neale's "Flying Dutchman," was published. "Off the Cape," is a spirited sketch, and the volume contains several others of equal merit. Altogether, this is a very clever and sparkling addition to our lighter literature, and will become popular.

THE TRAVELS AND ADVENTURES OF THOMAS TROTTER, as Told by Himself. Edited by PETER PARLEY. Darton and Co.

We need scarcely premise that these are fireside Travels, and that Thomas Trotter's peregrinations have been more in the quarry and octavos of some well-stored library, than among the veritable Wonders of Europe, which Trotter (the niece of Kitty Walker) describes nearly enough. Still, the little book is by the real Simon Pure (or rather Peter Parley), Mr. Goodrich, "of Boston, in the State of Massachusetts;" and it is announced as the first of a new series of books by the renowned Peter, who thereupon expresses himself in good set terms at seeing so many books published in London with his name attached to them as their author, though he had never before heard of them. Peter also repudiates much that is contained in these books, as being contrary to good morals, and then complains of the mutilation of his own books, almost beyond recognition. After all, Peter Parley is but a name, to which any literary adventurer considers he has right and title; and we suspect the larcony to have been, in most cases, committed in Peter's own country. But all this is beside the present little work, which contains some pleasantly told adventures, chiefly in Italy; and discourses of the curiosities, natural and artificial, of that wonderful country, in a very intelligent narrative. The work is illustrated with several nicely-engraved wood-cuts, by S. Williams. Of the emblazoned title-page, and lithographed frontispiece, we scarcely think so well.

A GENERAL AND HERALDIC DICTIONARY OF THE PEERAGE AND BARONETAGE OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE. By JOHN BURKE, Esq. Eighth Edition. Colburn.

If any proof were wanting of the prestige of rank in this country, it might be found in the fact of the large annual sale of Peerage-books, or Dictionaries, bringing up the state of the Peerage to the time of their being printed. Of the work before us—and it is but one of a class—we are assured that three thousand copies are sold within two years; and the volume consists of some 1200 closely-printed pages and twice as many columns; it is of the bulk of an Encyclopædia, and is as complete in its arrangement and details, archæological, genealogical, heraldic, and biographical; in short, it is of the Aristocracy of the country a sort of Encyclopædia, just as the milky volumes of our day are devoted to the several sciences of chemistry, medicine, architecture, geography, statistics, &c. It is, moreover, a book of very amusing anecdote as well as dry detail; and is almost as attractive as the foreign lady found the English Dictionary—so full of short lines. For ages have hungry poets, dinnerless wits, and disappointed suitors, lampooned and laughed at the distinctions and "creations" of rank: the chase of fame has outlived them, and "the march of intellect" into the bargain; and the shrewd remark of the member for Bath is as applicable as ever—that no three men can be in a room together for half an hour without one wanting to take precedence of another.

This popularity of Peerage-books is by no means of recent date. When Arthur Collins, in 1709, published the first work of the kind, i. e., an account of the Peers then existing, their genealogies and arms, in a single volume, the demand for it was so great that it was followed by several editions in quick succession; and the best of these, in nine bulky octavo volumes, was published under the superintendence of the laborious Sir Egerton Brydges. Then came the minor work of Debrett, the successor of Almon, the great Whig bookseller of Piccadilly, of which the ninth edition was published two-and-thirty years ago.

The first edition of Mr. Burke's work, then a moderate sized octavo volume, has published some twenty years since: during that time, the editor has laboured unceasingly to render each successive reprint complete: for this purpose, "each article is separately and carefully revised, amended where inaccuracy is discovered, and extended by such new information as may be obtained from public records, or private papers, regarded as trustworthy." Such is the likeliest means of insuring correctness; and, by this long course of probation, Mr. Burke's work has become by far the completest of its class: his genealogical researches have enabled him to enter more at large into collateral lines, and thus to insure an accession of names to the respective pedigrees, which had previously been entirely excluded or forgotten. Another interesting result of his labours has been to show that many persons, still in the station of country gentlemen only, are, nevertheless, the chiefs of several ennobled and dignified families, by which we are reminded of Sir James Mackintosh's aphoristic remark—"The main body of the Peerage are a modern nobility raised out of an ancient gentry."

Besides the Royal Chronicle, and the Dictionary of the Peerage and Baronetage of the United Kingdom, the Appendix to this Edition contains the Spiritual Lords, Foreign Noblemen (British subjects by birth), Peerages Claimed, Surnames, Heirs, Courtesy Titles, Younger Sons, Daughters married to Commoners, Precedence, Orders of Knighthood, Knights Bachelors, and Mottoes Translated.

THE EMIGRANT'S GUIDE. By the Rev. DAVID MACKENZIE, M.A. Orr and Co.

This little book is stated to contain the results of Ten Years' Practical Experience in Australia, and to include such information as may be useful to intending emigrants to that colony; the Preface being dated "Sydney, March, 1845." We are glad to perceive that the writer eschews "politics and private squabbles," the besetting sins of most books on Colonial prospects and affairs. His work is systematically arranged, and contains a great deal of information closely packed in its 280 pages. The hopes of this fine colony of nearly six millions of acres are unquestionably brightening: the convicts, the curse of the country, are rapidly diminishing in number and influence; and hereafter, the sweepings of our gaols are not to be sent to New South Wales, to pollute its atmosphere, and render the finest country in the world a perfect pandemonium. With respect to the altered character of the Colonial press, the article on "Convict editors, as formerly, are nowhere employed to preach to her Majesty's liges their moral and religious duties. And the press has a very great influence on the Colonial public: somebody here is able to pay for a newspaper, and is, moreover, anxious to hear the news of the times." The population of Sydney is, at present, about 40,000; of Paramatta, 7,000; and of Melbourne, the capital of Port Philip, 7000.

THE BEEKEEPER'S MANUAL. By DORROGOST CHYLINSKI. Orr and Co.

A well-timed publication, founded on the experience, during many centuries, of the Apiarians in Poland: it contains their classification of Bees, details of their Hives and Bee-gardens; together with the practical duties of Beekeeper in Poland in the various seasons; and a chapter on the Management of Honey, Wax, &c. The classification of the work is admirable; and we doubt not, the information which it contains, will be of great value to Beekeepers in England. The authority has been tested; for Poland surpasses all the other countries of Europe in the management and extent of its Apiaries, there are Polish cottages, with very small portions of land attached to them, on which are as many as 50 hives; while there are farmers and landed proprietors who are in possession of from 100 to 10,000 hives. Yet, there is, in the Polish bee-master's method of rearing bees, less scientific and artificial pretension than the plan adopted by British agriculturists; but, the foreign method agrees more "with the natural habits and laws of the bee."

OUR MAGAZINE COLUMN FOR SEPTEMBER.

TOURISTS ON THE RHINE.

The goodly fellowship of tourists who wend their way to Germany at this period of the year, are generally in such a hurry to get there, for fear any unforeseen accident, any sudden call of business, an old chage them to retrace their steps before they can "say they have seen the Rhine;" that they seldom think of inquiring about anything else than this, "How soon shall we get to Cologne?" and look neither to the right nor the left till they get there. And pretty considerably disappointed are they, as we imagine, when they find themselves in its dirty, narrow streets, very much resembling those of that Cockney Cologne-gravesend; and rush incontinently to buy boxes of the "veritable eau de Cologne" just at the Gravesend tourist's bay bags of the veritable shrimps of that ancient and interesting watering-place. And when they manage to poke their noses through the end of a long gutterly gullet of a street, and sniff the breath of the brownish yellow Rhine, crawling sluggishly between its low banks, very incontinently do they begin to compare the opposite bank with that of Tilbury, and to speculate upon the difference in breadth of the two rivers; and chuckling perhaps with the obsequious cookery of the German Gasthoff, entertain for a moment some thing like a vain desire that they might be back again at the "Falcon" to refresh their memories of an old familiar spot, "long early seen unknown, and known too late." No doubt but next day, when they find themselves steaming up the river to Coblentz, and pay their respects to the Seven Mountains by the way, the dishevil leering leaves them, and their faculties begin to open to a perception of the grand and picturesque; and by the time they have steamed back again they have got the panorama book by the heart, and have nothing more to learn; and sniff the breath of the brownish yellow Rhine, crawling sluggishly between its low banks, very incontinently do they begin to compare the opposite bank with that of Tilbury, and to speculate upon the difference in breadth of the two rivers; and chuckling perhaps with the obsequious cookery of the German Gasthoff, entertain for a moment something

THE THEATRES.

HAYMARKET.

Mr. Poole's three act drama of "Past and Present," revived at this theatre on Thursday evening, was first performed at Drury Lane in February, 1830. To the amusement of our play-going readers, we give the cast upon each occasion:

	Drury Lane, 1830.		Haymarket, 1845
Marquis de St. Victor	Mr. Cooper		Mr. Stuart
Florville	— Wright		— H. Hall
Julian St. Victor	Madame Vestris		Miss Julia Bennett
Larose	Mr. W. Farren		Mr. W. Farren
Fourcade	— Webster		— Howe
Flondrin	— Harley		— Buckstone
Marchioness de St. Victor	Mrs. Faucit		Mrs. Edwin Yarnold
Celeste	Miss Love		Miss Lee
Marie	Mrs. Orger		Miss Carre

The three acts of this drama are supposed to take place during three different epochs, commencing a few days before the destruction of the Bastile; but the piece is not of any very great importance, having evidently been constructed to allow scope for Mr. Farren's peculiar acting, as Larose. He is entrusted with a box of treasure at the commencement of the play; and, after a lapse of thirty years, he is enabled to restore it to the young Julian St. Victor—the father and son being both played by the same performer. The acting of Mr. Farren was very fine: in the character we recognise the origin of all the old soldiers and grandfathers he has since essayed. Miss Julia Bennett gained fresh laurels by her clever representation of St. Victor, père et fils; indeed, the chief interest excited by the progress of the story, lay between herself and the old steward, Larose. We do not think that "Past and Present" will be of any very great service to the treasury of the theatre; but it will serve to make out the bill agreeably, until some more important piece is brought forward to take its place. All the artistes concerned in its representation played with their wonted care, but the parts were, comparatively, unimportant. The applause throughout was unqualified, and, at the conclusion, Mr. Farren was loudly called for, subsequently appearing to receive the renewed acclamations of the audience. The house was a very fair one at the rising of the curtain, and, at half price, well filled.

ADELPHI.

The Canal St. Martin is a part of Paris very little known to the English visitors, but a most interesting locality to the native residents. It debouches into the Seine opposite the Jardin des Plantes; and, running under the site of the ancient Bastille, joins the Canal de l'Ourcq outside the barrier of St. Martin, or La Villette. It is a very favourite promenade with the Parisians; and with the dashing habitués of the Boulevard des Italiens and Bois de Boulogne, but the quiet bourgeoisie of the eastern quarters and the little gamins who flourish in the dirt and poverty of the Rue St. Antoine. There the children of the épicier are paraded by the nurse, to see the boats filled with wood and the washerwomen in their long barges: and here the father of the aforesaid comes once a week to give his dog a bath—an operation of sufficient interest to attract a vast crowd of loiterers, who are always ready in Paris to stop and gape at anything. Towards evening, the quays are often chosen for appointments; and then the little bright-eyed grisettes, in cap and shawl, may be observed listening to long protestations of eternal affection, for at least six weeks; or talking themselves, with such appealing looks, that one may be certain they are pleading some very interesting cause.

This "Canal St. Martin," then, with its wood-yards and barges—its grisettes and washerwomen—its lovers and gamins—has furnished the subject for an effective drama of the same name, now playing to good houses, every night, at the Gaité Theatre, and re-produced, on Monday last, at our Adelphi, under the title of "Clarisse, or the Merchant's Daughter," with perfect success. It is as good a piece (of its class) as we remember to have seen, and precisely what people have been accustomed to look for at this Theatre The story—which, by the way, is not very clearly made out in some parts of the play—is nearly this:—Laroche (Mr. O Smith), "a marchand de bois, or wood-merchant," as the bill kindly states, for the benefit of the uneducated, has a daughter, Clarisse (Madame Celeste), who superintends his business, and is beloved by his clerk, Armand (Mr. Worrell). During the absence of Laroche, a visit is paid to the wood-yard by Marbal (Mr. Webster), a fashionable chevalier d'industrie, who has formed a plan to rob the counting-house that evening, with the assistance of the gang, of which he is at the head. He pays some attention to Clarisse, to the great annoyance of Robert (Mr. Lambert), the sturdy foreman of the wood-yard; and tells Armand that if he will meet him that night he can introduce him to those who will greatly improve his prospects. Armand, flattered by this mark of kindness, consents; and, during his absence, the robbery is effected. We are next introduced to the lodging of Malvert (Mr. Woolgar), a gipsette, par excellence, in which would any living at the very height of fashion, with her bird and furniture—a realization of Eugene Sue's Rigolette. She has a very droll interview in the person of Jacob (Mr. Wieland), an amphibious nondescript, haunting the canal for what he can pick out of it, from a flounder to a suicide; and, sometimes, by his own confession, pushing people in on the sly, to get a reward for diving after them. Her supper, of bread and salad, between this pair, is very amusing. We are then transported to the banks of the Canal St. Martin, and find Armand returning, after being out all night. The robbery has been discovered, and the wood-yard is in confusion, increased by the arrival of Laroche in his barge. Marbal arrives, and quietly makes known to Laroche that he has a secret concerning the wood-merchant that may destroy him, but that it may be bought up for a trifle. Laroche agrees in a minute detail, to his surrendering his business and plunder of some passengers entrusted to his charge when master of a vessel. Laroche, perceiving that he is in the power of the other, determines to destroy him. He therefore agrees to the terms proposed by Marbal, to be paid for secrecy, and asks him to take wine. Marbal, suspicious of poison, begs his host to drink first. Laroche complies, and Marbal is about to follow his example, when, by his companion's contrivance, the part of the floor on which he is seated turns completely over on a pivot, and he is supposed to be shot into the water, an empty chair coming up in his place. This effect was very novel and startling. Clarisse appears just as the event takes place, and is witness of the murder. The action then passes to a fête in the gardens at Belleville, given by Laroche to his workmen, at which he attends, having reunited Armand, and given Clarisse to him in marriage, to bribe her into silence upon the late event. To his horror, in the midst of the festivities, Marbal stands before him, having been fished out of the canal by Barbillon, Dunlop in his power, he is compelled to grant all that Marbal demands. In the third act, we find the wedding contract being drawn up between Clarisse and Marbal, the other being, of course, discarded. Robert, however, who has escaped from prison, whither he had been wrongly sent, interrupts the ceremony, in the fête of La Villette, declaring that he is Clarisse's own father, at the same time denouncing Laroche, who goes into his house, under pretence of procuring some documents, and there shoots himself. Marbal is arrested by the police, and Clarisse bestows her hand at length, in reality, upon Armand. This is the clearest notion we can give of the plot, which is somewhat complicated, as the three interests constantly crossing one another—and especially confused towards the end—possibly from the circumstance of cutting five acts down to three.

For the acting the chief praise must be awarded to Mr. Webster for his admirable personation of the cool French swindler Marbal. His general "make up" was excellent, and the perfect nonchalance with which he took everything, was capitally preserved to the very last. Madame Celeste looked very well in her usual force and effect, but we should have preferred Mrs. Yates in the character In the representation of a part like Marat, or that in "The Mysterious Stranger," Madame Celeste is inimitable; but in quiet domestic pieces, though she is, in a sense, out of her element. When there is no cause for the broken English, it becomes somewhat wearisome—the ear is kept on the strain too much to catch the words. As some one near us quaintly enough observed, "She is very touchée every now and then." We do not mean, however, by this to depreciate Madame Celeste's powers as an actress, for they are of no ordinary character. Mr. Wright was irresistibly funny as the drunken Jacob, and Mr. Lambert was admirably characterised, and loudly encored We remember when the conventional notions of head-dresses for all French female population were confined to the lamb-cricket tied up over the head or the high hat and feather. Now, we should say that one might walk from Clichy to the Barrière St. Jacques—that is, right through Paris without encountering either one or the other; except the first "the old women" que tendent les chiens upon the Pont Neuf, and the second on the plump Normandy bonne watching her charges and the soldiers in the Luxembourg Gardens. These points betoken great care and perception on the part of the management, and must, of course, answer in the end. For the public have now travelled so much, that they know a great deal more of propriety of present costume at all parts of the globe; and can give better authorities about them, than all of the wardrobe superintendents of the London theatres put together.

We have said the drama was entirely successful; and will, we think, have a very fair run. It has been translated by Mr. Edward Suting.

ASTLEY'S.

This theatre, after having been closed for a few days, reopened "for the winter season" on Monday. The circumstance reminds us of the farmer, who, having a weather-house—one of those little paste-board tenements, now nearly extinct, wherein two small figures prognosticated the approach of fair or wet weather by their going in and out—thought he would ensure a dry time for his harvest by fixing the representative of "fair" outside. So, we opine, Mr. Batty, anxious for winter, determined to induce its approach by erecting in his tile that it had arrived; and, oddly enough, the cold weather followed immediately. We always had great faith in the power of the Astley's management, but never before gave it credit for such cunning in meteorology. We knew that it could direct thunderbolts to impious altars, conjure up snow storms in Affghanistan, and indulge in similar atmospheric diversions, but this last coup fairly surprised us. The "Brunal ingress," then—in the words of French playbills—was celebrated by the production of a new spectacle, termed in the bills "an ectype of great beauty, power, and splendour, called 'The Bride of the Nile, or the Lily of Memphis and the Oracle of Latona;'" and we are happy to say that this ectype is perfect success. We cannot exactly detail the plot, but it was very wonderful; with the additional advantage of introducing us to several new facts connected with the manners, customs, and mode of worship of the ancient Egyptians, of which we were before entirely ignorant. There were banquets, lights, and processions; chariot races, tame crocodiles and pyramids; inundations of the Nile and water pageants without end. And at the conclusion, Venus was triumphant and Vice was punished, to the proper delight of all well-regulated minds. Mr. Denvil made his first appearance here as Glyntheus, a supposed Grecian Prince, and promises to be an acquisition to the Company, being what the late Mr Richardson termed "a bould speaker;" and lungs are certainly required in a house like Astley's. We can speak also in terms of commendation of Mrs. J. Cooke, who delivered the speeches set down for her very sensibly. The piece has been very magnificently produced, and the properties and different appointments are really splendid; but we fancy that too much time is lost in the marching and countermarching of the processions. We are sure the effect would be better, were they brought on en masse, as there are actually a vast number of people engaged in them. The last scene might also be improved, the Temple of Isis, on the river, being backed by an abrupt half-scene of a pyramid used a little while before, by which all perspective and effect were destroyed. As a whole, however, it is a piece admirably adapted to the peculiar resources of the theatre, and will, without doubt, draw good houses for many nights to come. Besides, there is complete novelty about it; and with all our patriotism, we must plead guilty to having been wearied of the "triumphs of British valour," whether at Circle or Amy.

The scenes in the circle were admirable, being supported by the French troop of artistes, of whom we have before had occasion to speak in high terms: and the humours of the two clowns, Mr. Barry and M. Boyden—a Frenchman, we believe—enliven the equitation very much The performances, altogether, are equal to anything we have ever seen at Franconi's. We are happy to add that the house was very well filled; and the audience expressed their perfect satisfaction at everything they saw, by liberal and continued applause.

The Princess' Theatre will reopen, it is affirmed, with a most powerful company. Amongst the names mentioned, as about to form the corps, are Messrs. Macready, James Wallack, Charles Mathews, Walter Lacy, Compton, Oxberry, Granby, Leigh, Murray, &c.; and Mesdames Vestris, Cushman, W. Lacy, Stirling, Brougham, Emma Stanley, &c

Miss Kate Howard announces the opening of the Olympic at an early period, which she promises to restore to its most flourishing days, meaning of course the Vestris management. We must remind the lady that to effect this the most extreme care will be requisite in collecting a first-rate company of established favourites, and paying the greatest attention to detail in every compartment of the house. As all the actors of any reputation are already engaged at the various theatres, we are curious to learn of whom the new corps will consist.

Henry Betty, who some time since made a successful début in the metropolis, has, we hear, accepted another engagement here, and is to appear at the Pavilion Theatre on Monday. Mr. Betty commences his engagement as Hamlet, and will subsequently play Othello, and other characters, for the representation of which he has acquired fame in the provinces.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

TATTERSALL'S.

Monday.—A very fair afternoon, and only four horses in any favour for the St. Leger, viz.—Miss Sarah, Merrily, The Pacha, and Dot-an-Dyrus. Upon this lot a good deal of money was laid out at our quotations; and a few ponies and "roulseans" were put on Red Robin and Fantasa, but without showing any decided feeling either for against. Mr. Gully's two, Mr. Croft's brace, and Mr. Davis's pair were terribly out of favour; nor was there any great disposition evinced in favour of Mid Lothian, Fitz Alice, or Worthless, although each backed for small sums We have added the closing prices:—

Thursday.—Several of the "regulars" being returnable from Warwick, the betting proceeded this afternoon as usual, but without leading to any decided effect on the quotations. It was clear, however, that the two favourites, The Baron and Dot-an-Dyrus, were the most in favour; and that the Forth's and Dawson's lots were in very bad odour. Fantasa and The Pacha were steady; Old England and Red Robin on the totter. The prices given below are made up to the close of the races.

AQUATICS.

Chelsea Regatta.—The watermen of this district on Monday contended for a purse of sovereigns, liberally subscribed by the residents of St. Luke's The boat-race was in three heats, with six pairs of oars. The competitors were Charles Cole, Jun., and William Cole, Henry Gaylard and Edward Cooney, Wm. Woodford and John Thomas. There were three heats, and the Coles went away with the lead, and won by eight lengti s.

A few more interesting events will close a most brilliant and successful season. On Tuesday a grand oars match will take place, from Vauxhall to Putney, between the Members of the Ariel Club. The Royal Mersey Yacht Club Challenge Cup Match will come off on the 11th inst., and will, no doubt, from the importance of the Club, as well as the district, bring together a brilliant assemblage from both the Cheshire and Lancashire sides of the river.

Cordha n Hall (Norfolk) Regatta will take place on the 16th, Holt Fleet on the 16th, and Whitby on the 17th and 18th.

On the 29th of the present month, which closes the season, a grand scullers' match will take place, for £100 a side, between Henry Clasper (one of the crew who were victorious over the hitherto invincible sons of the Thames at the late regatta), of Newcastle, and Thomas Carroll, of Liverpool, five miles on the Mersey. The match excites much interest. The Newcastle lass is the favourite.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS, RECENTLY DECEASED.

GENERAL SIR WILLIAM HUTCHINSON, K.C.H.

This distinguished soldier entered the army in 1780 as ensign in the 45th Foot. He served in the West Indies, and went with the expedition to the Helder. He was severely wounded at the battle of Egmont-op-op; he was also at Copenhagen, and for a short time on the staff in Spain and Portugal during the glorious period of the Peninsular War. In 1813, Col. Hutchinson obtained the rank of major-general; and was advanced to that of lieutenant-general in 1825. On the 6th of May, 1820, he received the honour of knighthood; and, in 1830, he was appointed governor of the garrison of Carrickfergus. He was also colonel of the 75th regiment of foot and a K.C.H. Sir William died on the 27th ult. at Cheltenham.

THE REV. WILLIAM YATES, D.D.

Dr. Yates was a most eminent Oriental scholar. He passed nearly thirty years, engaged in perfecting Eastern translations of the Holy Scriptures. The learned Divine was originally, we believe, with his father, who survives him, a member of the General Baptist Church, at Loughborough. He quitted Bristol College to be coadjutor to Dr. Carey. In 1814, he went to India, and united in forming the General Baptist Station there in 1817. His deep learning, gentle manners, and consistent piety, secured him the cordial esteem and veneration of all. In consequence of ill health, Dr. Yates had undertaken the voyage home, pursuant to the strong injunctions of his medical advisers. He was, when he left Calcutta, on the 2nd of last June, in a very feeble state, and he died on the passage, on the 3rd of July following, while the vessel was on the Red Sea, within three days' sail of Suez. This able and excellent clergyman was, at the time of his decease, in his 59th year.

M. PELLETAN.

That great luminary of the scientific world, Professor Pelletan, died recently at Brussels, where he had been staying for some months. M. Pelletan was formerly physician to two successive Kings of France, professor at the School of Medicine in Paris, and President of the Medical Departemental Juries. Pelletan, however, laboured in almost every branch of science with equal distinction. Two subjects which much occupied his attention were the making and refining of sugar and the lighting of towns; in both he suggested great improvements. M. Pelletan has left unfinished a steam-boat on a new principle, as well as some other ingenious and valuable inventions. He was the author of a very popular treatise on medical physics, and of other numerous scientific works. It is to the words of the orator who pronounced his funeral discourse, "He had studied all things, and knew all things but vice."

The mortal remains of the professor were escorted to their resting-place at Brussels by a host of the most distinguished men of rank, literature, or science in the capital of Belgium. M. le Marquis de Ramigny, Ambassador from the King of the French, attended; and the funeral oration was eloquently pronounced by the Director of the Belgian Museum of Industry.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

Suicide from Excessive Study.—An inquest was held on Monday at the King's Head, Canterbury street, York-road, before Mr. Carter, on the body of Mr William Alfred Barker, late editor of a Nottingham newspaper. Mr. W. A. Barker was the editor of a provincial newspaper, and that the deceased was his son, and about three weeks ago came to his witness's) residence in Howley street, York road, to proceed from thence to Southampton, for the benefit of his health. He returned in three or four days completely altered. His memory was entirely gone, and he was unable to exercise his mental faculties. On Saturday, witness intended to obtain a certificate as to the state of his mind, in order to place him under restraint, and went out, telling the deceased to follow him, and meet him on Waterloo-bridge, but after waiting a considerable time he became alarmed at his long absence, and returned. He then searched all the rooms in the house for him, and afterwards descended to the coal cellar, where he found him suspended by the neck by means of a rope fastened to the iron grating, and his hands tied in front of his breast. Witness immediately cut him down and sent for surgical assistance, but the deceased was not already dead he died in a few seconds. Witness believed the deranged state of his mind to have been occasioned by his close application to study. About fifteen months ago, when in London, he used to devote so much of his mind to study, that he deprived himself of necessary food and repose. He had made a previous attempt to take his life. Mr. J. J. Stabbins corroborated the last previous evidence, relative to the state of mind of the deceased, the Jury returned a verdict "That the deceased committed suicide whilst in an unsound state of mind."

The Late Fatal Accident on Board the "Moonlight" Steamer.—On Monday evening Mr. Bedford, the Coroner for Westminster and a jury, assembled at the Shakspeare Tavern, Duke-street, Duke-street, Adelphi, to further prosecute the inquiry relative to the death of James Porcell, aged thirteen, who died in consequence of injuries sustained on board the Moonlight, Chelsea steam boat on Monday the 18th ult. An account of the accident has already appeared in our paper. The foreman of the jury delivered a verdict of "Accidental death," with a deodand of 1*d*. on the steamer, and the owners to pay the funeral expenses. Mr. Pier Company should provide more piermen for the protection of the public. The accident occurred at the Hungerford Pier, and the foot, with boot on, was severed from the body, and fell to the water. It did not sink, however, and was carried by the tide as far as Blackwall stairs, off which it was picked up by a waterman, on Wednesday morning.

Fatal Steam-boat Accident at London Bridge Wharf.—On Tuesday night an inquest was held before Mr. W. Payne, at the Newcastle Tavern, St Mary-at Hill, Lower Thames-street, respecting the death of Louisa Frisby, aged twenty eight years. On Sunday evening last, between eight and nine o'clock, the deceased came from Gravesend by the Ruby steam-boat, which was unshipping her passengers at Fresh Wharf, London-bridge. The deceased walked on to a lighter, where she stood waiting for some person. The lighters were rocking very much, owing to the agitated state of the water, when the deceased fell overboard. Every exertion was made to recover the body, but it was not found until Monday morning. Several witnesses stated that the Ruby was most dangerously crowded. It was a dark night, and the accident was attributable to the exact spot at which the Ruby was crowded. The Jury said that the wharf was very excellently conducted, and was the best in London for convenience in landing passengers. The Jury, after a long discussion, in which it was stated that there were 682 passengers on board the Ruby, returned a verdict of "Accidental death."

Suicide of a Middlesex Farmer.—On Tuesday evening, Mr. G. J Mills (aged), who resided at a farm about three miles beyond Hounslow, on the body of Mr. Thomas Layton, aged fifty three years, an extensive farmer, who destroyed himself on the previous day. The inquiry was held at one of the farm-houses on the road, which is situated on the road leading from Hounslow heath to Chertsey, and, from the evidence given, it appeared that the deceased had been in a low, nervous state for some time past, and was frequently in a desponding state. On the morning of the day on which he committed the fatal act, he was somewhat better, and would be more calm. Evidence of "Temporary insanity" having been given, the jury returned a verdict that the deceased destroyed himself while of unsound mind.

Fire at Bow.—Shortly after one o'clock on Wednesday morning a fire broke out in one of the houses of Old Ford lane, Bow, Middlesex, in the occupation of Mr. W. Hollis, a painter and glazier. Notwithstanding the most prompt measures were resorted to, nothing could prevent the entire destruction of Mr. Hollis's property, and the dam-ge of the buildings adjoining. The following is an account of the loss:—Mr. Hollis, painter and glazier—double house, furniture, and stock in trade, entirely consumed; insured in the Phœnix Fire-office. Mr. Broadbridge, grocer—roof of house destroyed, and stock very four damaged by water; insured in the Dissenters' Fire office. Mr. Kennard, butcher—roof damaged by fire, ce lings by water, and household furniture by removal; insured in the Sun Fire-office. Mr. Harvey, coffee-house keeper—furniture damaged by removal; no other losses. The deceased lady attended church on Sunday last, and dined more heartily than usual afterwards, and appeared as well as she had been for the last four or five years About half past nine in the evening, after having prayed at her dressing table, she retired to rest with her husband They reciprocal y said, "Good night—God bless you!" and fell asleep. About half past six, next morning, her husband found his wife cold and dead. He had been awake for more than three hours before without making the discovery. She died lay exactly in her usual sleeping position, and her husband believed she died in her sleep, without the slightest struggle. She was subject to water on the chest. Verdict, "Natural death."

THE QUEEN ON THE RHINE.

By reason of the number of sketches of the Royal Progress on the Rhine, in our Journal of the 23rd ult., we were compelled to omit the accompanying Illustrations.

The first shows her Majesty and suite on board the Fairy steamer, sketched from an elevated position on shore. The Queen is seated in an arm-chair upon deck, and the King of Prussia is pointing out to her Majesty's notice some of the many remarkable objects upon this right Royal river. To the right of the Queen is Prince Albert; the Sovereign being attended by a single general officer in uniform. The scene conveys a correct idea of the entire absence of state from this portion of the Royal tour, and the jouissance by which it has been characterized.

HER MAJESTY'S STEAMER, "THE FAIRY," ON THE RHINE.

St. Goar, a post-town, lying below Rheinfels, the subject of the larger Engraving, lies in the midst of the glories of the Rhine, in sight of some of its finest scenes; and is, therefore, a very desirable spot for tourists to halt in for a day. The views in its vicinity are among the most picturesque in the whole course of the river, and the rocks which hem it on both sides are sublimely wild and precipitous. The Castle of Rheinfels, magnificent in appearance, and interesting from its history, rewards the trouble of the ascent, by the enchanting view which it commands. Another fine view is to be obtained from the summit of the heights above St. Goar, which rise immediately in face of the Lurleiberg.

Near the centre of the town of St. Goar is the Protestant church, built in 1465. In the Catholic church of St. Goar is the rude image of that holy hermit, who, in early times, took up his abode in this spot, while it was still a wilderness, to preach the religion of the Cross to its rude inhabitants, and afterwards gave his name to the town. His shrine is famed for working miracles, and his help is supposed to have rescued many a poor boatman who prayed to him from the perils of the Gewirr (a whirlpool in this part of the river), and the enchantments of Undine, the Nymph of the Lurlei.

On the opposite, or Nassau, bank of the Rhine, at the entrance of the pretty Schweitzer Thal (Swiss Valley), above the village of Goarshausen, rises the very picturesque Castle of the Cat (a contraction of Katzenellnbogen, Cat's Elbow), the name of its original possessors. The view from it is not inferior to that from the left bank. Those who feel an ardour to climb still higher may reach the brow of the Lurlei, and gaze upon the Rhine from the brink of this lofty precipice.

We cannot conclude better than by the following description of the Rhine from the pen of a German; for it serves to illustrate the feelings of pride, and almost veneration, with which the Rhine is regarded in Germany; it is, indeed, looked upon as the national river. The passage is quoted in Mr. Murray's excellent "Handbook of Northern Germany."

"There are rivers whose course is longer, and whose volume of water is greater, but none which unites almost every thing that can render an earthly object magnificent and charming in the same degree as the Rhine. As it flows down from the distant ridges of the Alps, through fertile regions, into the open sea, so it comes down from remote antiquity, associated in every age with momentous events in the history of the neighbouring nations.

"A river which presents so many historical recollections of Roman conquests and defeats, of the chivalric exploits in the feudal periods, of the wars and negociations of modern times, of the coronations of emperors, whose bone repose by its side; on whose borders stand the two grandest monuments of the noble architecture of the middle ages; whose banks present every variety of wild and picturesque rocks, thick forests, fertile plains; vineyards, sometimes gently sloping, sometimes perched among lofty crags, where industry has won a domain among the fortresses of nature; whose banks are ornamented with populous cities, flourishing towns and villages, castles and ruins, with which a thousand legends are connected; with beautiful and romantic roads, and salutary mineral springs; a river whose waters offer choice fish, as its banks offer the choicest wines; which in its course of 900 miles, affords 630 miles of uninterrupted navigation, from Basle to the sea, and enables the inhabitants of its banks to exchange the rich and various products of its shores; whose cities, famous for commerce, science, and works of strength, which furnish protection to Germany, are also famous as the seats of Roman colonies and of ecclesiastical councils, and are associated with many of the most important events recorded in the history of mankind;—such a river, it is not surprising that the Germans regard with a kind of reverence, and frequently call, in poetry, Father or King Rhine."—DR. NEW LINES OF STEAM VESSELS.—New lines of steamers from this country to distant parts of the world are constantly forming. On Wednesday week the Neresby sailed from Liverpool for Constantinople, as the first of a monthly line of steamers between that port and the Turkish capital. Steamers have just begun to run between London and Leghorn, and in a short time the line from Liverpool to Rio and the River Plate will commence operations. British enterprise has now established steam communication with the following countries:—To Russia, Sweden, and Denmark, by the Hull line; to St. Petersburg, to North Germany, by the Hull and London lines to Hamburg, to Holland, Belgium, and France, by the General Steam Company's vessels, to the north and south of Spain and to Portugal, by the Peninsular Company's vessels, to Italy, by the new line from London to Leghorn, to Malta, the Levant, and Constantinople, by the new line from Liverpool, to Egypt, Arabia, Ceylon, India, Sincapore, and China, by the Oriental Steam Company's vessels; to British America and the United States, by the Cunard and Great Western lines from Liverpool, to the West Indies, Mexico, and the North coast of South America, by the West India line, to Peru and Chili, by the West Coast line, to Brazil and the River Plate by the line now building in Liverpool. The only British colonies of any importance which have not now the advantage of steam communication with the mother country are the Cape, the Mauritius, and Australian colonies.

ARRIVAL OF "THE GREAT BRITAIN" STEAM-SHIP AT NEW YORK.

ARRIVAL OF THE "GREAT BRITAIN" STEAM SHIP AT NEW YORK.

Our artist at New York has not omitted to chronicle graphically this very interesting event in steam navigation. It appears that the monster vessel arrived safely in the Bay of New York on the afternoon of Sunday, the 10th of August, after a passage of 14 days and 21 hours. She was telegraphed at noon, but she was not positively known by the public generally to be near till about two o'clock, when thousands upon thousands of the New Yorkers proceeded in continued streams towards every spot from which a view of her might be obtained. There had been many false rumours of her approach, and some anxiety had begun to be felt at her non-arrival on Sunday morning.

The Times Correspondent gives the subjoined very interesting details of her arrival:—

"A regular New York August sun was pouring down almost intolerable heat, and the water gleamed like molten silver. Amongst a fleet of small steamers and River craft was the 'big ship,' a Triton amongst the minnows. She was approaching the Battery, and seemed to be steering for the North River, but when she had shown herself to the thousands who thronged the promenade by the Castle garden—perhaps the most magnificent city promenade in the world—she turned, as on a pivot, and slowly steamed over to the Brooklynshore, and then passed gracefully below the heights, which, together with the Gowanns shores, the masts of shipping, the tops of houses, and, indeed, every spot which commanded a view of the river, were crowded. She then went on slowly to her wharf, at the foot of Clinton-street, where she was moored in safety.

"It was not until she got opposite the Battery that her great size made any impression on the spectators. As she passed the North Carolina man-of war her great length was apparent, but I did not think she looked very elegant with her six low masts. The graceful rig of the American vessels is well known, and the Great Britain contrasted unfavourably in the opinion of many. Nevertheless she was heartily welcomed, although there was no cheering, the day forbade any demonstration of the kind.

"As the ship entered the harbour she was gaily dressed with colours which streamed from each of her masts. At the gaff the large union flag of England floated gaily in the breeze, the first mast had the Austrian flag; the second mast the Russian; the third, the Spanish; the fourth, the French tricolour; the main, the union-jack; at the foremast a blended flag of England and America, the stars of the latter country blending with the blue, white, and red, of the union of England, and at the lower quartering the stripes.

"Captain Hoskin informed me that nothing of any importance occurred on the voyage out; the passengers seemed all pleased with the accommodations, and spoke in the very highest terms of Captain Hoskin as a gentleman and a sailor. They remarked on the very slight vibratory motion in the Great Britain as compared with that produced by paddle-wheels, and seemed confident as to the ultimate success of the ship."

On Monday, the Great Britain was opened to the public at the rate of 25 cents a-head, and 12½ cents extra to the engine-room; and thousands poured into New York to see the "big ship."

The following is an analysis of the voyage:—

	Nautical Miles.
The distance from Liverpool to the South Stack Light-house off Holyhead is	72
Thence to the Tuskar Lighthouse	90
From the Tuskar Light to Cape Clear	134
Cape Clear to New York	3008
Whole Distance from Liverpool to New York ..	3304

The Great Britain steamed this distance, against foul winds and cross seas, in 14¾ days, or 354 hours, giving an average speed for the whole voyage of somewhat more than 9½ knots or nautical miles (which is equal to 10¾ statute miles, per hour. From unquestionable data in possession of her Majesty's Government, it can be proved that neither the Halifax nor the West India steam packets have been able to maintain in their outward passages (say for a period of six months) an average speed equal to what has been achieved by the Great Britain on her first voyage to New York; although many instances may have occurred in which a homeward passage, made under favourable circumstances, has shown (as in the last voyage of the Cambria) an average speed of 10½ knots or nautical miles per hour.

Our artist has sketched the leviathan vessel passing Fort Hamilton and the Narrows. In the foreground are the crowd of spectators, and the battery of enormous guns; next is Fort Diamond; then the six-masted steamer; beyond her Staten Island; and, in the offing, numerous steam-boats and ships meeting the huge vessel.

CAPTURE OF A PIRATE SLAVER.

In our naval intelligence of last week, we detailed this gallant engagement between the boats of H. M. S. Pantaloon, and a piratical slaver, off the western coast of Africa, on the 26th of May last. We have since been favoured with a sketch of the affair, taken by Commander E. Wilson; and beneath it appears this brief record of the result: "After a stout resistance of half-an-hour, the slaver was boarded, and carried by the boats, with a loss of two killed and eight wounded; the slaver having seven killed and seven wounded, amongst which number was the captain."

We can only add our congratulation to our correspondent on the satisfactory termination of this intrepidity in the cause of oppressed humanity.

CAPTURE OF A PIRATE SLAVER, ON THE WESTERN COAST OF AFRICA.

GEORGE HUDSON, ESQ., M.P.

Mr. Hudson, "the Railway King," was, until recently, a linendraper at York, of which city he has been twice Lord Mayor. In his business he realised some fortune, and inherited more by a bequest. His career in railway enterprise has been, it is well known, attended with unprecedented success, attributable, in no trivial degree, to his ability, judgment, and integrity. One Company granted him, we understand, £30,000, in recompense for his admirable management of their affairs. At present his wealth is enormous; and he has purchased within the last year a considerable estate from the Duke of Devonshire.

Mr. Hudson enjoys unbounded popularity in his own district, and people of all ranks would be glad to confide any sum of money to his discretion and speculative enterprise. His sudden rise has not blunted his naturally kind disposition. It is related of him, that, visiting a brother tradesman, whose fortunes had been the reverse of his own, he proposed to him the purchase of shares in a particular railroad he named, at which his poor friend smiled in derision, asserting his utter want of means, and consequent incapacity to avail himself of the offer. "Never mind," said Hudson, "I will arrange that for you;" and in a brief period he called again on his old associate with a cheque for several thousand pounds, the fruits of the speculation.

We find in the York Herald the following tribute to Mr. Hudson's worth:—"We are glad of the opportunity of thus noticing superior talent in a political opponent. As a citizen and neighbour, we have known Mr. Hudson for many years; and, whether in private life—in the Mansion house, as Chief Magistrate of the City—or in his more arduous engagements in the railroad world—we have ever found that though his politics (to us) were objectionable, yet his course was always straightforward, and highly honourable."

In proof of the extent of Mr. Hudson's railway enterprise, it may be stated that in the Parliamentary Return of Persons Subscribing to Railway Contracts, for which Bills were presented during the late Session, the total amount of Mr. Hudson's subscription is £319,835; and his interest in one railway (Newcastle and Berwick) amounts to £300,000. The extent of Mr. Hudson's railway connections may be illustrated by the following circumstance:—

In a late Committee of the House of Lords, he was requested to point out the different railways in which he was interested; this he did, with much good-humour, commencing at Bristol on one side, and Rugby on the other, and proceeding northward as far as Edinburgh, adding, that he was either chairman or director on almost all the railways in that great extent of country.

A short time since, at York, he thus adverted to some of the evils of rapid legislation:—"He feared that railway accidents would become much more frequent, when he saw the Legislature, as they had done this session, sanctioning lines with gradients so bad that they would require the locomotive engine behind as well as before. He almost shuddered for the consequences."

Mr. Hudson's recent return to Parliament for the borough of Sunderland will be freely in the recollection of our readers. He led Conservative pub-ciples; but, in one of his addresses, "he pledged himself, if sent to Parliament, to act as an independent member, seeking only to promote the welfare of the country. He had sprung from the people; to his own exertions he owed any wealth or influence which he might possess, and for the promotion of the interests of the people, he was determined to use his utmost efforts."

OTELLO.

A TALE OF THE OPERA.

(See page 138 col. 1.—"As sure as Othello is announced, Desdemona will be disabled.")

The old man stopped, and looked on his guests, as if to observe the effect o what he had read; they were silent, and the manager turned the leaves of the large volume till he came to a later date. He again read:—

"'The 16th of January, 1779, for the benefit of Mdlle. Koller, "Othello, the Moor of Venice." The Princess Elizabeth died on the 24th of January. Again is judgment. He visits the sins of the fathers upon the children, even to the third and fourth generation.'

"And granting things have so happened," said the Major; "it can only be that the caprice of accident has produced the coincidence. Give me but one reasonable circumstance to prove that these deaths occurred because 'Othello was played.'"

"That I cannot do," said the Manager; "but I remember me of the words of that great genius of which the fatal tragedy was the creation—'There are more things in heaven and earth, than are dreamt of in our philosophy.'"

"I know the passage well," replied the Major; "and I believe Shakspeare would never have penned it had he known how many absurdities would be sheltered under its authority."

"It is possible," said the Manager. "But hear further. I come now to a somewhat more recent instance, one which I can remember myself: that of the Duke RUSSELL."

"How! the same by whom the actress was murdered?"

"The same. Twenty years passed away and "Othello" was never acted; but I remember it as if it were but yesterday. Some foreign Prince and his family paid a visit to the ducal residence. They were pleased with our theatre; and, I know not how it came about, but one of the Princesses wished to have 'Otho lo' played. The Duke was very unwilling to consent, not from fear of the dread event that had always followed it, for he was one of those who believed neither in augurs nor in spirits, and had always laughed to scorn the general impression that had grown up from the occurrences in his own family. But he was now an aged man, and the crimes and profligacy of his youth weighed heavily on his heart: and he really had, though he would never own it, an utter aversion to this play But whether he did not wish to offend the Princess by a refusal, or whether he feared to show the public that he was afraid of its opinion, the piece was ordered to be got up in all haste, and it was acted a his country residence on the 16th of October, 1793."

"And what followed?" asked the friends impatiently.

Eight days afterwards, on the 24th of October, the Duke died."

"Impossible?" said the Major, after a pause of silence. "Let me see your Chronicle; where is the note of anything about the Duke; there is nothing written in this page"

"No," said the old man, taking two books from a recess; "but here are his 'Geography' and his 'Funeral Oration' will you examine them?"

The Count took a small black-coloured volume and read—"Description of the Solemn Interment of the late Duke and Prince Von ——, who died on the 24th day of October, 1793." It is a silent witness, but a strong one, and might well convince me against my reason; but it is accident, all accident, and nothing else. Now, know you another such an example?"

"I could tell you some other instances," said the old man quietly, "but you are getting weary with their summons; but listen to one more case only of the most recent date Rossini wrote his glorious opera, in which he proved what many had doubted, that he could touch the deepest and saddest chords of sympathy in the human heart. His theme and its name, as you may imagine, did not produce any great favour in a high quarter here, and 'Otello' was not placed in the repertoire of our opera, of which I was then the chief censor. The amateurs of the town, however, had played some of the scenes at different concerts, and these few pieces awakened a desire in the public to hear the whole opera, then delighting all the capitals of Europe. Of the fatal events that had always accompanied the tragedy nothing was said; it seemed a general belief that, in the form of an opera, it was another 'Otello' altogether, and that the spell of music would charm the avenging Spirit from its unrelenting purpose At last, the Manager received an order to produce 'Otello:' it was cast and rehearsed, I myself performing the Moor. The house was crowded to suffocation, the Court, the Nobility, the world of fashion, and of beauty; the orchestra played with enthusiasm, and the company left nothing to be deserted. It was a brilliant scene, Gentlemen; but yet there was something that weighed uneasily on all our spirits—an evil influence seemed to surround us, which increased as the play proceeded, and became really painful when Desdemona preparing herself to go to rest, sang to the harp that mournful song of foreboding, while her murderer, the ruthless Moor, drew near. It was the same house, the same stage, the same scene, as that in which a lovely creature lost her life so miserably; and I must confess, that, though I knew I was but playing a part, a slight tremor seized me, as, at the end of the fearful scene, I approached the bed, and looked anxiously towards the Prince's box, from whence so many blooming and elegant beings were looking at our performance. "Will thou be appeased, thou fatal Spirit, by this sweetness of the strains that have accompanied thy deadly?" I thought. And it seemed as if it were even so; for five, six days passed, and nothing was heard of any sickness at the castle. People laughed that it should have required only the elegance of an opera to charm away the spirit of the Duke of Evil. The seventh day passed quietly, but the eighth came,—and Prince Ferdinand was killed in a great shooting party in the park!"

"I have heard of the occurrence, said the Major, but it was an accident; the piece of a gentleman who stood near him suddenly went off, and"—

"And I say that again the Avenger wrought retribution in the race of the murder of blood: the poisoned chalice was commenced again in the lips of those who prepared it! I speak of events that cannot be explained, but which exhibit a mysterious and invariable connection."

"And where is it written that 'Otello' was played eight days before the shooting party?"

"Here!" said the Manager, as calmly, but as much certainty as a merchant would point to an entry in his ledger—"here!"

The Count read:—

"'Otello,' an opera by Rossini; 18th of March"

On the eighth, underlined with three strokes, were the words —

"20th of March; the Prince Ferdinand killed by the discharge of a fowling piece, while shooting."

The two friends looked at each other for some moments in silence; they appeared as if they wished to smile, but the earnestness of the old man, and the strange concurrence of each fatal event with the cause he alleged for it, had made a deeper impression on them both than they were willing themselves to admit. The Major turned over the leaves of the Chronicle, as if musing on its contents: the Count had buried his face in his hands, and seemed sunk in a still deeper reverie. At last he arose, "and all this avails you nothing," he said; "the opera must be played; the whole Court, all the Ambassadors, already know it is intended, and shall be laughed at if our purpose is shaken by such tales as these. Here are four hundred ducats, the gold of lovers of music who wish to see 'Otello' given in perfection. Spend them as you think fit for the purpose, and"—he added with a laugh—"retain an exorcist or magician to lay your spirit, have a whole circle full of witches if you will, but, at all events, give us 'Otello!'"

"Gentlemen," said the old man, "it is possible that in my youth I too may have laughed and jested at such tales; but age has taught me to be thoughtful, and I have learned that there are many things that must not be rejected without consideration. I thank you for your gift, and I will expend it so as to satisfy those who send it But only on those peculiar orders will I produce Otello Oh, Heaven!" said he, mournfully, "if the stroke should again descend, and that dear, gentle, beautiful creature, the Princess Sophia, be the victim!"

"Peace!" exclaimed the Count, growing deadly pale; "your childish stories are infectious, and with listening to them one might fear to walk about in the broad day light. Adieu! I do not forget that you promised to have my opera played. Make me no professional excuses of colds, or sudden indispositions, and unforeseen obstacles, for I know exactly their meaning and their worth; and, by Hell! if you can get no performer, I will summon a dozen of the most murdered Fandarium, that she may herself play the leading part once more!"

The old man crossed himself, and walked up and down uneasily. "What reckless ness," said he, "if the spirit of the Duke does not hear the Don's banquet! Do not talk thus, I beg of you! Who can tell how near Death may be standing to all of us"

The friends departed, and, shaking off the feeling that had for a moment oppressed them, laughed at the whole affair, the old foreboding Manager, with his cap and fur slippers, serving them during their walk home as a butt for many a jest, which were the semblance of mirth, if it did not contain its essence.

VI

There were times and hours in which the Major could not recognise in the Count his old frank comrade and companion in arms. If he was sometimes gay, lively, beaming with wit and humour, captivating his company by his anecdote, and winning even the serious by a fine and delicate vein of thought—which he could strike even in his liveliest sallies—so there were moments when he was completely the reverse. Moody, silent and reserved in his replies, his eyes were sunk on the earth, his lips compressed; gradually his mood would grow darker, he would clench his hands, and, if spoken to, replied harshly and wildly. The Major had already observed that these were the moments when I was necessary to draw him away from the company, for in a few minutes he would lose his self-command, take offence at every innocent remark, and rage and rave like a madman. The Major was, with this, the bad Company he gained great influence over him, which he now exercised to repress these outbreaks of passion; but in the retirement of his chamber they became still more terrible; there he raved, cursed in the bitterness of every language, accused himself, and then would weep bitterly. "Am I not a wretch—a despised, miserable wretch!—he once exclaimed in one of these fits of passion—"to trample on every oath, to break every duty, to cast aside the truest affections that ever possessed, to break a heart whose whole trust and dependence is on me! I thoughtlessly have I wounded that heart, and with trifling with my happiness, because I dreamed in my folly of being a second Kotzebue—and am now nothing but a fool, rejected and despised by all men! And thus to repay such love—such self-sacrifice and truth!"

"I, Major, used every means of consolation: "Did you not say that the Princess loved you first? Could she expect any other feeling from you than that which your acquaintance permitted?"

"Ha! why remind me of her?" said the Count. "She, she, too, is betrayed! How child like in her innocence she was when I, like a destroyer, crossed her path! I gazed on her white yet the brightness of a youth, to which sorrow was unknown, beamed from her eyes! Then again my levity beset me; I forgot all my good resolves—all to which I ought alone to have listened: I plunged into a torrent of passion, and drew unconscious the veil of oblivion?" He wept—remembrance seemed in some degree to console him. "And could I—could I," he murmured, "then forsake her? I felt, I saw, I read it in her eyes, that she loved me. Could I fly from her? Could I not remain the morning dearer of love in the blush upon her cheek, when the first glance of conscious affection fell on me, as if appealing to me for its return? Could I then have left her?"

"And who prolongs all this?" said the Major. "Where lives the man who could resist such an appeal?"

"And when I dared to tell her how I worshipped her; when she, ground in her affection, confessed her love; when our hearts spoke to each other in that silent language Love teaches so well, and learns so soon; when one glance, one moment's pressure of the hand, tells more than words can express; when one dwells a whole day on the anticipation of an evening, the morning dearer of love when one lives upon the memory of that brief moment till evening comes again: could I so part,—to meet and then leave her for ever?"

"And who prolongs all this?" said the Major. "It had been hard, indeed, to have rejected a love which thus sacrificed all rank and station. I wish there had been more prudence; but I think all is not yet lost."

The Count appeared not to hear him; he let tears flowed faster: his eyes seemed gazing deeper into the past.

"And when she spoke of how I might obtain her hand when she permitted me to imprint a kiss upon her princely brow—when the lips, whose lightest wishes were commands to a whole people, were pressed to mine—when the pride of the princess was lost in the affection of the woman—then—then—Oh! how could I fly from her?"

"You ought to be a happy man, Count. Even in this mystery itself, there must be a peculiar fascination. Why do you so curse such an attachment? Calm yourself; the opinion of the world may be a thing very indifferent to you when you are both happy, for in reality the circumstances are not so desperate as they seem to be."

The Count had listened to him, but his eye was lered, his brow grew darker, Le ground his teeth, as if in excess of agony. "Judge me not so" he said, "if do not deserve it: I am a villain whom you ought to hate and scorn! Oh! that I could purchase forgetfulness that I could blot whole years from my memory! I will—I must forget, or I shall go mad! Give me wine, comrade, I will drink; there are flames raging within me; I will drink, that I may drown at once both memory and thought."

The Major was a cool, reflecting man: he heard very calmly these bursts of repentance, and self-accusation. "He is light-headed," he said to himself: "I have known him somewhat thus of late; and men by easily from one extreme to the other He now sees crime in his attachment, because it may bring reproach on the rank of the Princess; in the next moment, he will be rapt with delight of its mysteries."

The wine was brought, and the Major filled the glasses: the Count drank several draughts in succession, and walked rapidly up and down the room, but his violence began to subside; he stopped before his friend, seated himself, and walked up and down as before The Major would not break his silent mood, he sipped his wine, looking over his glass at the movements of his friend

"Major," said the Count, at last, throwing himself into a seat, "what feeling of the mind do you consider the most terrible?"

The Major still sipped his wine thoughtfully, and, after a pause, said—"The sense of honour is the greatest; it gives the greatest pleasure, it is also capable of producing the greatest pain; I hold wounded honour to be the most insupportable of all feelings."

The Count laughed bitterly: "Get back the fees you paid the metaphysical professor who taught you so badly, for you have been robbed of them! Wounded honour! Does your knowledge of the soul go no deeper than this? Wounded honour is conscious of the injury, and in consciousness is life, though it may be life in pain; in the heart there still exists the feeling that can rise superior to the injury, or repay it on him who inflicted it; it has the possibility of making that honour again pure and stainless. But go deeper yet, comrade: what feeling of the soul is still more unendurable?"

"I have said of one," replied the Major, but it is a feeling which men like you and I, Count—know not, it is called self-contempt!"

The Count trembled, and turned pale; he stood gazing on his friend for some time in silence, and then, with a voice of deep emotion, he asked—"Has he ought not to know what is called self-contempt; but the devil spreads skilfully his snares on earth, and ere man sees them he is caught! Have you ever felt the pain of self-contempt?"

"No, thank heaven, I have never experienced it; my path always went straight to the goal!"

"Then, have you been happy! Yet do you remember the morning we rode together out to the gate of Warsaw? Our thoughts, our movements, belonged to the great spirit of that leader who subdued the minds of all men to his will; but to whom did your thoughts belong? Were you happy in your devotion to a native air, which, when we were boys, inflamed us with a passionate love of our country, and every note thrl led again through our breasts, though we were mad ed at hearing the hosts of the stranger; to whom, at that moment, comrade, did our hearts belong?"

"To Poland! to Poland!" said the Major, with enthusiasm. "Yes, then—then it seemed like folly and madness to think otherwise."

"Possibly" said the Major; "but man has the strength to remain steadfast to the part he has chosen"

"Ay, that is it," said the Count; "man has it, or ought to have; but when bereft of that, he sinks at last to—self-contempt! And why should I seem better than I am? Comrade, you are a man of honour—fly me as you would a pestilence! for honour's sake, fly me! You are a man of firmness; despise me, for I despise myself; know that I am"—

"Peace!" said his friend, interrupting him; "there is some one at the door. Come in"

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

THE COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF AT PORTSMOUTH.—The declining health of Admiral Sir Charles Rowley, Bart., has induced that gallant officer to intimate his intention to retire in a few days from the command in chief at Portsmouth, in which he will be succeeded by Admiral Sir Charles Ogle, who has accepted the appointment.

SIR HENRY POTTINGER.—It is stated that Major-General Sir Henry Pottinger, who is now on a tour of inspection with Lady Pottinger, will receive the colonelcy of the 75th Foot, rendered vacant by the decease of Sir William Houston

THE LATE CAPTAIN ROBERT MAUNSELL, C.B.—We have to announce the death of Captain Robert Maunsell, C B , a Commissioner of Greenwich Hospital. Captain Maunsell was a gallant and distinguished officer, and was very much esteemed.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—The present week's arrivals of wheat, of home produce, constwise, as well as by land carriage, have been very moderate, say from 3,000 quarters, about a moiety of which has been produced this year. The quality of the new wheat on show to-day was in general fine, and the condition thereof remarkably good. Some six or seven parcels of the parcels weighed 64 lb per bushel. The supply of old English wheat not being large, and the demand for it rather somewhat on the increase, the demand for that article was steady, at prices fully equal to those obtained on Monday. In new wheats only a moderate business was done, at from 40s to 42s for Essex and Kent, and as much as 44s for Suffolk, Norfolk, and Yorkshire qualities. A large quantity of foreign wheat has been received this week, the total import having reached 19,000 quarters. Selected qualities moved off steadily, other kinds slowly, at previous figures. The duty has now fallen 17s per quarter, but as yet no parcels have been entered for home consumption. In corn, under lock, very little was done, yet holders would not submit to lower prices. Very little barley was on show. Grinding parcels were in request at full prices; in other kinds comparatively little was doing. Malt was in moderate demand, and at a full sale, and where sales were pressed a slight decline in value was submitted to. From Ireland the arrivals have consisted of 2,000 quarters of oats, 400 of barley, 200 of wheat, [illegible] quarters of flour, 3,231 sacks; malt, 1,490 quarters.

English.—Wheat, Essex, and Kent, red, 36s to 38s, ditto, white, 38s to 42s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 42s to 45s, ditto, white, 45s to 47s, rye, 32s to 33s, grinding barley, 23s to 25s; distilling, 25s to 26s; malting ditto, 30s to 32s, Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 50s to 52s; brown ditto, 48s to 49s, Kingston and Ware, 52s to 53s, Chevalier, 54s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 2s to 2s 2d, potato ditto, 2s 4d to 2s 6d; Scotch and Cork, black, 22s to 23s, ditto, white, 24s to 25s, thick beans, new, 32s to 40s, ditto, old, 40s to 42s; grey peas, 34s to 36s, maple, 35s to 37s, white, 37s to 39s, per quarter Grey peas, 40s to 42s, Suffolk, Stockton, and Yorkshire 42s to 44s, per 504 lb. Foreign—Wheat, Dantzic, red, 42s to 45s, white, 47s to 49s, Marks, barley, 22s to 24s, oats, new, 17s to 18s, ditto, feed, 16s to 17s; beans, 32s to —; peas, 32s to —, per quarter. Flour, American, 22s to 23s; Baltic, 19s to 20s, per barrel.

The Seed Market.—Several parcels of new mustard seed have appeared in the market, but to very middling condition. In most kinds of seeds only a moderate business is doing at late rates.

Sugar.—West India Sugar has been in good request, at fully last week's quotations East India, Mauritius, and Bourbon qualities have changed hands to a fair extent, at previous rates, fine sifted with refined goods rather easier rates have been accepted. Brown lumps are selling at 53s, and standard do, 56s to 58s per cwt.

Coffee.—Very few parcels have been submitted to public competition since our last. The demand for the trade has been extremely limited, at the following rates for ordinary to fine native Ceylon, in bond. Good ordinary Ceylon is selling at 42s per cwt

Indigo.—Owing to the agricultural disturbances, of late date, there is very little inclination manifested to purchase

Spices.—Owing to the large arrivals of foreign parcels, the demand for Irish butter is heavy, at a further slight depression in the quotations. Dutch butter is quiet at 80s to 85s for fine, and 70s to 80s for middling qualities. In other descriptions only a limited extent of business is transacted, at former rates. Prime sucking Waterford is producing 96s to 98s; interior ditto, 90s to 94s; prime Limerick, 94s to 96s; Irish landed, 90s to 92s; ditto, 86s to 88s; fine prime Cork Limericks, 90s to 92s for Belfast, and 86s for Westmoreland. BUSHMEN CHILDREN, EGYPTIAN HALL, PICCADILLY.

BUSHMEN CHILDREN.

Two Bushmen (Bushies-men) Children have lately been brought from the interior of Africa, and are now exhibiting some feats at the Egyptian Hall, in Piccadilly. They are a girl and a boy, not related to each other: the female is thirty two inches high, and eight years old; and the male only forty-four inches in height, though nearly full grown, and sixteen years of age. They wear the dress of their tribe (Hottentots); they throw a spear, dance, &c.; the Bushman, as a Corporal of the Army, goes through the Manual and Platoon Exercises; and the Bush girl appears as a Soldier's Wife; and their several feats are very amusing. Their parents are stated to have been murdered by Kaffirs, who pursue and exterminate the Bushman Tribe with unrelenting ferocity: they were rescued by a Dutch Trader, and taken to Cape Town, whence they have been brought to this country. We hope they may here receive many visitors: the season, it is true, is somewhat unpropitious for sights; to the Ethnographers, in a scientific point of view, these specimens of a "pigmy race" may be especially interesting.

The Whirlwind at Rouen.—A few days ago, at the Paris Academy of Sciences, M. Arago communicated some curious facts, derived from investigations, respecting the extraordinary meteor which caused such dire effects at Rouen. The disastrous visitation commenced in the valley of Malaunay and the valley of Monville, about half-past twelve o'clock in the day, by the rapid shock of winds and clouds striking in opposite directions, preceded by gusts of an extraordinarily hot wind, equally remarked at Paris, and so burning, that the mistress of an inn, although standing before a kitchen fire, felt it, as well as many other persons, on all of whom it produced a most oppressive effect. Similar electrical phenomena soon followed. It was remarked that the whirlwind presented the shape of an inverted cone, of which the point looked red. It did not proceed in a right line, but zig-zag, and particularly in the direction where there were masses of iron or steel, such as factories, leaving untouched the intermediate spaces. What is more extraordinary, it only struck parts of the same house, those parts having quantities of ironwork, leaving untouched the parts which had little or none. Trees of a century were in some places twisted, in others torn up, and in other places broken. But the most remarkable feature of the whole was this, that a quantity of substances, some of great weight, such as planks of wood, five feet in length, were sucked up into the air, and carried to a distance of nine leagues, after a journey of seven hours. While the tempest was at its height, the barometer fell 17 millimetres, a fact proved by Professor Freiser. This philosopher does not doubt that the phenomenon was essentially electric. During the passage of the whirlwind, from which flashes of lightning played, some persons smelled a sulphurous odour, and heard a rolling noise—workmen felt themselves moved to and fro, while flames flashed before their eyes. Bits of burned cotton and other materials were found, although there had been no conflagration. Several cooking spits were magnetised. Of the killed, some showed no mark of external injury; many showed rapid signs of decomposition; and, altogether there can be no doubt that the cause was of an electric nature.

WEST INDIA PINE APPLES.

The attempt made last year to import into this country Pine-apples, from the West Indies, was attended with such success as to induce speculators to improve the culture. This was, indeed, requisite; for some of the specimens were acrid enough to set the teeth on edge. We last year engraved "the new articles," en masse, and now we present our readers with the mode of retailing them in the streets of the metropolis—just as cherries have been cried and sold some 200 years since, when Herrick sang. This is certainly another step in the ladder of luxury—"Pine apples a penny a slice!" We perceive that a writer in Jerrold's Magazine for the present month has turned this great "social change" to account, in a sketch entitled "Pine-apple Shot;" in which the pride of a certain Mrs. Pratt lies in "It is a fruit which never can become common. A present of one is a present; and ours, people are good enough to say, are peculiarly well grown!" But, Time turns Pratts old, Pratt dies, and many years afterwards, the Pines of Pratt Park lose caste: the old lady, in a fit of infatuation, unmindful of what had been passing in this Great World, journeys to London with "a black Jamaica," to present to her Majesty. On her road to the hotel, Mrs. Pratt's chaise "runs into a New Providence cart, with the tempting and strange cry—'Pins-apples! New Providence Pines! a penny a slice!' She had seen it—heard it—smelt it—no, not tasted it! That uneasy resolution to go up to London, and 'pay her duty,' had, then, been but a rushing to her doom!" The poor little lady did not long survive the shock—but died of a discharge of "Pine apple Shot!" "The knell of the ancient gentlewoman is tolled! Post-chaises are crumbling, and Pine-apples sold in the streets for a penny a slice!" It is really a very pungent piece of satire.

Jesting apart, the Pine trade has already become permanently established in one week upwards of 11,000 pine apples have been sold by one house!—averaging from 1s to 3s. each; and the same brokers have sold 140,000 this season. Meanwhile, they have been cried by cartloads and barrowfulls through the streets for sale! We ourselves saw a cartload in New Bondstreet, surrounded by a chaperone host, and a footman clambering for a fine purchase! Had Brummell seen this, he would have henceforth classed pines with "the hot, intoxicating liquor"—port.

We learn from Smyrna that, on the 27th ult., as the Minerve frigate was getting under way from Ourlac, to follow the Duke de Montpensier to Smyrna, her commander, Captain Granet, while standing on the forecastle, directing the manœuvres, was struck by a block which fell from the rigging on the head, and killed almost instantaneously. His body was taken to Smyrna, and buried with all the honours due to his rank.

"PINE-APPLES, A PENNY A SLICE"

THE HESKETH FLEETWOOD TESTIMONIAL.

Some time since, a public meeting was held at Poulton, to present to Sir P. Hesketh Fleetwood, Bart., M.P., some testimonial of the high estimation in which he is held in the neighbourhood of Rossall, where Sir Hesketh and his family have long resided. A subscription was opened for the above purpose, and the list ultimately contained the names of between three and four hundred of the worthy baronet's neighbours residing in the townships of Poulton, Thornton, Bispham, and Blackpool, and of a few other friends connected with the district.

A piece of plate was chosen by the Committee, selected from a number of designs furnished by Jones and Fryer, Cornhill, London. It consists of a very splendid silver vase and cover, of 140 guineas value. It is of the Etruscan form, with a highly-finished medallion on the front, representing the figure of Victory awarding the wreath of laurel to the successful candidate for fame; on the other side, a medallion with a short appropriate inscription; above these are elegant wreaths of grape and vine leaves, with handsome intertwined oak handles, most skilfully executed. On the top of the cover is the wheatsheaf, Sir Hesketh's crest, and singularly emblematic of the corn district in which his admirers reside. This superb testimonial was presented a few days since.

THE HESKETH FLEETWOOD TESTIMONIAL.

CHESS.

To Correspondents.—"Dick Tinto." You will find some admirable problems, o the "scandal kind," both in D'Orville's "Small Collection of Problems," published at Altona; and in Brake's "Almanack for the Amateurs of Chess Play," printed at Altona. From the last we have extracted the two following:—Place the men thus—White. K at Q R sq, Q at her Kt 5th, R at Q Kt 2nd, Kt at K R 4th; Black. K at his 8th, B at Q B 8th, Kt at K Kt 5th, Pawns at Q R 5th. Here White compels Black to checkmate him in nine moves. Again—White: K at his R. sq, Q at her R 6th, R at K R 8th, R at Q Kt 2nd, Kt at Q B 8th; Black: K at Q B 4th, Q at K Kt 2nd, B at K 2nd, B at K Kt 6th, Pawns at K R 5th, K Kt 4th, and K 4th White now compels Black to checkmate him in eleven moves.

"P. W. P."—In Mr. Kuiper's problem of last week, by simply placing the White Q R P on the 4th sq, instead of the 3rd, you have a perfect and very ingenious stratagem. Without this amendment we confess it appears to us impossible to effect the mate in five moves.

"J. S. M."—We cannot spare time to examine problems which come unaccompanied with their solutions.

"W. V."—Is unsuitable. Three problems and two games are surely an ample allowance, considering the limited space allotted for Chess in our paper. Why does he not stop his craving with the "Chess Player's Chronicle" as well, which is all chess from the first page to the last?

"H. T.," Hartlepool.—"Chess Players' Chronicle," or Lewis's "Second Series of Chess Lessons."

"J. H. K."—"Rules for the Double Game of Chess" may be got from Sherwin, the chess-men former, Great Queen-street, Lincoln's-inn.

"Observer," Greenwich.—Bilguer and Heydebrandt's "Hand-book of Chess," which you may obtain at any of the respectable foreign booksellers.

"W. B. H."—In the second and third problem, published under the head of "Hawthorn," in last week's No., the mate must be given with the K Kt pawn and no with a Queen. They would be simple enough otherwise.

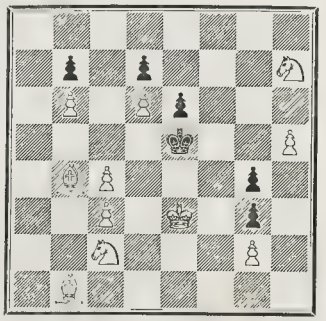
Solutions by "R. R.," "A. W.," "Nonius," "W. B. H.," "J. W. H.," "F. G.," "B. S. H.," and "J. B." (who is requested to pay the postage of his future communications), are correct. Those by "Alpha," "N. H. O.," "P. Simple," "Q. G." are all wrong.

Problem, No. 85.

For this very clever little stratagem, the invention of a young English amateur, we are indebted to the Honorary Secretary of the London Chess Club.

White playing first is to mate in four moves.

BLACK.



WHITE.

Solution to Problem, No. 84.

WHITE.	BLACK.
1. Q to K B's 6th (ch)	K takes Q or *
2. Kt to K's 8th (ch)	K to his 4th
3. B to Q's 4th (ch)	K takes R

1. Kt to K B's 6th, and, play as Black can, he must be mated with the K Kt. Pawn next move.

CLOSE OF THE TOUR.

MEDAL IN COMMEMORATION OF HER MAJESTY'S VISIT TO GERMANY.

On Wednesday her Majesty landed in her own dominions, after an absence of a little more than a month. The period is brief enough; but, if measured by events and incidents, far more memorable than many a year that has passed over the heads of former Sovereigns in the regal seclusion and uniform splendour of Windsor. History may be searched in vain for another instance in which the wearer of the Crown of England has so travelled or been so received. The whole tour was a continued pageant; all the better in its effect that it was everywhere a demonstration of the people, not an act of the State. There have been meetings of Kings and interviews of Potentates where more splendour was exhibited, but there never was an instance in which many territories and peoples united in rendering one demonstration of welcome to the Queen of the Island Realm.

Each following day
Became the next day's master, till the last
Made former wonders its.

From town to town, from kingdom to kingdom, it may almost be said that the Queen's step was upon flowers, her road beneath arcs of triumph; even the night was made brilliant by splendours not its own, and on river and mountain the aid of art was invoked to light "the darkness of their scenery." We may read of the glories of the "Field of the Cloth of Gold," but they have no such interest as this fresh chapter given to the Romance of History. There the trappings of State covered suspicion and mistrust, and hid the designs of Ministers who played with their Kings as with puppets; the mutual confidence there paraded was but assumed, and events soon proved its insincerity. Now, when Monarchs meet, state-craft is dropped, and there is no parade: Royalty meets Royalty in its every-day dress, travelling in the common ways of common men, giving to the steamer and the railway car a freight that bears with it the hopes and interests of nations, without the armed guard that on state occasions doth hedge a King, as if force were a crown's divinity! How different from the times when a Duke of Austria could seize a Richard of England on his road, shut him in a tower like one of the hundreds whose ruins deck the Rhine, and keep him there till discovered by accident and a song, and ransomed by something more substantial than the notes of Blondel—or the Bank! Verily the world is changed, and happily as much for the people as their rulers. It will change yet more for both; and the events of the past month may yet prove marks of the progress.

Having endeavoured to describe the scenes of the chief of those events both by pen and pencil, it may not be amiss ere their interest departs, they suffer that "not thinking on" which awaits even more important matters, to take a brief review of the whole occurrence. There is much in it worth some reflection, on more general grounds than we have yet seen touched upon.

In the first place, what is the effect or result of these Royal Visits, and the attention they excite as to places and persons, of whom, but for them, little or nothing would be heard? Scarcely any, or none at all, on events, but a good deal on opinion. Vast masses of the English people read nothing but the newspapers; they have little time, often less inclination, for anything else Books must be sought for; the newspaper is like the Sybil's leaf, and is borne, as it were on the winds, to the hands of almost every man. If the information it affords corrects some errors, and removes some prejudices, is not this something gained in the way of a better knowledge of each other—the want of which has so often made enemies of different races of mankind? Our insular position has too long preserved among us a vast amount of national prejudice, which knowledge of other countries alone can soften. The educated and travelled man is free from them; but the bulk of the people cannot travel, and, unhappily, are not taught; and it may be of advantage to them to be assured by the oracles they trust (often, perhaps, too implicitly), that England does not possess exclusively all the wealth, greatness, and power of the world—that social happiness is not always found in proportion to political freedom—that we might borrow much from our neighbours with great benefit to ourselves—and that it is quite time to dismiss the idea that everything "foreign" is contemptible.

We have had something too much of this in times past During the closing years of the last century, and the first fifteen of the present one, Englishmen devoutly believed the most absurd accounts of the French people and their rulers, and the stories that were credited of Napoleon and his family would now be laughed at by every schoolboy. But then they influenced public opinion, and did much to prolong a war that has loaded us with millions of debt. Freer intercourse has dispelled these prejudices, to the great advantage of both countries. But we have still many preconceptions to rub off as to other nations. Thus, there is an almost universal belief in England, that the minor Sovereignties and Principalities of Germany are exceedingly despicable—that, as powers, they verge upon the burlesque of Monarchies. Till her Majesty's visit, no popular and generally read description of them, had been brought so forcibly before the public as the late accounts in the papers; and those descriptions cannot but abate, very considerably the disposition to sneer at the "petty German Courts." In a political point of view, it may be an evil that people of one race and language should be divided into so many jurisdictions, instead of being blended into one great united nation. But the system has its compensations; the possession of regal power gives the several Princes an interest in the welfare of the people, more direct and local than is to be found in large Monarchies. Witness the miserable condition of millions of the subjects of the Emperor of Russia, whose sway is a despotism "one and indivisible."

Nominally, they are under his paternal care; really, they are at the mercy of the nobles and their agents, to be scourged, starved, or hired out for life: the complaints of the lowest in such Governments never reach the supreme authority, and no earthly power can be omniscient—though it is the miserable vanity of Nicholas to affect to be so—the abuses committed are frightful. In the smaller sphere, even if the same state of society existed, these oppressions would be impossible.

The Duchy of Coburg and Gotha does not number more than a hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants; but the land is every where well cultivated, and the people are well fed and clothed; there is scarcely a beggar to be seen in the whole territory. We, with our greatness and wealth, are now daily reading an exposure of the mismanagement of our Poor-Law system, by which human beings have been driven to gnaw the putrid bones which it was their disdaining task to grind—because they were destitute: no punishment so severe having as yet been invented for crime. A labourer of Saxe-Gotha would make but a bad exchange if he left his "petty" principality for the sway of the Guardians of an Andover Union, and it is as well that Englishmen should think a little of these things before they indulge in sneers. We laugh, too, at the small revenues of the German States; do we manage our own immense resources half as well? or (in proportion) do with them one-tenth as much for the health and recreation of the people? The answer is unfavourable to us. Our public works are invariably made private jobs, and turn out disgraceful failures: Buckingham House, the National Gallery, the Nelson Pillar—all failures, on which vast sums were expended. As to Royal residences, the Queen of Great Britain has reason to envy the Duke of Gotha, at whose petty state it is the pleasure of Englishmen to laugh so much; he has three palaces superior even in architectural effect to Buckingham House, seven or eight residences, any one of which would be preferred to that hideous monstrosity the Pavilion, at Brighton. As to other German Potentates, they can point to public works, executed in a style of taste and splendour we do not attain in any case in which the public money pays for it. Then, as to the access of the public to gardens, parks, and picture galleries, we might find much in these petty States we could adopt with advantage.

It cannot be supposed that the descriptions given of the German people, in the accounts of her Majesty's tour, go very profoundly into the state of society among them; they are, necessarily, hasty sketches, written with railroad speed and for a temporary purpose. Correctness of detail as to events actually witnessed, and the main physical peculiarities of the country and people, are all they can furnish, and these have been graphically enough. Below the surface they cannot be expected to go; and as, on the whole tour, every place appeared in gala dress, they may partake something of the couleur de rose, which, to the traveller in ordinary times, would not be visible. It must not be imagined, because all has been gaiety and pleasure, that Germany is a kind of people's paradise. Beneath all the calm of physical well-being, there is a large amount of political discontent. The Rhenish Provinces, with decidedly French tendencies, are unquiet and dissatisfied with the Prussian Government that was forced on them by the Holy Alliance. Prussia Proper is not much more contented; the King's weak and vacillating policy, which, alternating between liberality and despotism led him first to promise the people a Constitution, and then to break his pledge, has estranged from him the hearts of his subjects. He is neither feared as a tyrant nor loved as a generous Sovereign, but is spoken of with great contempt. Then the censorship of the press increased in rigour since the schism in the Catholic Church, produced by the preaching of Ronge—acts as a continual irritant among the educated classes. In Saxony the same religious dispute has broken out into actual violence, and blood flowed in the streets of Leipsic. In Germany, as elsewhere, there are social and political ills with which men must struggle or to which they must submit. But the springs and causes of discontent lie too deep to be seen by the passing stranger. It must not be supposed, then, that the accounts of the festal scenes of her Majesty's tour impart much idea of the state of the people. They will serve to remove some absurd prejudices and correct not a few errors, in which we have too long indulged, and this is something gained. The meetings of crowned heads have no longer the political importance they once possessed, but these Royal progresses are indications of a great social advance, in which happily all participate. The barriers between nations are being broken down; steam is levelling them rapidly; and ere long the closer intercourse of the people of Europe with each other will remove those rooted prejudices which

> Make enemies of nations, who had else,
> Like kindred drops, commingled into one.

The line of Brunswick, now firmly seated on the Throne of England, is closely connected with the princely houses of Germany; without a convulsion of the State and a total change that would uproot all our institutions, that line is destined to retain the supreme authority in this realm. It is a point, then, that will arrive at something like just views of the character and influence of the German principalities, which we have had too great a tendency to underrate. And we cannot help thinking that rather more distinct ideas on this subject have been afforded by the accounts of her Majesty's tour.

The Potato Disease.—Mr. Herapath has communicated to the Bristol Mercury the following useful information as to the disease which has shown itself so extensively among the growing potatoes: "I find, in almost every instance, that the epidermis of the stalk below the surface of the ground, is more or less in a state of decay, often disintegrated, and completely rotten; the leaves and branches appear with the state of the part of the stalk below the ground. The tuber, beneath the outer skin, is first spotted brown (like a bruised apple) these spots extend and penetrate towards the centre, quite changing the nature of the potatoe. Those near the surface are most injured; in some cases the lowest on the root are not at all affected, while the upper ones are useless. I should therefore expect that the longer the crop remains in the land, the greater the injury will be. It seems, from the microscopic appearances, that the starch escapes injury for a long time after the skin and cellular parts are gone, and, as the whole of the nutritive powers of the potatoe reside in the starch, I should recommend that, wherever the disease has shown itself to any extent, the crop should be dug whether ripe or not, and the starch extracted by the following simple process—After washing the roots, let them be rasped fine and thrown into a large tub or other vessel; pour a considerable quantity of water, and well agitate and rub the pulp with the hands; all the starch or feculæ will, from its great weight, fall to the bottom, while the skin and fibrous matter will be carried away by the water; wash the starch with one, or two, more waters, allowing it to fall after each washing; spread it upon cloths in a warm room to dry—in this way about 20 lb. or 21 lb. will be obtained from every 100 lb. of potatoes, and it contains as much nourishment as the original roots; it will keep any length of time, and might be used with flour to make bread, pies, puddings, &c., as well as farinaceous spoon meat. This is much better than throwing away the diseased roots, and will furnish food for tens of thousands who might otherwise want it."

Death of a Lady, whilst Dressing.—Sunday morning, between ten and eleven o'clock, Mrs. Ann Bishett, a widow lady, fifty years of age, residing in Wardour-street, Soho square, after having partaken of a hearty breakfast with her family, apparently in the full enjoyment of health, went into her dressing room to dress for church, when she was suddenly seized with a fit and fell to the ground. Her daughter, who was in the room, gave an alarm, and medical aid was speedily rendered, but all endeavours to procure animation were unavailing, as life was extinct.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Paris, Wednesday.

The rage for improvements here is alone equalled by the railroad furor. Among the innumerable attempts which have succeeded, is the grand viaduct of the line from Paris to Rennes. A grand affair took place this week on the occasion of the laying of its first stone by M. le Baron de Jessaint, to whom the honour was delegated by the King and the Minister of Public Works. The crowd was immense, and the clergy flocked in vast hordes, to consecrate what is here styled a solemnity. The foundations of the truly great work are already fixed, and will consist of thirty-two arcades. They are close to those that Louis XIV. caused to be erected to convey the waters of the river Eure to Versailles. A grand fête was given to him by the authorities, the Members of the Council General, and all the notabilities that could be recruited for the occasion. The Duke de Noailles, the proprietor of the Chateau of Maintenon, was present with his family. The ceremony was imposing. The scheme is gigantic, and its completion will reflect honour on the nation. So intent is the Government on commercial and agricultural improvement, that missionaries are sent to all boarding-schools to pick up germs of information. Three persons attached to the Municipal Administration, started a few days since for London. One of the travelers is the Principal of the Bureau de la Ville; the second is the architect, and the third an inspector of markets. The object is to visit establishments of a similar nature in the principal cities of Great Britain, to see whether any improvements may be discovered that may ameliorate the plan of the new grand market at Paris. For the same purpose, the three travellers will, on their return, explore Holland, and wend their way as far north as Berlin.

An extraordinary movement is now forming the principal subject of conversation, not only in the salons of fashion, but is the reading topic at the various watering places. Mdlle. Emma G—— left during the last year her boarding-school, situated near Paris, which enjoys a very high reputation. The young lady had just reached her seventeenth year; her marriage with a cousin, an attaché of an embassy, was almost fixed, when certain discussions of settlements put a sudden stop to the proceedings. The marriage was broken off, and Mdlle. G—— desired to return to the boarding school. M. de T——, her lover, left for the Levant, and M. G—— the father of the young lady, who occupies a fifty-pound, under Government, having obtained a lengthened congé, visited Germany to study different questions of political economy. This year, at the approach of the vacation, she announced that she would not leave the school without the formal consent of her father, and affairs remained in this state, when, on the 15th of last May, a carriage with the arms of M. G—— stopped at the gates of the establishment. A servant, well known by the mistress to be in the service of Madame G——, presented a letter from his master, which commanded the young lady's instant return to her house. Mdlle., impatient to embrace her father, entered the carriage, and was driven away. Eleven days subsequently—the 26th May—M. de G—— presented himself in person at the school, and asked for his daughter. You may conceive the astonishment of the governess at his directions, when she ascertained that M. de G had, only the evening previous, arrived at Paris, and of the father, when he heard the distressing recital of his daughter's flight. Rapid and energetic measures were taken, and the fugitives were overtaken in Belgium, at Anderleck, a small village, situate two leagues from Brussels. The return of the young lady was instantly demanded. But the young attaché of the Embassy, having been born in Belgium, availed himself of his nationality, to intrench himself in the avowal of his being legally wedded to Mdlle. de G——, his cousin. Awaiting the solution of this question of international right, the two cousins will enjoy the honey moon. The lady has great personal and mental charms, and is heiress to an immense fortune, wished to her by her maternal uncle, the Duke de C——.

A society has been formed by certain capitalists to form a winter garden in Paris, composed of the rarest exotics and the choicest indigenous plants. In the Champs Elysées, not far from the palace built by Madame Léon, is situated an establishment less luxurious—there is no indication, no bill to attract the promenaders. The "Winter Garden" is in the course of completion, and so little observation has it yet excited, that I doubt whether it has yet received its name; but, in the meantime, all hands are busy; plants are being selected from every part, and individuals are collecting floral rarities in Belgium and America. In two months it is expected to be completed; there are not many already, than two-million specimens. I perceived, at my last visit, four camelias which cost 2500 francs each, and of the rosiers to the value of 800 francs. A colossal greenhouse is erected in the centre of a piece of water, filled with water plants and flowers of all sizes and colours; the effect is charming. Upon the first plan of this verdant elevation two exquisite salons have been contrived; here flowers may be purchased or ordered ready, than two

A RAMBLE IN THE REALMS OF CHAT.

Her Majesty and Consort have brought their tour of delightful travel to a close, and are now, after the enjoyment of sweet home-welcome from their children, taking domestic relaxation at Osborne House. But what a pretty and appropriate termination did her Majesty make of the adventuring part of her expedition in her friendly flying visit to the King of the French! How gracefully she went, how joyously was she received, and what animated and cordial spirit of affectionate greeting seemed to warm the youthful countenance and the aged heart. More like father and daughter than rival sovereigns, even amid all the pomp of reception and surrounding state of royalty. But what are we saying about pomp of reception? Nonsense! There were the Royal honours of course—the decorum of respect to station—but the ceremony itself was one of literal fun and frolic, mixed up with an ingenuity of gallantry, emanating from Louis Philippe, and displayed towards Victoria with a devotion worthy of the Espousm of the days of her predecessor Bess! Why was she—ay, Victoria of England—that she ought not wet her pretty feet, or touch damp sand, or run risk and peril of misadventure—drawn on to the hospitable shores of her neighbour in an undoubted bathing-machine? Yes, a bathing-machine acted as barge-royal, and held the living treasures of the two empires of England and France, decorated, moreover, with their Royal standards, and looking as grand in its new dignity as the feathers in a peacock's tail. Come, come, we must find —must make way for our muse here, and let her sing the

SONG OF THE BATHING MACHINE.

The Queen was coming from German land
Whither she'd lately been,
Along with the Prince who was blest with her hand,
Enjoying all sorts of delights that were grand,
And nights that were grander still.

The Queen was leaving that German land,
All 'mid the cannon's din,
When a courier came from the Monarch of France,
To request her, if 'twasn't too much of a dance,
To give him a short look in!

Then her Majesty's tone grew merry and gay
And, determined time to kill,
She, "How much I'm flatter'd you'll tell the King, pray;
And as France of my journey lies all in the way,
I very assuredly will."

The skies were bright, and the waves were blue,
When her Majesty came to land,
And Louis Philippe, with his friends not a few,
Were gallantly ready, and waiting at Eu,
To aid her Majesty land.

The King soon boarded her Majesty's ship,
And gave her glad embrace.
Then turn'd away from her presence of charm,
To see how the party might best without harm,
In that sandy and swampish place.

Never he cried shall the salt sands wet
The dear Victoria's feet,
And yet when I come to look despair!
I haven't a boat that'll land her there
Perfectly dry in my fleet.

Ah! ah! ha! ha! good thought what ho!
When the boat comes near the beach,
Let a Bathing Machine be rolled hard by Adorn it with both our flags and try
To bring it in easy reach

'Ts said! 'tis done! what capital fun!
The King and our beautiful Queen
All up the wet beach are riding away,
So far from the salt water's hate from the spray
All in the Bathing Machine.

"This was all me" the good King cried,
But the Queen this Majesty's finding,
When they got on their high dry and carpetted path,
Ask'd "Is this your new Order—Sir King—of the Bath?
And his Majesty burst out laughing!

This must have been one of the most agreeable episodes of the Royal visit, and happy are we also in recording the Royal pun.

Regal festivities are going on too in other lands, and the little bullfighter of Spain, with her aged mother and tender sister, are prospering more and more of slaughter for the French Princes. The poor bulls are at present grazing upon unenclosed commons, in a state of unconscious companionship, with sheep and horses, but soon they will be escorted into more dazzling presence, and twitted with the lance, the spear, and the fiery darts. Some of the preparatory pomp of the Spanish festivities appears ludicrous enough, and it is to us, at least, far more susceptible of mirth and enjoyment than the "feasts of blood." We speak of one of the illuminated allegories which is to represent "The Old and the New World at the feet of Imperial Spain." There ought to ring out a pleasant peal of laughter at the sight of such a self-inflicted satire upon the primary condition of that distracted land.

THE RAILWAY MANIA.

Ah! railleryone was all the go
We could endure men's banter,
But that was when a plain "Gee wo"
A race was in a canter.

Now canter will not do at all,
Jog trot is out of fashion,
And even a gallop at the full
Puts one in a passion.

The rail! the rail! it's all the rail
When people are departing,
They're wretched (n'importe how they're treated)
Till in a train for starting!

The rail! the rail! no slow coach now!
The horse that drew the cart O!
Neighs as the engine draws the train
Nay "there's a pretty sort O!

All agriculture's at a stand-still,
The farmers flourish 'em,
For railway shares now plough the land
Which ploughshares ploughed before 'em.

'Twas very irksome once to dig,
Now irksomeness is o'er,
For people scorn tunnel plans,
And don't think it a bore!

The railway mania so pervades
All classes of the nation,
That where they'd lose their tails in a rat,
Would rather lose their station.

And as to life so very fast—
As Hearts and no sparers!—
The tradesmen get so wide awake
When they contract for sleepers!

And mark you! when the Contract's made
(Brave Commerce Heav'n defend her!)
They do not send the Engine in.
But they do send in the Tender!

The Schoolmaster was once abroad
Him now the Railway passes
For by the Mass—he sorts the Mass
Like school boys into Classes.

Degrade you once from Class the first,
Then if you're badly reckon'd,
He'll teach you soon that Class the third
Is worse than Class the second!

Now Shareholders are all the go
Most brave of Undertakers!—
'Tis quite a treat—to see how sweet
The Brokers are on Breakers.

Oh! how in Speculation, now,
Both high and low take trip—
The Gentlemen get in the Stocks!
The Beggars have their Scrip!

In Germany whole herds of deer
Were murdered in the way,
In England there's a fine to-do
Among the herds of Stags!

As for Excise, which used to be
A source of revenue,
Rail Railways have cut out all that—
They're gauging beyond measure!

They never starve you! No! not there!
They feed!—no method shorter—
A monstrous bit of increase, and
A little draught of porter!

Indeed! But Prudence here steps in —Just like a wife, in fine,—
And cries—"This mania so prevails,
That I am blind, if these here rails
Arn't got the country—pots and pails
Right long into a line"!

AN ODD EXCHANGE.—At the Middlesex Sessions, on Tuesday, William Fitch, aged 22; John Waters aged 15; Mary Ann Reed, aged 19, and Elizabeth Thomas, aged 15, were convicted of stealing a purse, and the sum of 1*s*., from the person of Lucy Charlotte Mary Barclay. The assistant Judge (Mr Sergeant Adams) said that the history of the prisoner Fitch was somewhat singular. He was sentenced to transportation for seven years at these sessions in January last, under the name of William Walker, but by some means he had contrived to change places with another prisoner (Nicholas Duncan), who had at the same sessions been convicted of felony, and sentenced to three months' imprisonment. The conviction happened at a late hour of the day on which the prisoner was tried, and having with other felons been removed to the cell beneath the court, previous to being forwarded to the Westminster Bridewell, they there concocted a scheme to change names and personate each other. Accordingly, when called, the prisoner Fitch answered to the name of Duncan, while the real Duncan assumed the appellation of Walker, the cognomen of which Fitch had chosen for his convenience at that time. This ruse had been kept up at the West minster Bridewell, and by the prisoner actually succeeded in escaping transportation, having been liberated at the expiration of three months' imprisonment. His companion, Duncan, was now serving the term of seven years' transportation on board the Bellerophon, hulk at Bermuda, whence he had written home the other day, to say that his better repentance of the exchange he had so foolishly made, and detailing all the circumstances which, upon investigation, were found to be true. The Judge then sentenced the prisoner, William Fitch, to be transported for the same term of ten years.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The recess of Parliament is a capital term, taken figuratively, for the consequences that tread on the heels of a breaking up at the Westminster "School for grown children." London, for the most part, is eclipse; the shady side of Pall-mall is without an Aristarch; the shepherd is seen non ignarus fori, which means according to the reading of St. James's, the bay window of White's is tenantless. The month which succeeded the closing of the session of this year of grace, so far as related to good old English sporting, was without matter of account. It had a mesne plaisirs of course, or there might have been additional coroners appointed for every town and village; but, malgré the yachting of the Isle of Wight, the passages at cricket stars, and at chicken Olympics there, August, for the general sportsman, was a slow month. Hear how Theodore Hook makes him soliloquize:—

"For want of some better employment,
Full Ponto and Don can get out,
I'll cultivate trout employment,
And angle immense-ly for trout."

Some, no doubt, took to this refuge for the destitute—of excitement—for if there be a truite plaisir, as Madame de Staël calls something or other in her way, the fishing with a unmeaning stream, in our sporting vocabulary. This, and every, is only an individual opinion, offered with great deference. Walton and Sir Humphrey Davy (great authorities) assure us the best of men have been disciples of the gentle art. We don't gainsay it; we only venture to suggest if they hadn't been anglers they would have been angels

Fast we the raging, then, of August, and eke its other small deer, and address our instant notice to the autumnal Court of Dian. But woe is us, that we should have writ that monosyllable indicative of venison. Lo! it calleth up the ghosts of indignant bucks and does: see, they shake their gory haunches at us: they cry aloud of the field of Thuringia; they threaten, should we meet a royal knight, no more to meet us at—my Lord Mayor's feast. . . . The most notable achievement in sporting during the dull season above spoken of, was the first scene of the Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha's, enacted while the Queen of England was his guest. It seems to be regarded here as the sole stain upon the gorgeous hospitalities with which the residence of her Majesty in Germany was greeted. We were of those who witnessed it; and, of course, of those who looked on it with deep disgust; yet, withal, "more in sorrow than in anger." It was indeed pitiful—wondrous pitiful—and angured stark ignorance of the guests' tastes in those who asked them to such a banquet. But of itself it was merely a bad custom of the country one that had been "more honoured in the breach than the observance." If you are invited, you must be content to take pot luck. Don't deny charity even to those who did foul murder upon those defenceless deer under the most aggravated circumstances. Don't look on the fat on the heads of those who offended in their ignorance—as Uncle Toby says of the pain in the groin—"we don't wish the devil house."so ill as that

The great feature of the forthcoming week will be the northern race meeting, at Doncaster. For the first time, it will commence on Tuesday, terminating as usual, on Friday, though there are a couple of matches in the Hat for Saturday. Like all great meetings, this has its passages of absorbing interest—the St. Leger being its Scylla as the Derby is the Charybdis of Epsom. The turf wants something to rouse it from lethargy, and no doubt it will soon be supplied. Doncaster is as sure of its sensation—its row, to speak plainly—as an Irish fair. If they only skirmish, it will give a healthy circulation to the blood, but they too often finish their demonstrations with a regular sack, a case of refinement upon pillage, wherein the victims are made to present the plunder to the spoiler. Let the evil designers, however, beware—Justice, though tardy, is certain. The last Racing Calendar, for instance, lies before me. I read in it this announcement:—"A general meeting of the members of the Jockey Club will be held at the New Rooms, Newmarket, after the races on Tuesday in the Second October Meeting; and the Stewards particularly request that every member who is able to attend will make a point of doing so." Therefore remember, O, licensee, or Disciple of the Fair for the Derby, for of a surety the arrow of Diana is drawn to the head against ye.

But now to the matter in hand—Doncaster Races; that is to say, the race for the Great St. Leger. We are not going to tell the reader which horse will win (but that is of no consequence, as each of the sporting papers will furnish them with the winner, and each with a different one), because we don't know it; and if we did, we would keep it to ourselves, and retire from public life on the profits of our knowledge. We simply aspire to lay the state of the market before him, that, should he buy, he may not be "sold," as the phrase goes. Since Epsom Races, there has been a very large field backed for the Leger. They began backing next to nothing about the Merry Monarch, because he won the Derby, and Weatherbit, because he ought to have done so. Now this is rank and has met the fate of precipitation in general. The Merry Monarch went even after his backers grim solution of that which is said to be better than no fight—he is declared not to start. As to Weatherbit, whether the touts that have encompassed his stable for the last month will let him reach Doncaster, or swallow him, or, and oh, my youth, the matter of much doubt. Should he go and forget the Goodwood Cup Course, he will be a respectable fielder; but none of your outright champions. Miss Sarah, the property of a Scotch gentleman, half brother, sister, or cousin to Fashion, is the first favourite, and at very small odds. This is on the faith of the drubbing she gave Miss Elis and a tolerable field for the Great Yorkshire Stakes three weeks ago. PALACE OF MOLSDORF.—FROM HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS PRINCE ALBERT'S DRAWING.

THE QUEEN'S DEPARTURE FROM GERMANY.

We now resume our Illustrations of the Royal Tour, with picturesque views of three of the chateaux of the Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha: one of these, Molsdorf, was visited by her Majesty. These views, together with the Great Square at Coburg, are from the beautiful Drawings of his Royal Highness Prince Albert.

The other Illustrations are, of necessity, retrospective. That at page 165, shows the Grand Triumphal Arch erected by the Railway Company at Gotha; and, accustomed as we are to the rustic architecture in Royal progresses, this arch, constructed of cross poles, gaily decorated, is novel. The upper Engraving at page 168, shows that scene of the Deer-shooting, described at page 146, last week; wherein the Deer nearly got the better of the chasseurs and peasants.

The next Engraving shows the great musical fête given in honour of the Queen at Gotha, on the afternoon of the 2nd inst. In front of the Palace, and immediately below the terrace, is a large open space of meadow ground, in the midst of which a lofty orchestre was erected, capable of containing 500 or 600 persons. It was fitted up to represent a sylvan harbour, and festoons of laurel and myrtle, tastefully disposed around the sides and depending from the roof, flags and streamers floating gaily from the top, and lyres and other musical devices emblazoned on its architrave. In front of the orchestra, at the distance of about 100 yards, was another building, much more elaborately and elegantly fitted up, representing a Gothic cottage or pavilion, and this was destined for the accommodation of the Queen and the courtly circle by whom she was accompanied. The Royal arms of Great Britain were painted in front—the standard of England, with those of Coburg and Gotha, floated from the pinnacles—crimson drapery lined the sides and the interior, and in front of the balcony at which her Majesty sat was placed a covering of crimson velvet, edged with gold. On either side, between the pavilion and the orchestra, ranges of seats were fitted up for the audience, leaving a large open space in front. These seats were occupied by the good citizens of Gotha, their fair and smiling wives and daughters, and by strangers from many miles around.

Three o'clock was the hour fixed by the programme for the commencement of the musical entertainment; but this proved to be a printer's stratum, and the concert did not commence till four o'clock.

On the arrival of the Royal party, the Queen took her seat between the Queen of the Belgians and the Duchess of Kent. The Duchess of Coburg and the other ladies of rank at the Court of Gotha were around her. Behind was the Duke, very anxious and attentive to every look and wish of his Royal guest. Prince Albert, the Prince of Leiningen, Duke Ernest of Wurtemburg, and many others, were also there, and the whole pavilion was crowded.

The Queen wore a blue shawl, over a white satin dress, a white chip hat and blue feathers, and laughed and chatted merrily during the performance. The band struck up shortly after the Queen's arrival, and then commenced the procession of the singers, processions being here the order of the day. Next came the police in a formidable body—then the different bands of the Prussian and Coburg regiments. After these, the leaders of the several districts of singers, carrying flags and batons tipped with gold in their hands. The singers were all provided with a strip of ribbon in their button-holes, indicating the village or district from whence they came.

As the procession passed before the Queen, the singers uncovered, and the standards were lowered; the Queen bowed graciously to each. The whole band, to the number of 800 or 1000, having passed, the music commenced. When all was concluded, three loud and hearty cheers were given by the immense assemblage, which her Majesty acknowledged by bowing repeatedly to the people. Her Majesty and suite then left the ground, proceeding to the Palace to dinner, and at six o'clock the musical fête had terminated.

The following are the details of the programme:—

The instrumentalists were the military bands of the Gotha Infantry, of the 31st and 32nd Royal Prussian Infantry, from Erfurt, and the 8th Prussian Cuirassiers, from Langensalza. There were no stringed instruments, and, with two or three exceptions, the choral pieces were sung without accompaniment. The first burst of the chorus welcoming Queen Victoria to Friedenstein had an electrical effect. After this work, an oration was delivered by Dr. Dennhart, who, in an eloquent exordium, signalised the happy advent of the Queen, and the glory of Britain, but his speech was too long; and the peroration in which he proposed three cheers for the Royal visitors, and "Vaterland," afforded unbounded gratification. The military bands then executed Weber's well known "Jubilee" Overture, which contains the subject of our National Anthem, so admirably introduced in the opening movement, and so marvellously interwoven at the conclusion. "Mehul's Prayer," from his Oratorio of "Joseph," was then finely sung.

An interesting item in the scheme succeeded. This was a charming canzonet, called "Greeting to the Brother," the words composed by the Reigning Duke of Coburg, and the music by Prince Albert. A song by Kiesel, composed by the Grand Duke, established also his legitimate claims as a clever amateur. Next came a patriotic chorus, "My Father Land," composed by Mandersleb, the director of the Gotha Opera. A chorus, by Marschner, "An Invocation to Freedom," did not go well, but it was bold in conception. The chorus by Reichardt, with words by Arndt, "Das Deutsche Vaterland," excited a great burst of enthusiasm. This terminated the first part, and the military bands then played, with infinite spirit, Mendelssohn's March from the "Midsummer Night's Dream," and a fantasia, introducing "Rule Britannia," and the national airs. The last was remarkably well instrumented.

The second part opened with a chorus by Mandersleb. A chorus by Stunz was accompanied by the military band, but it was certainly anything but a choral union. The "Vaterland" was again the theme. The three next choruses were the most remarkable features of the programme, being the "Huntsman's Farewell," by Mendelssohn; the song of "Union," by Wagner; and the song of the "Fatherland," by Schneider. The National Anthem, with highly complimentary words in German to Britain's Queen, concluded this remarkable festival. Nominally the singers were 700, and the band 150, but actually upwards of 1000 voices were heard, as many of the company, although not enrolled, had copies of the choruses, and joined in them.

PALACE OF TENNEBURG.—FROM HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS PRINCE ALBERT'S DRAWING.

The large engraving on the opposite page—the Procession of the Peasantry before her Majesty—was described at page 146 of our 'curna of last week.

We now proceed to the details of the Royal Departure.

On Tuesday week (the 2nd inst.) the Queen and Prince Albert went to Obershoff, one of the Duke's hunting seats, finely situated in one of the gorges of the Thuringian mountains. Obershoff is situated upon the ordinary high road between Gotha and Coburg. The Duke's hunting lodge is perched upon the summit of a steep hill, surrounded on all sides by dark woodland gorges, and the swelling slopes of mountains covered with tall pines. Among these the road winds in long serpentine curves; its skilful engineering in a great measure obviating the difficulties of the ground.

From Obershoff the Royal party made a detour to Reinhardtsbrunn.

In the evening the Court returned to Gotha to be present at a ball given by the Duke at the theatre. About a thousand of the respectable inhabitants of Gotha received invitations. There were present the Queen and Prince Albert, the King and Queen of the Belgians, the reigning Duke and Duchess, Prince Ernest of Wurtemburg, the Prince of Leiningen, Duke Alexander of Wurtemburg, the Grand Duke of Baden, the Grand Duke of Mecklenburg Schwerin, &c. &c.

On Wednesday (the 3rd), at eight o'clock in the morning, the Queen and Prince Albert started upon their homeward route, by way of Fulda and Frankfort.

Her Majesty and suite arrived at Fulda, situate in the territory of Hesse Cassel, at eight o'clock that evening, having accomplished the journey of eighty miles in about ten hours. The Queen, Prince Albert, and the Duke and Duchess of Coburg were in the first carriage, and the Royal suite followed in four other carriages. After leaving Gotha the road runs nearly due west over the wide level plain which stretches away in the direction of Mulhausen. There is nothing to vary the uniformity and sameness of the long lines of pines and poplars which skirt the road for several miles. The railway which is now in progress of formation from Gotha to Eisenach, and thence to Frankfort, runs parallel with the road for a considerable distance. The work is rapidly approaching completion, and there are a large number of very English-looking navigators employed.

About a mile from Eisenach, the road enters the territory of the Grand Duke of Weimar, and the green and white stripes which distinguished every toll gate, post house, and public building, now give place to orange and black. At the frontier her Majesty was met by the Grand Duke, and conducted to the Palace in the large square of the town, where a guard of honour and a military band were drawn up

COBURG.—FROM HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS PRINCE ALBERT'S DRAWING.

The whole square was filled with the population of the town in holiday attire. Her Majesty, having partaken of a collation, and remained upwards of an hour at the Palace, again set out, proceeding up a steep hill at the entrance of the town to the ancient Castle of Wartburg, celebrated as the prison of Martin Luther. Her Majesty walked through the principal apartments, and was shown the room in which Luther's celebrated contest with the devil took place. The story goes that he was carried off for safety by his friend the Elector of Saxony after his return from the Diet of Worms. Here he wrote the greater part of his translation of the Bible; and here he was frequently assailed by the devil, and ultimately defeated his sable majesty by flinging an inkstand at his head. The legend is probably typical of the influence which printing was destined to exercise in the annihilation of error. The Castle contains a very curious armoury, some of the suits of mail being as old as the 15th and 14th centuries, and all the objects of interest were minutely examined by her Majesty and the Prince. The town of Eisenach is in the district of Saxe Eisenach, but belongs to the Grand Duke of Saxe Weimar. Her Majesty did not re-enter Eisenach; but, after leaving the Castle of Wartburg, proceeded by a cross road on her route towards Marksuhl, which lies embosomed in lofty pine forests, at the base of the Thuringian mountains. Towards Fulda the crosses and chapels and shrines again start up on the road side and crown the summits of the hills, showing that we are again in Catholic Bavaria. On reaching Fulda her Majesty was received at the Kurfurst (Electoral) Hotel by the Electoral Prince of Hesse Cassel, and welcomed to his dominions. All the troops in the garrison were turned out, and the town was brilliantly illuminated as her Majesty drove through the streets, the letters V. A. being displayed over the porte cochere of the hotel in coloured lamps. Dinner was served immediately after the Queen's arrival, and a guard of honour remained on duty during the night in front of the hotel. The town of Fulda is one of the oldest in this part of Germany, and was once the seat of an archbishopric; it contains about 10,000 or 12,000 inhabitants, and lies snugly placed in a pleasant valley on the river Fulda. The Cathedral and the Church of St. Michael are the only objects of interest in the place. The former contains the shrine of St. Boniface, and the latter a crypt, erected as far back as the year 822.

On the arrival of the Royal party at Fulda, the cortège stopped at the principal hotel, the Kurfurst, within which the Grand Duke of Hesse Cassel was waiting in readiness to receive the Royal travellers.

A regiment of Hessian soldiers were drawn up opposite the hotel, and a dense crowd of the good people of Fulda supported them.

The Queen alighted amidst general cheering.

The Hessian band continued to serenade her for about an hour, and the hotel and the neighbouring houses were pleasingly illuminated in honour of "Die Königen von England."

ARRIVAL AND RECEPTION AT FRANKFORT.

Her Majesty left Fulda on Thursday morning early, and reached Frankfort at half-past three in the afternoon. Every house commanding a view of the Hotel d'Angleterre was filled with spectators, the ladies forming a considerable majority. At half-past three o'clock precisely, the Royal chariot entered the gateway of the hotel, the band playing the National Anthem. Her Majesty was well received, and looked remarkably well. Prince Albert, who had a white paletot, and M. Gouvernon, the proprietor of the hotel, handed the Queen from her carriage. Colonel Wylde was the only person of her Majesty's suite in attendance at the gateway; but in the passage leading to the staircase of the Royal apartments stood the Earl of Westmoreland; Mr. Fox Strangways, the British Minister at Frankfort; Mr. Koch, the Consul; Mr. Koch, jun.; the attachés of the Ministry, &c. The Queen immediately proceeded to the suite of rooms prepared for her reception. The authorities of the town, at her Majesty's express desire, did not attend on her arrival. A guard of honour, placed at the doors of her Majesty's rooms, was instantly removed by the Queen's orders, as at Fulda. The guard remained at the gateway.

In the evening the town presented a scene of animation perhaps unprecedented in its annals. The streets were thronged, and the Rossmarkt, where the Hotel d'Angleterre is situated, was almost closed up. Never had the single Frankfort regiment of the line such onerous duties, as to clear a way for the carriages. Precisely at seven o'clock Her Majesty sat down to dinner.

Shortly before seven o'clock his Majesty Louis Charles Augustus King of Bavaria, accompanied by his Aide-de-Camp, arrived at the hotel, and was saluted with Royal honours. The Grand Duchess Stephanie was too indisposed to pay her promised visit. A great object of curiosity was Prince Metternich; his step was firm, his eye looked bright, and the veteran diplomatist looked altogether remarkably well. The Earl of Aberdeen had paid him previously a visit at the Hotel de l'Empereur Romain.

The Royal party remained quietly at the Hotel during the evening.

At the Royal dinner some choice Johannesburg of 1842, purchased by M. Gouvernon of Prince Metternich, was served at the table. Covers were laid for ten, namely, the Queen, the King of Bavaria, Prince Albert, Prince Metternich, the Earl of Aberdeen, the Earl of Liverpool, the Countess of Gainsborough, the Viscountess Canning, Colonel Wylde, and Mr. Anson.

In the evening there was a levee, at which the two Burgomasters of Frankfort were presented, as also Count Munich, the Austrian Envoy and Minister to the Diet, the Saxon, Bavarian, Prussian Ministers, &c.; Mr. Koch, the British Consul; Mr. Koch, jun.; the Earl and Countess of Westmoreland, &c.

On the previous day, Mr. Koch, the intelligent, active, and urbane British Consul at Frankfort, left for Fulda, to receive her Majesty's commands as to the officials to be honoured with audiences. Mr. Koch was bearer, also, of despatches from the King of Bavaria, who is at Aschaffenburg, for the Queen.

ARRIVAL AT COLOGNE.

The Queen and his Royal Highness Prince Albert left Frankfort on Friday morning, at half-past seven o'clock, proceeding by special train to Wiesbaden and Biberich, the chateau of his Highness the Duke of Nassau.

Notwithstanding the early hour at which the illustrious travellers set out, there was an immense crowd assembled in front of the Hotel d'Angleterre, and also at the railway station. Her Majesty reached the station at a few minutes to eight, and reached Cassel, the tête-du-pont opposite Mayence, at a quarter to nine o'clock. Here the locomotive engine was detached, and its place supplied by a single horse, and in this primitive manner the Royal train was conveyed to Biberich, where her Majesty was received by his Highness the Duke of Nassau, and remained for some time at the chateau, while the luggage was being conveyed on board the Rhine steamer in waiting. The Royal standard of England and the colours of the Duke were displayed from the towers of the chateau during her Majesty's stay, the landing-place and walk leading to the pier being covered with rich carpeting.

Shortly after nine the steamer left the pier, a salute of artillery being fired from the esplanade in front of the Palace. The morning was extremely fine, and the magnificent forest scenery, ancient castle, time-stained ruins, and neat little thriving towns, which lie thickly scattered along the banks, were seen to the greatest advantage, under the brightening influence of a clear blue sky and a summer sun, forming a pleasing contrast to the cold and dark and wintry aspect of the scene during the early portion of her Majesty's progress up this noble river.

The Rhine steamer found the Fairy ready to receive its Royal mistress at Bingen, and the state barge was quickly alongside, and the Royal party were in a very few minutes transferred to the deck of the Fairy, which then sped rapidly on its way down the river to Cologne, the Royal standard of England flying from the main, and the Prussian standard from the foretopmast.

The speed at which the Royal yacht went down the stream prevented any demonstrations of respect on the part of the people on its banks; and at half-past five the Queen reached Cologne, passing through and rounding the bridge of boats, which was crowded with thousands of the inhabitants. Her Majesty landed at Deutz, on the opposite side of the river. There was a guard of honour of Prussian soldiers in front of the Belle Vue Hotel, at which her Majesty remained for the night. Such was the speed at which the Fairy ran down the river, that the people at the hotel were taken completely by surprise, the arrangements for the accommodation of her Majesty and suite not being quite completed.

Her Majesty and the Prince remained on deck during the whole of the voyage down, and luncheon was served, by her Majesty's command,

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 13, 1845.

DRUNKENNESS has ever been the besetting sin of the nations of the North, and in the age of social improvement it would, indeed, be a melancholy thing if no amelioration in this respect were effected amongst them. It is not so, however, for, independently of the extraordinary, the glorious moral revolution which has within the last few years taken place in Ireland, the Temperance movement has found advocates and disciples in several Continental countries also. In most of these, from the form of the Government and the political institutions of the nation, the countenance of the authorities is of far greater consequence to ensure success to any social movement of this kind, than might be naturally supposed in Great Britain; where all such matters have their origin in, and owe their success to, the spontaneous action of the people, guided and regulated by that healthy tone of public opinion which results from the well-conducted, harmonious, co-operation of liberal political institutions, a free press, and a constitutional Government. In Prussia, where Temperance has made considerable progress, we are gratified to find that this support, so much needed, is accorded by the Government; and that too, in a section of the community, where, from the military character of the country, it cannot fail to be productive of great benefit—the army.

Accounts from Berlin, dated September 2nd., inform us that the Minister of War, M. Lieutenant General Baron de Boyen, has just addressed to all the Generals commanding, a Circular, in which he announces to them that the King, in order to encourage temperance in the army, has ordered that all the military in cantonments, in camp, or in bivouac, who wish to forego their rations of brandy, will have the value thereof in money paid to them.

The accounts which we quote, further state that the President of the Temperance Society of Berlin, has addressed the Minister of War, for the purpose of having conveyed to his Majesty, the expression of the gratitude of all the Temperance Societies of Germany, for this measure.

We have most sincere pleasure in announcing this fact. It is a heavy blow given to the most brutalizing and debasing of human vices, and one from which the most advantageous results to the social and physical condition of the humbler classes in Prussia, may be fairly anticipated.

We have had occasion more than once to refer to the wretched, paltry prejudices that seem to sway the opinions and writings of many of the editors of the Paris press, when the mutual relations of England and France form the subject of discussion. They labour, on all possible opportunities, to impress upon their countrymen that in maintaining a cordial understanding with England, the Government of France seek only the debasement of their native country, and the exaltation of her hated rival—"Perfidious Albion."

The palpable absurdity of such sentiments, which is only to be equalled by the malevolence that dictates them, would render their frequent publication in almost any other country but France a matter of ridicule, and justly expose the writers of such nonsense to merited contempt. But it is otherwise in the "Great Nation," as the French, in the fulness of their vanity, love to call their country. There the ruling passion of the people is egotism—egotism the most intense and indicrous. They most verily believe that they are the noblest, the most accomplished in arts and arms—in a word, the greatest people on the face of the earth; that they are the envy of surrounding nations, and that all men are ready to hand themselves together to effect the ruin and disgrace of their country.

A people in such a condition of mind are suitable subjects for the crafty and unprincipled to impose false and mischievous opinions upon; and, accordingly, many of the Parisian Redacteurs, who write, not to propagate truth, or inculcate just and sound principles of political doctrine, but for the sordid purpose of lucre, by availing themselves of the national vanity, fool their readers to the top of their bent, and, by way of seasoning their dull effusions, interlard them with invectives and calumnies against the only really good and practical Minister that France has had for years past—M. Guizot. A late occasion, which one would naturally think ought to call forth expressions of satisfaction and congratulation, has been seized on by the press in question which we refer, to indulge in their attacks on the entente cordiale between France and England, which they have so strenuously, but so vainly, endeavoured to destroy. This occasion is that of the recent co-operation of French and English forces on the coast of Madagascar, when the crews of two French vessels united with an English crew in an attack upon Tamative, in the dominions of Queen Ranavalo, for the purpose of protecting the French and English residents there from the despotic royal virago would force to become naturalized subjects of her barbaric realm. Our ill-natured contemporaries are annoyed to find that all their lessons of distrust and hatred of England have been fruitless in the very quarter where they expected to find them most effective and embarrassing in their results to the Government. The men of both nations, whose profession is war, have been found fighting side by side as brothers in arms, instead of acting in conformity with those international antipathies and prejudices with which the pen-and-ink warriors have sought to poison their understandings. We trust the time is not far distant when the great bulk of the French people will show, by their unequivocal disgust at these pitiful displays of the Paris press, that they expect to find journalism have higher and nobler aims than the dissemination of ill-will between two powerful nations, whose true interests are alone compatible with the existence of permanent mutual amity; for when this eternal senseless carping at England ceases to pay, it will be abandoned.

FESTIVITIES AT BLAIR ATHOL.—Lord and Lady Glenlyon lately dispensed their hospitalities to a Royal and distinguished circle at Blair Athol. On Wednesday week the presentation of the stand of colours, given by her Majesty to the Athol Highlanders, in commemoration of her visit to Blair last year, took place with all due ceremony, and the scene was most interesting. The troops were under arms at an early hour, headed by their respective officers. Lady Glenlyon arrived on the ground about 11 o'clock, leaning upon the arm of Prince George of Cambridge. The "Highlanders" having passed before the assembled party in ordinary quick and double quick time, subsequently drew up in line, when his Royal Highness Prince George, and his Serene Highness Prince Edward, having respectively taken the former the Queen's colour and the latter the regimental stand and ensign, embroidered in gold, let their noble hostess, Lady Glenlyon, forward between them. At a given point, the two Princes presented the beautiful standards to the Highland officers appointed to receive them, when Lady Glenlyon, advancing a few paces, in a sweet tone of voice, delivered a most appropriate address to the corps, in the course of which she alluded, in emphatic language, to the firm attachment which the Athol Highlanders had ever manifested in defence of the former Sovereigns of Scotland, expressing her firm conviction that the lustre of the splendid proofs of her Majesty's gracious condescension and safe confidence, which they had just received, would never be tarnished in their hands. At the close of her ladyship's impressive address, the Princes and Lady Glenlyon returned to their former position, when a Royal salute was fired from a battery of guns mounted on an adjoining eminence. The regiment then formed into columns and marched past, triumphantly waving their splendid colours to and fro. After which they were dismissed, in order that they might partake of a sumptuous entertainment which had been provided for them, and which was served up under the same tent erected for Her Majesty when at Dunkeld.

WINDSOR CASTLE.—It is her Majesty's intention to abolish the office of State Housekeeper at Windsor Castle, by granting compensation to the lady who at present holds the office, and thereby getting rid of the unpopular tax upon the public in the shape of housekeeper's fees for showing the state apartments at Windsor, which will in future be placed under the custody of the Lord Chamberlain

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

CROYDON RAILWAY MEETING.—A meeting of the shareholders was held on Tuesday, at the London-bridge station, W. A. Wilkinson, Esq., in the chair. The Secretary read the report of the Directors, by which it appeared that the receipts had increased 3½ per cent. in those of the corresponding half year, and the tolls about 5 per cent. on those of the same period. The expenditure had, however, also increased. In reference to the atmospheric principle, the Directors stated that the demonstration of that principle had been perfectly successful, notwithstanding the delay which had occurred, and the difficulties encountered from the novelty of the apparatus, and the desire to effect and apply all possible improvements. From that success they entertained a confident belief that Parliament would next session give all lines to be worked on that principle a preference, and that, consequently, in such new lines for which they were to apply, they anticipated a victory over their opponents. The works on the Epsom line were in rapid progress, and the line was expected to be opened next summer. The profit and loss account showed a balance of £6,758 5s. 10d., out of which the Directors recommended a dividend of seven shillings per share to be made. The report was adopted.

LONDON AND BLACKWALL EXTENSION. On Monday the first General Meeting of the Proprietors of this company was held at the London Tavern, Mr. J. N. Daniel, Chairman of the Board of Directors, presiding. The report stated the terms of the arrangement which had been made with the Eastern Counties Railway, and which it had been read, the Chairman said that at present every arrangement had been made for carrying out the extension, which could be completed, on the assurance of their surveyor, within two months from next week, and without delay of rails. He would take that opportunity of intimating that the directors had perfect confidence in the soundness of the propose l South Essex line, and that it would be a valuable adjunct to the Black-wall. The Report and Statement of Directors was carried. The Chairman, and Messrs Baker and Ogilvy, were appointed auditors.—The Chairman, in reply to Mr. M'Cann, said that the receipts of the Blackwall line for the last two months of the last year were greater than the corresponding months of the preceding REGISTRATION OF FINSBURY REGISTRATION.—D. Moylan, Esq., is the barrister appointed to revise the lists of voters for the borough of Finsbury. The learned gentleman will hold his Court for that purpose on Monday next, the 15th instant, at the Court of his Honour the Vice Chancellor of England, Lincoln's inn. The last day of claims and objections do not present any particular feature of political interest.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY. The National Gallery closed for the annual vacation on Thursday, and will not re-open for public inspection till the 27th of October next.

MONUMENT TO THE LATE SIR T. F BUXTON.—It has been resolved to erect by public subscription, a monument in Westminster Abbey to the memory of Sir T. Fowell Buxton. It is intended to limit the subscription to £2 2s., that all who have admired the indefatigable zeal of this great man, in his efforts to ameliorate the condition of the slave, may have an opportunity of expressing their respect to his memory. Foremost amongst those who have expressed their concurrence in the object, are, the Bishop of London, and six other Prelates; Lord John Russell, Lord Ashley, the Duke of Sutherland, the Marquises of Cholmondeley and Breadalbane, the Earls of Jermyn and Chichester, and one not less celebrated and esteemed than the object of the subscription, but who has since gone to his final resting place—we mean Earl Grey.

ANOTHER BALLOON ASCENT.—On Monday night, Mr. C. Green made another balloon ascent from Cremorne Gardens, in the Royal Nassau Balloon, this being his 82th aerial voyage. He was accompanied on this occasion by Mr. Hardwicke, the magistrate, Captain G Spngg, R.N., Mr J. A. Layard, Ceylon Rifles; Mr. Salter, Piazza, Covent-garden; Mr. Denton, Mrs. C. Green, Mr. and Mrs. Bass, Mr G. Green, and another gentleman. The machine was first carried at a few hundred yards from the earth by a current of air from the north east, and, on attaining an elevation of about 4300 feet, he found the current from the north-west, and between these two currents Mr. Green was, at various intervals, over Walham green, Shepherd's bush, the Hammersmith bridge, &c., when, at last, observing that he was likely to be borne over the metropolis, and thus be compelled to remain up all night, he determined to alight, and thus avoid that unpleasant alternative. The descent took place in the neighbourhood of Harrow, in a brick field.

MORTALITY IN THE METROPOLIS.—The total number of deaths for the week ending Saturday, September 6, was 762, being 73 less than the preceding week, and 51 less than the average of four corresponding weeks; and only about one-half of the number of deaths that occurred weekly at the commencement of spring.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

FIRE IN CLERKENWELL.—On Wednesday morning, at a quarter before three o'clock, a fire, which was not subdued until property to a considerable extent had been destroyed, broke out in the premises belonging to Mrs. H. Fowler, an extensive skin dyer, No. 12, Eagle court, St. John's lane, Clerkenwell. The workshops were composed of brick and timber; they were two stories high, and between sixty and seventy feet long On the alarm being given, several engines arrived in rapid succession, and the men succeeded, by half past four o'clock, in getting the mastery over the destructive element. By that hour the workshops were entirely burned down, and their valuable stock in trade consumed; the back windows of the private dwelling-house were also burnt out, and the furniture severely injured by water, &c. The roof of the house No. 11, Eagle-court, in the occupation of Mr. Myall, is also much burnt; besides which, the first-floor workshop, belonging to Mr. E. Paxton, bacon-dryer, in Bull-yard, is burnt out. The long room and roof of the skittle-ground of the Red Lion public-house, in White Horse aley, are likewise damaged by fire; three houses in Pump court are also more or less damaged, and a workshop belonging to Mrs. Barret, a cabinet maker, in Bull yard, is destroyed. The total damage will amount to a considerable sum. Mrs. Fowler was insured, but the majority of the other sufferers were not so fortunate

ACCIDENT ON THE SOUTH EASTERN RAILWAY.—An accident of a very shocking character, involving loss of life, happened on Monday morning, between nine and ten o'clock, in the Archcliffe Tunnel, on the line of the South Eastern Railway, a short distance from the Dover terminus. One of the porters, named John Hill, whose particular duty was to assist in removing trucks, engines, &c., in the vicinity of the terminus, was directed to remove an engine down the line to the shedding near the Archcliffe tunnel. The poor fellow promptly proceeded with the order, but, on the engine passing through the tunnel, he imprudently jumped on the step, and was fatally jammed against the wall. On the engine verging from the tunnel, the unfortunate creature's fate was discovered; he was quite dead, and had evidently been killed instantaneously. He was a native of Devonshire, and is said to have left a family. He was generally considered a very cautious man.

FATAL RAILWAY ACCIDENT.—An accident took place on the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway on Thursday week, which was attended with the death of George Macklin, one of the guards. It appears that Macklin has been employed on the line for only four months, and in accordance with a custom which provides that all new guards be appointed to the charge of luggage-trains as an initiatory step, he had charge of a train of this kind which left Glasgow at eleven o'clock on the Wednesday night. The train reached Linlithgow in safety, where one of the trucks was to be left, and for the sake of convenience it was the last in the train. It was in connection with this particular truck that Macklin lost his life, but as no person saw the accident, the particulars of it cannot be given with certainty. From the position, however, in which the body was found, it is supposed to have occurred as follows :—Before the train had been fully stopped he had swung himself on the buffers of the second last truck in order to save himself the trouble of running forward and uncoupling the last one at the proper time; and while in this station, he had been down on the rails, and immediately after the passing truck passed over his body. The unfortunate man was quite unable to speak, and died in about a quarter of an hour afterwards.

ACCIDENT TO SIR JOHN MORDAUNT.—A very serious accident occurred to Sir John Mordaunt, on Tuesday week, on his estate in Walton, near Warwick. He was out shooting with a party of friends, including Mr. Mills, barrister, of London, on the above day, when the gun of the latter gentleman, which he was trailing along the ground, accidentally went off, and the contents of both barrels lodged in the legs of Sir John, who was at a short distance. The unfortunate gentleman was immediately conveyed to his residence, where medical assistance was speedily obtained. The melancholy occurrence, when made known, created the liveliest sympathy and regret; and to no one has it proved a source of deeper sorrow than to the gentleman who was the unconscious cause of the distressing accident.

ACCIDENT ON THE BRIGHTON RAILWAY.—On Monday morning, as the seven o'clock mixed train from Brighton was approaching the Clayton Tunnel slowly, in consequence of the slippery state of the rails from the fog, a pilot engine, proceeding to its usual station at Horley, came up with the train, and struck the last carriage, a third-class, which was unhooked from the train. The passengers in that carriage suffered a severe shock, and many of them jumped out; in so doing, Mr. Neale, of Fleet-street, printer, was cut in the foot, and others sustained some bruises, amongst whom was a lady residing at Clapham. No injury accrued to the engine or carriage. The train was immediately stopped, and the carriage reattached, and all the passengers, excepting a lady and gentleman, who, we believe from alarm and not from injury, returned to Brighton, were brought on ward to their respective destinations in safety.

FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE CROYDON ATMOSPHERIC RAILWAY.—On Monday a long inquiry was instituted before Mr. Carter, at the White Horse Inn, Croydon, on the remains of Michael Murphy, aged 32, who was killed during some experimental trips on the above (atmospheric) line. Mr. Samuda, the engineer of the line, and several gentlemen connected with railways, were present during the proceedings. The jury having viewed the body of the deceased, which was frightfully mutilated, several witnesses were called, and stated that the deceased had received sufficient warning to get out of the way when the train was coming, but which warning he did not heed. The jury, after a few minutes' deliberation, returned a verdict of "Accidental Death."

ACCIDENT TO SIR G. SMART.—We regret to learn that Sir George Smart, in returning from the Beethoven festival at Bonn, has met with a painful accident. At Dover the steamboats were unable to approach the pier head of a small boat, in a rough sea, and Sir George, in getting into this boat from the steamer, stumbled and hurt his leg so severely that he has since been confined to bed. We understand, however, that he expects soon to be able to return to town and resume his professional duties

SUICIDE BY JUMPING INTO THE SEA.—On Saturday afternoon last, when the Wilkens Dundee steam vessel was on her passage from Hull to London, a passenger jumped overboard, near the lower middle buoy abreast the Sheers, and was drowned. The moment Captain Turner saw the gentleman in the water, he ordered the engines to be reversed, and the boat to be lowered. The order was instantly obeyed, but all the efforts of the crew were ineffectual. During the voyage he was observed to be exceedingly low spirited and restless. On Friday night he partook of tea with the rest of the passengers, and he sat in the cabin all night. On Saturday morning he took breakfast alone. At about two o'clock in the afternoon he had a small bottle of porter and a biscuit; and, after the other passengers had dined, he dined by himself on deck; and soon after he had finished his meal he jumped overboard. He was about five feet eight inches high, had a round face, appeared to be thirty-two years of age, and was dressed in a dark frock tagliou coat, light drab trousers, light waistcoat, light neckerchief, and wellington boots. A passenger was booked as Mr. N. Coll, Norwich, who was supposed to be the gentleman who drowned himself, as a box, with that name upon it, was left on board, and had not been claimed. There were also a light leather portmanteau, a coat, and fishing tackle unclaimed. The deceased was said to have received a letter from the other passengers had all moved to the opposite side of the vessel, to look at the Gazelle steamer, which was rapidly passing along.

A CHILD KILLED BY A POLICE VAN.—On Tuesday, as the police van was proceeding down Great Peter street, Westminster, from the Tothill fields Bridewell, a child about 18 months old, belonging to Mr. Crate, the confectioner, of 71 in the same street, having wandered from the footpath itself in the kennel, together with a number of other children, and ere it could be got out of the way the fore wheel passed over the little creature's body; at the same moment the blinder on the off side of the horse struck the head from it. The body being afterwards picked up by the policeman belonging to the vehicle. The agony of the parents may be judged from the fact, that both, unfortunately, were in the shop at the time, and were witnesses of the dreadful mutilation of their child.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

A letter from the frontiers of Turkey, dated Aug. 14, has the following :—"The whole pashalic of Bagdad is in alarm. Redschid Pacha, the governor of that province, a fanatic Turk, well known for having taken by storm the holy city of Kerbela, has expelled Achmed Pacha, the hereditary governor of Sulimanie, from his post, after a desperate action, he having caused a messenger to have his head cut off when arrived at Bagdad, and sent to summon him to appear in person before the governor. Redschid, indeed, appointed a brother of Achmed in his room, but in vain. Arabia is, likewise, in a complete state of rebellion. The state of Albania and Bosnia is not much better "

The congress of Italian savans, which is to assemble at Naples this year, will open their sittings on the 20th inst. The meetings will take place in the Zoological Hall, and are to terminate on the 5th of the ensuing month. The Palace of Villa Franca has been taken by the Government for the ball and fêtes which are to be given on the occasion. Prince Canino has already arrived at Naples.

The following is extracted from a letter dated Sydney (New South Wales), April 7 "We have had a delightful summer, but the colony is in a very depressed state; the bank question is now pending in the Supreme Court, and until that is settled, nothing will go a head. A comet was visible here in September last, and on the night of the 28th of March, also a remarkably large fiery meteor, on the night of the 28th of December, 1844, passed over the zenith from the southern horizon to the northern."

Accounts from Taganrog, of August 10, announce that Prince Woronzoff, after the expedition of Anapa, had proceeded to a new kind of warfare—that of burning the forests which serve as shelter to the Circassians. Upwards of fifty waggons, laden with turpentine, resin, and other inflammable matters, had left Taganrog for that object.

The Weser Gazette publishes a letter from Denmark, in which it is stated that the Minister of Foreign Affairs of that country intends to go to England and Austria, with the view of obtaining from the Earl of Aberdeen and Prince Metternich the guarantee of the unity of the Danish Monarchy and the succession to the throne.

ADDRESS.—On the Brunswick of the 3rd instant, state, that during three consecutive evenings collisions had occurred between the Chasseurs of the Battalion of the Guard and the journeyman shoemakers in that city The soldiers had taken their swords with them, and wounded several unarmed persons. The police at length, assisted by the military, succeeded in restoring order

The Magdeburg Gazette states that the inquiry into the cause of the unhappy riot at Leipsic had been brought to a close, and the result of it goes to show that there did not exist any premeditation upon the part of those inculpated The refusal of the Communal Guard to join its commander, when he cried, "Long live his Royal Highness Prince John," caused the distrust which subsequently broke out in the unfortunate manifestation which took place.

A murder was committed a few nights ago at the village of St. Aignan, near Dieppe. An old woman, named Lecointe, living in a farm with her relatives, and remarkable for the kindness of her disposition, was found by her sister in law in an expiring condition, the place in the utmost disorder, and all the linen and valuables carried off. The unfortunate woman's head had been beaten in, apparently with a hammer. She died in a few hours, without having uttered a single word. Nothing has since been discovered of the authors of the crime

A letter from Amsterdam, dated September 8th, says :—"The provisional suppression of the Middelburg Commercial Railway has been obtained by Heer Dirk Dronckers. The capital is already subscribed. The line will run from Middleburg to the island of South Beveland (with a branch to Flushing), Bath, Bergen op Zoom, by Steenbrecht, Bois le Duc, by Steenbergen and Breda, Venloo, and Maestricht."

A Berlin letter of the 2nd instant states that the Minister of War has addressed a circular to all the generals holding commands, stating that the King of Prussia, in order to encourage sobriety in his army, has ordered that every soldier in cantonment, in camp, or in bivouac, who may be willing to give up his allowance of brandy, shall receive the value in money. The president of the temperance society at Berlin has requested the Minister of War to lay at the feet of his Majesty the expression of the gratitude of all the temperance societies of Germany for this measure.

It is stated from Chemnitz, in Prussia, under date of Aug. 30, that the splendid establishment in that city for the construction of machinery, belonging to Mr. K. Hartmann, had been totally destroyed by fire on the preceding evening. The loss is estimated at between forty and fifty thousand pounds, while the building only is insured for £7000 in the Aix la Chapelle Company. The cause of the fire is as yet a mystery.

The Universal German Gazette gives the following from Constantinople, August 10 :—"The revolt in the province of Wan is extended to the neighbouring provinces of Musch de Bitlis and de Ischildar. The general of division, Baschar Pacha, has again marched from Erzeroum with a body of troops against the disordered provinces. Some Circassians just arrived at Constantinople from the bulletin of the Seraskier regard to the late victory, and state positively that Schamil has pursued the same tactics he has hitherto done—to engage in no pitched battle, but, by incessant skirmishes, to cause immense loss of men to the Russians."

We learn from Berlin that the Empress of Russia was to leave St. Petersburgh on the 3d instant, for the former city. Her Majesty was expected to remain there a week, and was then to proceed to the Lake of Como, and afterwards to Nice, where the Russian steam frigate, the Vramtschatka, is waiting to take her to Palermo.

The anniversary fête of the constitution was celebrated at Leipsic on the 4th instant, with great pomp. Large bodies of men and women passed through the streets as early as five in the morning, singing patriotic songs Later in the day there were public services in the churches, after which the communal guards assembled on the Rossplatz, and went through a series of evolutions. They afterwards filed off in front of the Hotel de Ville, on the balcony of which the authorities showed themselves. Everything passed off with great enthusiasm and conviviality.

We read in a letter from Tarnowitz, in Silesia, dated the 30th ult.:—"M. Ronge arrived here this evening, at eight o'clock. An immense crowd assembled in front of the hotel where he alighted, and uttered cries of 'Death to Ronge.' Sad excesses would probably have taken place, but for the exhortations of some moderate Roman Catholics, who induced the crowd to disperse."

It is stated from Athens, August 19th, that Coletti having now all his own way, things in Greece assume gradually the appearance of former days, that is to say, as they were under the Turkish rule—despotism in the government, and cowardly ferocity in the governed, in fact, the old Janissary system of Constantinople, if you only change the name to that of Policari. The robbers who exercise their trade on shore with impunity, try to do the same at sea, in consequence of which the Austrian man-of war steamer Vulcano, the French Rubis, and two small Greek cutters have been sent to the Piræus in pursuit of them.

The Rhenish Observer, the only paper in the Protestant interest published in the Prussian dominions on the Rhine, states that Prince Albert has just sent 700 thalers, about £100, towards the enlargement of the Protestant church at Bonn.

RETURN TO ANTWERP.

Her Majesty took her departure from the Hotel Belle Vue, Deutz, on Saturday morning at a quarter to nine o'clock. The Royal carriage was escorted by a guard of honour of Prussian cavalry, and reached the Cologne Railway station precisely at nine. The Queen was received at the station by the Prussian commandant, the staff of the garrison, and the railway authorities, a large number of the respectable inhabitants being assembled on the platform to witness the departure of the Royal train. The state carriage was gaily dressed out with flags, but there was no other display of any kind to distinguish the special train from an ordinary one. Her Majesty remained in the waiting-room for a few minutes, while the necessary arrangements were being made, and having expressed her thanks to the railway authorities for their attention, was handed to her carriage by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and the Royal train started immediately afterwards, a salute of artillery being fired from the ramparts as the carriages moved off. The first station, Horren, about 14 miles from Cologne, was reached in 42 minutes. A second engine was here attached, and the train, after the delay of a few minutes, moved on to Duren at an accelerated pace, but up to Langerwehe, the great coal and iron district of Germany, about forty miles from Cologne, the speed of the train never exceeded 20 miles per hour At this station an immense crowd of the boys and girls employed in the manufactories rushed out on the arrival of the train, surrounded the Royal carriages, thrusting their sooty and coal begrimed faces up to the windows, and expressed their opinion to each other in good broad Deutsch, and with the most perfect nonchalance, upon the personal appearance, dress, &c., of the Royal travellers. At Aix-la-Chapelle, which the train reached at half-past eleven, the Belgian carriages were substituted for the Prussian ones, in which the Queen and her suite had previously travelled. Her Majesty alighted at the station while the change was being made, a body of Prussian soldiers being on duty on the platform. In twenty minutes the train was again in motion, the crowds assembled at the station giving three hearty cheers. At the top of the inclined plane the rope was detached, and the train then proceeded with great speed, reaching Malines at half-past four o'clock.

Her Majesty reached Antwerp about half-past five o'clock on Saturday evening, and, after a few moments' delay at the station, her Majesty, Prince Albert, and the King and Queen of the Belgians, proceeded in one of the Royal carriages to the Palace, escorted by a detachment of cavalry. Her Majesty looked well, though apparently rather fatigued with her journey.

In the evening, a grand banquet took place in the Palace. The dinner took place at seven o'clock, and included her Majesty and Prince Albert, the King and Queen of the Belgians, Ladies Canning and Gainsborough, the Earls of Liverpool and Aberdeen, Colonel Wylde, Mr. Anson, the Belgian Minister of Foreign Affairs, the Minister of War, the Minister of the Interior, General Goethals, Commandant of Division; M. Vinck, Governor, ad interim, of the City of Antwerp; M. Legrelle, Burgomaster of the City; Sir Hamilton Seymour, British Minister at the Belgian Court; Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence, M. Teichman, Inspector-General of Roads and Bridges; Lieut.-Colonel Holling, Commandant of the Guard of Honour of Chasseurs; la Comtesse de Merode, Dame d'Honneur to the Queen of the Belgians; le Comte d'Arschot, Grand Maréschal de Palais; Le Comte d'Hane, Equerry to the King of the Belgians; Lieut.-General De Lien, Aide-de-Camp du Roi; Lieut.-Colonel Hallard, Gouverneur des Princes; M. Conway, Intendant-General du Palais et Secretaire de la Liste Civile; Dr. Carswell, Médecin du Roi, &c.

At half-past seven precisely the town was brilliantly illuminated. Along the streets tall posts were placed at intervals, surmounted by rows of lamps in the form of a pyramid; the fronts of most of the houses, and all the public buildings, were also lighted up with rows of coloured lamps. The façade of the governor's house was one blaze of light, showing off very artistically the fresco decorations of the arms of England and Belgium, surrounded by wreaths of flowers and gilded scrolls, which were emblazoned on the spaces between the windows. The Hotel de Ville had the whole of its vast extent of windows lighted up, five tiers of lamps running from the basement story to the roof, and pouring a flood of light upon the admiring crowds in the Grand-place below. The principal gate, leading to the quay, was another object of attraction; it was surmounted by a pile of flags of all nations, the arms of England and Belgium being conspicuously displayed in the centre; stars and scrolls of gas, with the ciphers of the English and Belgian Sovereigns, were exhibited on the river front, the whole surrounded by coloured lamps, and wreaths of laurel and evergreen. The quays, however, presented the most striking and beautiful effect. Along either bank cones of fire, elevated on poles, extended the whole length of the city, and in the intervals lighted torches and tar barrels cast a wild and lurid light upon the crowds who poured along the quays. The Tête de Flandres, on the opposite side of the river, was also one blaze of light, rows of lamps displaying the various lines of its batteries and entrenchments; the whole of the left bank bristled with tar and pitch barrels, around which the dark figures of the men employed to feed the flame were seen hovering at intervals, their figures casting gigantic shadows across the stream. The English Government steamers, and the other vessels in the river, were also hung with lamps. The General Steam Navigation Company's steam ship, Soho, which was moored in the centre of the stream, opposite the Royal yacht, was conspicuous for the variety and brilliancy of its illuminations.

At intervals during the night blue and red signal lights were burned, lighting up the river, the quays, and shipping, with a strange and dazzling glare. Again, sheaves of rockets went roaring into the air, scattering their brilliant stars over the Scheldt, and on the deep and rapid stream below, thousands of boats—from the light skiff to the heavy, lumbering coal barge—freighted with the worthy citizens of Antwerp, and carrying torches of pine in the bow and stern, floated to and fro, chanting their national airs in full, deep chorus, and with these were mingled the oaths, imprecations, confusion, and uproar, that followed the frequent collisions of the river craft, the strains of military music from the banks, the hum and Babel of the many thousands who promenaded along the quays, enjoying the Venetian carnival, and, above all, the solemn peals of the Cathedral bells, and the roar of artillery from the Citadel. At nine o'clock the Queen and her suite left the Palace, and proceeded through the Place de Meir, the Marché aux Soulers, by the Hotel de Ville and the Canal au Beurre, to the quay, alongside which the Royal yacht was moored. The progress of the Royal party was extremely slow, in consequence of the crowded state of the streets, but it afforded the Queen and the Prince an opportunity of viewing the illuminations and the other demonstrations of respect which were exhibited along their route. On approaching the Cathedral, a signal was given, and instantly the whole of the magnificent tower was illuminated with Bengal lights. The effect was extremely fine, every taper shaft and pillar, carved ornament, and delicate tracery of this most beautiful specimen of Gothic architecture being distinctly revealed, and standing out like pure white marble on the dark sky. A loud burst of applause followed this magnificent spectacle, the roar of tens of thousands of voices over the wide city, and along the river banks, rising into the calm night air like the rush of a mighty whirlwind. A few minutes, and the brilliant pageant was gone, and the Queen was on board the Royal yacht—a broadside from the decks of the Soho announcing the return of the Mistress of the Seas. A guard of Belgian soldiers was stationed on the quay, to prevent the intrusion of the crowd; and up to a late hour the river continued crowded with boats, torches flared wildly over the heads of the revellers, or struck upon the gunwale in tune to the music, and showered streams of fire into the hissing flood, the lights and figures reflected and multiplied on the surface of the black and boiling current.

The illustration upon our front page represents the brilliant scene of Antwerp on Saturday night, as seen from the Scheldt.

DEPARTURE FROM ANTWERP, AND ARRIVAL AT TREPORT.

On Sunday, the Royal yacht departed from Antwerp. Some astonishment had been previously excited by a report that her Majesty intended to pay a visit to Louis Philippe, at Tréport, before her return to the Isle of Wight.

It appears, however, that this was not a sudden determination, as was at first supposed, but that her Majesty had all along entertained some idea of paying the visit. Indeed the following explanation, which we believe to be a correct one, seems to afford any thing but a pleasant sketch from the King of the French to her Majesty while yet on the Rhine conveyed the invitation, which the then menacing state of the weather obliged her Majesty to reply to conditionally. It is said that the King gallantly intimated his intention to meet the Royal squadron at sea. Her Majesty, wishing to spare her illustrious friend so fatiguing a proof of good-will, and the weather having become all that could be desired, despatched a letter to the King of the French accepting of the invitation to repose at Eu. It was not until the receipt of the Queen's autograph letter on Wednesday week that her Majesty's intention was known definitively.

To this we may add that the Journal des Débats of Sunday last announced as a positive fact, that her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain might, in the course of the same day, be expected at Tréport, on a visit to the Royal Family of France, and that she would re-embark on Tuesday for the Isle of Wight. Although the Presse and the France had on Saturday made a similar announcement, the Paris journals evidently distrusted the news, for those of Sunday passed it over.

The Royal yacht got under way from Antwerp at seven o'clock on Sunday morning, and glided majestically through the muddy waters of the lazy Scheldt, until she came to Flushing, when the vessel was hove to for three hours. The Black Eagle was some slight distance astern, but she brought up alongside the Royal yacht at Flushing. Several members of the suite went ashore, and drove as far as Middelburg, but neither her Majesty nor Prince Albert left the ship.

At seven o'clock on Sunday evening, the Royal yacht and Black Eagle again got under weigh, and on leaving the Scheldt, bore up for Tréport.

So early as four o'clock on Monday morning a distant report of cannon was heard at Tréport. Although not yet daybreak, some excitement became instantly obvious in this little town, ordinarily so tranquil. At seven o'clock two steamers were distinguished far off in the east, the most advanced of which immediately commenced firing. She was found to be a French steamer (the Pluton, it was believed), and she was understood to fire as well to announce the approach of the Queen of England as to salute.

All was bustle immediately afterwards. The foot soldiery, the line, the Cuirassiers, the Chasseurs, and all the military who had remained here during the night, were placed en bataille, although it was evident that two hours must elapse ere the Queen could land.

At eight o'clock the King and Queen of the French, the Princess Adelaide, and, indeed, all the members of the Royal Family, arrived in the grand char-a-banc, followed by eight or ten other carriages, filled with those distinguished guests, and other high personages. The King was in delight, and looked better than he has done for six months. He raised his hat vigorously, in return to the salutations with which he was received.

Half an hour afterwards the British steamer, with the Royal standard of England displayed, was within a mile of the shore. King Louis Philippe immediately entered a barge, with a few attendants, and proceeded to the Courrier steamer, in which he approached the Victoria and Albert. From the Courrier his Majesty descended into a boat fully manned, and pulled to the Victoria and Albert. Queen Victoria and Prince Albert were distinctly visible on the deck, and immediately after King Louis Philippe was seen to ascend

The mode of landing was rather a curious one. The following account is given of it in one of the letters:—"At half past eight twelve Royal chars-à-banc arrived at Tréport. In the first were the King, the Queen, the Duchess of Orleans, the Prince and Princess of Salerno, the Prince de Joinville, Prince Augustus and the Princess Clementine of Saxe Coburg, and the Duchess d'Aumale. The Royal yacht immediately afterwards dropped anchor at about the distance of half a mile from the shore, but, the tide being so low that the boat which formerly carried her Majesty from the steamer to the pier could not be used on this occasion, other means had to be employed, and for want of better, Queen Victoria, her illustrious consort, and his Majesty of France, were obliged to come ashore in a common bathing-machine, which was made to look more hideous, because moreover spicuous, by having a large tri-coloured flag stuck upon the top of it. Louis Philippe was accompanied on board the Queen's yacht by the Prince de Joinville and Prince Augustus of Saxe Coburg."

At a quarter-past nine o'clock our Queen landed, and was received by her Majesty the Queen of the French, the Prince de Salerno, &c., and warmly embraced each other. Never did her Majesty Queen Victoria appear in more magnificent health.

Prince Albert looked a little pale, but was evidently in high spirits.

A few moments only elapsed when they entered their carriages amid deafening cheers, and the still more deafening thunder of the guns of the battery close by, and of all the ships of war in the offing. One cheer more took place after the first plunge of the horses, and a line of dust indicated the rapid departure of the cortège for Eu.

ARRIVAL OF HER MAJESTY AT EU.

At 33 minutes past nine o'clock on Monday morning, the char-a-banc in which were her Majesty Queen Victoria, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, the King and Queen of the French, &c., entered the Grand Court of the Chateau of Eu. The French looked in excellent health, and most animatedly acknowledged the cheers of the privileged few who were admitted within its precincts, and the salute of the troops, whose cries of Vive le Roi were heard above the musical band, which, immediately on her Majesty's appearance, commenced playing "God save the Queen."

M. Guizot and some other persons of distinction were at the great entrance of the chateau, and were first to hail the Queen's arrival at Eu.

After a moment or two her Majesty, accompanied by her illustrious hosts, appeared in the balcony over the entrance, and again, with much apparent warmth, expressed her sense of the hearty good will with which all around had cheered her.

The crowd was enthusiastic but respectful; there was no cheering, for cheering is not the custom of France, but a deep respect was imprinted on the countenances of all, and even the bourgeoises, marchandes des modes, and poissardes occasionally exclaimed, "Comme elle est gentille, comme elle à de bonnes façons, comme elle à de la grace, comme elle est bien mise et gracieuse." Her Majesty certainly merited all these commendatory epithets, for her dress was simple, natural, and tasteful, and her manner of a grace and sweetness formed to captivate and subdue. Her Majesty wore a plain straw bonnet, which became her exceedingly. Prince Albert, too, looked in high health and spirits. Few of our wandering countrymen were present on this occasion, else the cheering would have been more hearty and enthusiastic.

At eleven o'clock her Britannic Majesty and party had partaken of a lunch, or déjeüner à la fourchette—and at two o'clock the Royal party proceeded to take a drive in the forest

There was not a remark or a suggestion made by our Queen on the occasion of her last visit which has not been attended to. The park has been enlarged, the approaches to the chateau have been widened, new iron gates have been erected, the town has been wonderfully improved, some of the woods and underwoods have been thinned, and workmen are in scores carrying into effect the suggestions and observations of Queen Victoria.

The King of the French looks younger and more hale and hearty than he was four years and a half ago. He is considerably less stout than he was then, and seems altogether firmer on his limbs; but there is a great change in the Queen of the French, who looks aged and careworn.

At the dinner, on Monday evening, our Most Gracious Sovereign sat next Louis Philippe, and nothing could be more gracious and affabl than her demeanour. As to the King of the French, he seemed in a state of spirits, and was as gay and débonnaire in his manner as he was in the days of his early youth. All the members of his household remarked that they had never before seen his Majesty in such spirits as he was during evening. Love the Queen, he appeared delighted with her reception. On her Majesty's right sat the Prince of Salerno, to whom she talked at intervals, and who appeared charmed with her ease and natural grace. One of the guests who sat opposite to her Majesty observed that her French was perfect, and the Queen of the French was heard to say, in reference to our Queen, "Elle est adorable." Indeed, her Majesty appears to have been not only the observed but the admired of all observers.

The Queen of the French paid much attention to Prince Albert, who has also won golden opinions by his ease and unaffectedness. Lord Liverpool is also a great favourite, owing principally to the amenity and urbanity of his manners. He sat next M. Guizot, and conversed much with him during the dinner. The dinner, which was ordered at six, was not served till nearly twenty minutes afterwards, and it was fully a quarter past eight when the party proceeded to the theatre. The pieces were "Le Seigneur du Village," and "Richard Cœur de Lion," and the performances were not over till one in the morning. Our Queen was, nevertheless, up at seven on Tuesday, and was walking at half-past seven in the grounds, with Prince Albert. Shortly afterwards Lord Aberdeen and M. Guizot appeared, and walked together before breakfast. The town of Eu was early in motion, and up betimes.

At twenty minutes past eleven precisely, three of the Royal chars-à-bancs, in deep blue, picked in gold, with the Royal arms richly emblazoned, took up their station in the palace-yard, or cour de palais, and, exactly at half-past eleven, drew up before the porch of the chateau. Immediately afterwards, the King of the French descended the staircase, leading the Queen of England on his arm, whom he handed into the char-à-banc, taking his place immediately beside her. The Queen of the French immediately followed, being handed in by Prince Albert; then followed the Duchess of Orleans, the Princess Clementine, the Prince of Salerno, &c. The carriage of the Prince de Joinville followed, with some of the ladies of her Britannic Majesty's suite. In the second char-à-banc were Lord Aberdeen, Lord Liverpool, M. Guizot, Baron Athalin, and others of the official persons; and the third contained the equerries, private secretaries, &c. Six carriages followed, containing others of the guests; and at twenty-five minutes before twelve the last of the carriages had proceeded to the Forest of Eu, where the Queen was to take a lengthened drive, and afterwards to have a collation. Her Majesty was becomingly dressed in a pink silk bonnet, and a simple white muslin dress, trimmed with pink.

At a little after one o'clock the Royal party returned, having enjoyed a delightful promenade. His Majesty the King of the French pointed out to the Queen the most picturesque views of the forest, and also exhibited to her the improvements made since 1843, the period of her last visit.

DEPARTURE FROM VILLE D'EU.

The Royal party dined at half-past four o'clock. At six o'clock six of the Royal char-à-bancs and four carriages drew up before the perron of the chateau. The King descended first and handed in the Queen. The same ceremony was gone through by Prince Albert in handing in the Queen of the French, after which the Duchess of Orleans and the Princess Clementine followed. Ten minutes before six an avant-courreur started for Tréport, who arrived exactly at six, to herald the approach of the Royal party. He arrived two minutes after six, and in ten minutes afterwards was followed by a piquet of cavalry au galop; then followed, at intervals, about a dozen calèches, and at a quarter-past six precisely, the King of the French, the Queen of England, the Queen of the French, and all the personages heretofore mentioned arrived at the end of the jetty of Tréport.

The parting between the Queen of the French and our loved Sovereign was touching and mournful to a degree. The Queen of the French embraced our Sovereign; she kissed her frequently, and grasped her hand with an emotion honourable and creditable to her heart, yet painful to behold. The scene would have been insupportable had it been more than moments, but fortunately the King interposed, and, offering his arm, conducted our Sovereign to the ladder descending to the Var. The King of the French descended first, with a firm and quick step, then followed the captain of the Var, to do the honours of his ship to her Britannic Majesty. The worthy seaman offered his hand to a British Queen in a frank, sailor-like fashion; but Queen Victoria descended with great ease. Traversing the deck of the Var, preceded by the captain bowing to her to the gangway, she followed the King of the French to the Royal canot, and again descended the companion to the barge without aid.

At half-past six M. Guizot, and Lords Liverpool and Aberdeen were aboard the canot, and a signal was given by the captain of the Var to push off. The foot of Lord Liverpool slipped in descending, but he recovered himself speedily, and took his place next Lord Aberdeen. A moment afterwards the canot of the Var gave a signal to the sailors, who manned the yards of his vessel, which was first followed by the King, who, taking off his hat, cheered to the top of his voice. The sailors of the Var did their best, and heartily, but French seamen do not understand a British cheer. The canot was now in motion, and tolerably well rowed, but though the sea was as calm as an inland lake, more than twenty minutes were occupied in gaining the Victoria and Albert, which lay not half a mile distant. Salvoes of artillery were now fired from all the batteries of Tréport, Mers, and Eu, which were answered by the French steamers in the offing. It was full seven o'clock before the Queen was aboard of her yacht, and the evening, still beautiful, was becoming overspread with the shades of night

At half-past six, just as her Majesty embarked, the sun disappearing sank in a golden flood, but the vessel was still visible amidst the shades of evening, and at a quarter past seven his Majesty Louis Philippe bade a final adieu to his Royal friend and ally. The Queen of the French, accompanied by Madame Adelaide, the Count of Paris, and the ladies of her suite, remained in her char-à-banc anxiously awaiting her Royal Consort. He safely arrived on shore about 40 minutes past seven, and immediately drove off to the Palace of Eu. The crowd for the most part had disappeared half an hour before.

Thus has ended this second visit of Queen Victoria to Louis Philippe.

HER MAJESTY'S ARRIVAL IN THE ISLE OF WIGHT.

At nine a.m. on Wednesday, the Porcupine steamer, Capt. Fred. Bullock, arrived in Portsmouth harbour with a despatch for Admiral Dacres, to inform him that her Majesty the Queen and Prince Albert, with their suite, on board the Royal yacht Victoria and Albert, Captain Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence, would pass through Spithead in a few hours. The Porcupine proceeded on to Cowes, to prepare for her Majesty's reception at Osborne House.

At fifty minutes past ten o'clock the Royal yacht was seen through the haze coming from the eastward, and soon after the Royal standard was made out flying from the main. At twenty minutes past eleven the guns from the Victory and Pitchfork battery boomed forth their noisy sounds, welcoming her Majesty on her return to her own shores. The Victoria and Albert passed through Spithead, followed closely by the little Fairy tender, Master Commander Roberts, and at a greater distance by the Black Eagle Admiralty yacht, Master Commander Cook, and proceeded on to Cowes. The weather was beautifully fine, though a little hazy, and the surface of the water quite smooth. No doubt her Majesty had a delightful passage from Tréport.

Rear Admiral Dacres sailed in the Portsmouth tender at eleven o'clock, to pay his respects to her Majesty at Osborne House, but on account of the wind falling the Bee steamer was sent out for his accommodation.

RETURN OF HER MAJESTY TO OSBORNE HOUSE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

COWES, Wednesday

A Royal salute from the guns at Portsmouth this morning, at twenty minutes past eleven, was distinctly heard at Cowes, and which announced to those on the look-out for the return of her Majesty and the Prince from their continental tour, that the Royal party were approaching the island from the eastward. Shortly after twelve, the Royal flotilla hove in sight from the Castle, consisting of the Royal yacht Victoria and Albert, Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence, bearing the Royal standard at the main, her Majesty's steam tender Fairy, and her Majesty's steamer Black Eagle, belonging to the Lords of the Admiralty. The standard, on being recognised, was immediately saluted by the guns from Cowes Castle and the Royal Yacht Squadron House. The Royal yacht stood in towards Mede Hole, and came to her moorings there. Her Majesty and his Royal Highness and their respective suites immediately embarked in the Royal barge, and at a quarter past twelve landed on the new causeway lately erected in Mede Hole for the accommodation of the Royal party. The carriages were in attendance for their reception; and, having entered the same, the Royal parents were in a few minutes in the presence of their children. Her Majesty, we are happy to say, looked remarkably well after her voyage, the first day of which the weather was very boisterous.

Her Majesty embarked at Tréport yesterday afternoon, but the Royal yacht did not get under way until two o'clock this morning, the voyage having been performed in about ten hours, under the most auspicious circumstances, it being nearly a calm throughout, and the weather just adapted for steam navigation.

His Majesty Louis Philippe spent several hours on board the yacht during the afternoon, and we understand that the interview between the two Sovereigns was most cordial; the King walked the deck with the Prince for some hours together, in mutual conversation.

H.M.S. Monkey arrived here on Tuesday morning, having on board three of the Royal carriages, which were landed at East Cowes. She parted company with the Royal yacht the day previous.

The works are rapidly progressing at Osborne and on the estate, and a considerable part of the park fencing is already up; the whole will be enclosed by a ring fence of split oak paling, of about eight feet in height.

SONG OF THE RHINE.

(FROM THE GERMAN OF SCHENKENDORF.)

BY LEWIS FILMORE

There is a tone that deeply thrills
Each native German heart along;
With it his verse the poet fills
Whene'er he wakes a German song;
'Tis of an ancient high-born king,
Whose worth each German heart will sing;

His name is as a trumpet-call
That stirs the blood of each and all.

It is his name the rapid RHINE!
Though states and kingdom rich he rolls,
His name, as welcome as his wine,
Each true born German heart consoles.

In every breast his sway is still
For Fatherland, its good, its ill—
Of all we think, whene'er begun
A song of Rhine—proud, rock-born son.

But ah! the foeman's hand had now
Robbed him of all his glory's pride,
And stripped from off his kingly brow
The verdant vine wreath round it tied;

Then tetter'd lay the hero's form;
His proud lament, his anger's storm,
We oft have heard at midnight deep,
As spirits o'er him seemed to sweep.

How sang the conquered hero then?
With voice of mingled scorn and woe.—

"O worthless world, and worthless men,
From whom no more may freedom glow!
Your honour gone, your trust all o'er—
Oh, can they then return no more?
'Tis mine to grieve my children's ill guilt,
To mourn each broken German right.

"Alas! my ancient, glorious time,
To me a spring like golden day!
Still as when in my grandsire's prime,
My youth before me seems to play;
When by my banks, on either side,
Walked noble forms with mien of pride,
Heroes who far and wide would roam,
With Soul and Sword to win their home.

"A race of worth once placed them here,
When giant-forms possessed the land;
Their lion-hearts ne'er felt a fear
Yet gentle they as maiden's hand;
In song their names men still retain,
How they by Hagen vile were slain,
And that dark deed's inciting gold,
My rocky bed still safe doth hold.

"So rage, ye tyrants, stain'd with crime!
Your guilty cup soon filled shall be!
That Nibelungen Hoard, in time
Shall rise and arm my every lay!
Your hearts shall sink with fear and dread,
When I my terrors round you spread,
I well and true beneath my wave,
Have kept the store old Wisdom gave."

Lo! now fulfilled is every word!
Our monarch old has broke his chain,
The Nibelungen's mighty Hoard
Hath risen to the light again—
Oh may it be our German pride,
To guard it well on every side!
Be ever justice, might, and fame
Link'd with our ancient German glow!

Grace, then, our Ancient Lord, to thee!
Again we drink thy welcome wine
O guiding star of thy freedom be,
And for our signal word—"The Rhine."

Anew to him our oath we swear,
As we must him, he us shall hear—
"Free from the rock his stream doth roam,
And to Seas's ocean free shall go."

* The occupation of Germany by France.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS, RECENTLY DECEASED.

CAPTAIN ROBERT MAUNSELL, C.B.

The family of Maunsell, of Thorpe Malsor, in Northamptonshire, of which this gallant officer was a scion, is descended from the period of the Conquest. Ralph Maunsell held lands in Buckinghamshire in the time of Henry II., and his lineal descendant, John Maunsell, Esq., of Cheshire, Bucks, a barrister, purchased from Lord Holland the estate, manor, and estate of Thorpe Malsor, in the county of Northampton, in 1622. From that time to the present, the main stock of the family have continued to reside at Thorpe Malsor in affluence and high distinction. Captain Maunsell, whose death we here record, was the fourth son of a younger brother of the house.

His father, the late Very Reverend William Maunsell, was Archdeacon of Kildare, and Chancellor of Limerick. He had by his second wife, Lucy, daughter and coheiress of Robert Oliver, Esq., of Castle Oliver, five sons and two daughters, of whom the eldest son inherited the family estate, and is the present Thomas Philip Maunsell, Esq., of Thorpe Malsor; the second son, William, is Archdeacon of Limerick; and the fourth son was Robert, the subject of this notice. This distinguished seaman was born in 1785, and entered the navy early in life. In 1803, when a Midshipman of the Minotaur, he contrived, in the boats of that ship, to cut out a convoy near Toulon: for this he was promoted to a Lieutenancy in 1805.

In 1808 he was made a Commander; and, while holding that station, he achieved the following exploit:—he led the boats of his sloop, the Procris, to the attack of six French gun-boats, and captured them off Java: he also rendered essential service on shore, in effecting the reduction of that island. The rank of Post-Captain was his reward. He commanded the Alfieri in the Mediterranean in 1831. In 1840 he was nominated a Companion of the Bath. After subsequently commanding the Rodney, he was in 1844 appointed a Commissioner of Greenwich Hospital. The death of Captain Maunsell, who was unmarried, occurred recently.

THE DEAN OF CLOYNE.

The Very Reverend John Thomas Burgh, of Oldtown, in the county of Kildare, Dean of Cloyne, was elder son of Thomas Burgh, Esq., of Oldtown, by Florinda, his wife, daughter of the Right Hon. Charles Gardiner, and great-grandson of Thomas Burgh, Esq., of Dublin, Engineer and Surveyor-General of Ireland, who was third son of Ulysses, Bishop of Ardagh, and brother of William Burgh, Esq., of Bert, ancestor of Lord Downes. The Dean of Cloyne's grand aunt, Elizabeth Burgh, wife of Ignatius Hussey, Esq., was mother of the eloquent and patriotic Walter Hussey Burgh, Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer in Ireland.

The Dean was a clergyman of great piety, learning, and eloquence; he for many years ranked as one of the most gifted and popular preachers of his day. He married, in 1813, the Lady Anna Louisa Hely Hutchinson, sister of the present Earl of Donoughmore, and his estates devolve upon his eldest son, Thomas Burgh, Esq. The amiable and respected Dean departed this life at Oldtown, on Thursday, the 4th instant; his death took place in the presence of his wife, and of several members of his family.

SUMMARY OF RAILWAY FACTS.—The Brighton and Chichester Railway is expected to be completed to Worthing next month, and throughout to Chichester by the 1st of January next. The extension of the line to Portsmouth will be shortly proceeded with.——The Grand Junction Railway Company have determined that after the 15th of this month a compartment of a first class carriage will be reserved for ladies travelling alone.——The Great Luxembourg Company have gained the concession for a line from Brussels to Namur, which in its route will so touch the Louvain and Jemeppe Railway as to give it the benefit of a direct line with Brussels.——Mr. Hudson has just purchased the beautiful building occupying the northern entrance of the Albert Gate to Hyde Park, in Knightsbridge, for £15,000.——It is said that a locomotive engine, with carriages, will pass over the line of the South Devon Railway, between Exeter and Starcross, in a month.

Accounts from Rio to the 7th July have been received by way of France. They contradict the report that the previous packet had brought home a treaty between the Brazilian and English Governments.

OTELLO.

A TALE OF THE OPERA.

VII.

"Pardon me, gentlemen," said the old Manager, entering the room with a profusion of low bows; "I interrupt your conversation, I fear?"

"What news have you?" said the Major. "Take a chair; and let me ask you to accept a glass of wine with us; and, if the question is permitted, to what we owe your visit?"

"To the afflicting certainly," said the Manager, "that 'Otello' must be played! Nothing can prevent it! I have tried everything, but in vain. I allowed it to be rehearsed, on the solemn promise of the prima donna that she would be seized with a dreadful hoarseness on the night of performance; but the devil last night brought the cantatrice Allnutt here, with recommendations to the Court, in addition to her fame, to back her; and I have orders from the highest quarters to give her the part of Desdemona. She will not be taken ill on any terms, and the performance is inevitable: on Sunday evening we play 'Otello.' I have nearly wept at the necessity, but no power can now avert it; and yet I have dark forebodings!"

"Come your childish tales," said the Count, who had by this time regained some composure. "I tell you not a hair of the head of one of the princely family shall be injured. I will go to the churchyard, find out these ghosts of the murdered actress, give her my compliments, and request her, this time, to close her eyes, and, if she must kill somebody, to kill me! She will then, indeed, only have a Count, and not one of Royal blood; but one of my ancestors wore a crown, if she is particular as to rank."

"Scoff not so frightfully," said the old man; "with such things there should be no jesting! I dreamed last night I saw a funeral procession pass along, with troops and torches, as Princess are borne to the tomb!"

"A bad dream, certainly," said the Major, laughing. "You had eaten too much supper, perhaps. And what more natural than that you should dream of a funeral when you had been talking all day of death?"

The old Manager was not to be rallied out of his despondency. "It is not for you, above all men," he said, addressing the Major, "to make a mock of it. I never set foot till the hour you called on me with your friend; and yet you were walking by my side in the funeral, and you were shedding gears."

"Then I came here, I suppose, only that you might see me walking with you in a dream? You talk nonsense, my good Sir."

"Then let us break off our converse," said the old man. "What must be, will be; and perhaps we shall all have to wish that we have only dreamed. My coming here was really to invite you to the rehearsal. You have behaved so generously to us, that I shall feel it a pleasure to introduce you to our company."

The two friends accepted the invitation with alacrity. It was from pleasure did to repent of the agitation to which he had yielded, and this diversion of his mind from its late train of thought was welcome to him. His remorse and self-accusations had made a deep impression on the Major, who thankfully seized this mode of escaping from that explanation with his friend which he now rather feared than wished to encounter.

VIII

And, in fact, from this time the Count did not appear anxious to allude to it. He seemed at intervals to be gloomier than ever; at times, even, his intense excitement returned upon him; but never with it the wish to avow some great crime, which had on the occasion so nearly escaped his lips. His conversation became more reserved than usual.

The business of his diplomatic mission occupied nearly the whole time of the Major, and for some days he scarcely saw the Count at all. The latter had, during the interval, been attending the theatre with Lucrezia, was from place in the occupation itself, or the thought that he was securing a gratification to the Princess, he was present at every rehearsal; and his tact and just taste, formed by long travel, suggested many improvements, in points that had escaped the eye and ear of even such a practised critic as the Manager. And the old man would for whole hours forget his gloomy anticipations in the interest which the Count excited in him, on matters connected with his art.

"Othello" was thus in a fair way of being played in the greatest perfection, though, but a short time before, it was thought impossible it could be played at all. The opera, from its long forbidden, was, of course, popular with both to the public and the performers. No wonder they did their best to fulfil the sanguine expectations that were entertained of it; no wonder that the day was awaited for with impatience, when the "Moor of Ven..." was again to be called upon the stage.

The public interest was doubly excited by the announcement of the opera. The fair vocalist, Zuretti, had been preceded by a great reputation, and all were anxious to see how she would play Desdemona, a part which, besides a fine voice and musical skill, requires a high degree of tact and dramatic power. To this was added the vapers and rumours of the strange circumstances which were said always to attend the representation of this piece. Old persons narrated these stories; the young regarded them as fables; but all were anxious to hear nothing by the process; so that a large portion of the public firmly believed that the Evil One, in his proper person, would play a chief part in the forthcoming opera.

Major Von Laurun heard these things talked of in many places; but, at the Court, where, in the interim, he spent several evenings, not a word of "Otello" was ever mentioned. The Princess Sophia alone once made a passing allusion to it

"We have at last, then," she said to the Major, "got 'Otello' played, thanks to the influence of the Count; how I shall enjoy it—that is, if the Manager's music! If I should die, Major," she added, "Desdemona's ar shall be my 'Song of the Swan!'"

"Can she forebodings?" thought the Major, to whom this light and casual remark, in spite of himself, sounded mournfully. "Can there be forebodings in the mind, of coming fatalities? The tale of the phantom Desdemona the fears of the old Manager, his dream of the funeral train—and now, this 'Song of the Swan!'"

He followed the fair form of the Princess with his eyes, as she moved lightly through the saloon, saluting every one as she passed with courtly elegance, and like Spring, in the beautiful ballad of Schiller, throwing around her the gentle gifts of word and smile to all

"And if Baldwin could go again, and will it that she should die!" thought the Major—and the next moment he laughed at himself for the supposition. He could not account how such an idea could occur to him, generally so free from all illusions; he endeavoured to chase the thought of the phantom of the Bourse from his memory—in vain! It returned again and again, and occurred to him in the midst of the most opposite circumstances and occupations, and often he seemed to hear a soft, gentle voice, saying, "If I die, it shall be my 'Song of the Swan!'"

Sunday came, and with it a rather strange event. The Major had rode out in the afternoon with the Count and a party of officers. On their return, they were overtaken by a shower of rain, which drenched them to the skin. The Count's hotel was nearest the city gate, and he invited the Major in, that he might change his dress. The Major did so, and left the horse, wearing a mantle belonging to the Count, and wrapped also in his cloak, to proceed to his own lodgings. He was obliged to pass through several narrow streets, and at one of these turnings it struck him that a man was dogging his steps. The Major stopped, turned round suddenly, and close behind him stood a tall, haggard man, in a worn and threadbare coat.

"This is for you, Sir," he said, in a deep voice, as he thrust a small note into the Major's hand, and disappeared round the next corner.

The Major could not imagine from whom in the midst of a city where he was a total stranger, a note could be sent to him, in such a mysterious manner. He looked at it on both sides: it was of the finest glazed paper, folded with extreme neatness, and sealed with a small seal, but with no address. "Some jest, perhaps," thought the Major, and opened it carelessly. He read, and started—he read on, and turned pale—threw the paper into his pocket—flew, rather than walked, to his lodging, and shut himself into his chamber

Twilight had gathered in, and he thought that in the dim street he might not have read correctly; he called for candles; but the clear light of the tapers changed not the purport of the note, which bore the following unhappy and threatening words:—

"Wretch! Thou canst leave thy wife and hapless children to pine in misery, while revelling before the world in pride and splendour! What will become of them in this city? Will thou bring shame upon a noble and princely house, and make its daughters as miserable as thou hast made thy wife? Fly! for at the bottom of this there lies, Fr. Sph. knows the shameful secret of thy treachery!"

The Major doubted not for a moment that these lines were intended for the Count, and had fallen into his hands, from the accident of his having worked from the Count's cloak and hat. And now every hour gave rise to fears and fancy and despair was exp almed; it was repentance and self-reproach, breaking for a moment through the brilliant ve.l beneath which he had concealed the dreadful pangs of his wounded conscience. The Major's glance remained fixed on the note, which he still held in his hand: the cypher Fr. Sph. could mean nothing but the name of the fair and now unhappy creature whom the heartless betrayer had beguiled into his snares. Laurun was a man of a cool, calm, reasoning spirit; never, or very rarely, could any circumstance or event disturb his self-possession, nature and his military training combined, rendered him clear-sighted and alert in a moment of any emergency. But at the present time he was all confusion; he rose himself; rage, hatred, the most bitter contempt for the traitor, by turns took possession of his soul. He tried to view the matter in a more favourable aspect; he tried to find an excuse for the Count in his want of strength of mind in his almost boundless levity; but the thought of the Princess Sophia—glance at the "wife and helpless children," banished every wish to find a defence for him, and stirred all the indignation of his nature, which generally was all decent and treachery. There were moments in which his eye fell on the pistols, suspended against the wall, and his hand made an instinctive gesture to take them, as if he could rush forth, and himself punish the villain for his crime. But utter contempt for him effaced that whem gentler feelings could not have done. "He must fly," said he, "this very hour; the unhappy one has also betrayed must never know on what a wretch she has bestowed the priceless treasure of her love. She must weep him—must forget him; to be compelled to despise him would be her death."

He hastily threw these thoughts into a few, but bitter lines, which he addressed to the Count; took from his desk a large sum in gold, and dispatched both letter and money by his servant to the Count.

It was time to go to the theatre. How willingly would the Major have been spared the sight of any human being! And yet he thought it was his duty to prevent the terrible intelligence from reaching the Princess. He endeavoured to find some expedient by which he could effect this; he could think of none, except to implore her to take, that night, no letter from a strange hand. He dressed with as much speed as possible, and was on the point of leaving his room, when he was met by his servant, with the packet he had just dispatched in his hand

"His Excellency has just left the city," said the man.

"Left the city!" echoed the Major; "impossible!"

"His groom is at the door, Sir, with a letter for you; shall I bring him to you?"

The Major nodded; the servant vanished, and returned with the Count's groom, who, with tears in his eyes, delivered him a letter. The Major broke it open, and read, "Farewell for ever; these letter which I hear fell into your hands are too true. No explanation—my sudden departure. Will my comrade of six campaigns save a lady the pang of seeing my name exposed in every newspaper Will he pay for my horses for a few stages? Even that trifling sum I am unable to discharge!"

"When did your master leave?"

"A quarter of an hour ago, sir!"

"Do you know where he means to stop?"

"I do not, sir; I believe his Excellency did not know himself, for he intended to be to night at the opera. At five o'clock he walked out on foot, and I, to follow him; presently the Count met a haggard, mean-looking man met him, at the sight of whom my master appeared much agitated. The man walked up to him and asked him if he was Count Leslie; and my master replied 'I am.' The man asked him, if, a quarter of an hour before, he had received a note? My master said he had not; then the man spoke with my master for some time, very earnestly, but in a low voice. He could have told him no good news, for he grew deadly pale, and shook like a leaf; he turned back to the hotel, ordered post-horses, and told me to pack two trunks as quickly as possible. The Count left me to arrange his account, and all his horses, stepped into the carriage, and drove rapidly in the direction of the South-gate; he bade me good bye before he went—and I fear, for ever!"

The Major listened in silence to the narrative of the servant; he dismissed him, with an order to come to him again the next day, and went to the theatre.

THE THEATRES.

LYCEUM.

"Peter Jenkins; or, Fibbing for a Friend," is the name of an exceedingly droll comedietta, produced at this theatre on Monday evening. We are happy to record its complete success, and the more so, as it is not a translation, but a thoroughly English piece, very quaint and original, and admirably adapted to the peculiar talents of Mr. and Mrs. Keeley and Mr. Wigan, to whom the principal parts are entrusted. The story is this:—Mr. Victor de Montmorency (Mr. A. Wigan), after having passed through the different vicissitudes which diversify the existence of a "foreign gentleman upon town," contrives to capture the affections of a boarding-house keeper, who closes with him, and, joining him her hand and fortune, becomes Mrs. de Montmorency (Miss Dawson). The governess in the school, Miss Clear (Mrs. Keeley), who forwards the plans of the lovers, is taken to live with Montmorency, who, in the course of time, has formed a suitor in the person of Mr. David Brown (Mr. Meadows), whom she had jilted and that her husband has, by some means or another, become possessed of his portrait, which she had with her when she eloped. Montmorency, being of a jealous temperament, is very much excited at this, until Miss Cl ar assures him that it is the likeness of one Mr. Peter Jenkins, his wife's brother, and this half satisfies him. Things are in this position when the piece begins, the scene representing a pretty rura residence, termed "The Cottage of Love," wherein Montmorency, his wife, and Miss Clear are living. During the former career of Montmorency, he had at times been "hard up," and was then in the habit of applying to a benevolent friend, Mr. Whiffen (Mr. Keeley), for different sums, but now that his prospects have brightened, he sends to repay him, and gives an invitation to him to come and see him. Whiffen's partner, the above-mentioned David Brown, is going the same road, and they travel together to the cottage. On arriving, the little circle are enjoying an al fresco breakfast. Mrs. Montmorency sees her discarded suitor, screams, and rushes away; Miss Clear enacts the same scene; and lastly, Montmorency, seeing the likeness to the unpleasant picture, darts off with melodramatic horror, leaving Whiffen and Brown thunderstruck at their very odd reception. The latter departs, and whilst Whiffen is endeavouring to solve the mystery Miss Clear comes out to him. She tells him that has occurred—that Montmorency must never know there is such a person as Brown in the world, or she will not answer for the consequences; but that he must be told it as Mr Peter Jenkins, whose likeness he possesses. Mr. Whiffen does not much like to practise the deceit on his friend; but Miss Clear looks at him so tenderly, and sighs so fondly as she gazes on him, that he is completely entranced, and promises to do just as she directs. Montmorency returns; apologizes for his singular reception of his friend, but explains his uneasiness about the picture which he produced. Whiffen assures him it is Peter Jenkins, and then the equivoque commences. Nothing can exceed the troubles into which Whiffen hunks, in order to keep up the fibbing for a friend." He is constantly confusing the real David Brown with the imaginary Peter Jenkins: he is compelled to tell more lies to cover the first, until, to complete his horror, Mr. Jenkins (Mr. Turner) the father of Mrs. Montmorency and Miss Clear's lover (who is not in existence) arrives. Confusion here becomes worse confounded. To prevent Peter Jenkins from being mentioned, Miss Clear tells Whiffen that the latter has quarrelled with the son, and does not like his name mentioned. Montmorency, on hearing this, vows to bring them together and make them friends, in his wish to see everybody happy about him. They try to prevent him, but all to no avail. Mr. Jenkins and Brown are introduced, and then comes the explosion takes place. But Miss Clear, who has raised all this storm, calms the general excitement, by stating that the portrait belonged to her—that for her sake all the deception was kept up—and that Whiffen, the real master of her affections, acted entirely under her directions. All this story is managed so adroitly, that Whiffen is compelled to make love to the lady as his weaker, for he could not do anything loath—and the piece concludes with the general reconciliation and happiness of everybody

Of the acting we can speak in the highest terms. Mrs. Keeley's representation of Miss Clear, raising the different storms, and then direct ng all the angry elements she has conjured up, was admirable. Her languishing looks, also, at the conquest Whiffen, her hasty throwing off to encourage him, and her final capture of the prize, were conceived with consummate skill. Mr. Keel s Whiffen was capitally worked out: and the manner in which he allowed his dislike of the deception he was practising to break out continually through the life he was obliged to invent, told famously with the house. In Mr. A. Wigan's performance of Montmorency we had another of those in mitable representations of foreigners, in which no one at present can be said to approach him. It is life itself; there is not a shade of caricature in its breadth, but the whole impersonation is coped with the nicest art from existing types, instead of the traditionary Frenchmen who no long held possession of the stage. It is always a pleasure to us to chronicle the overthrow of anything conventional connected with the theatrical profession; for in none other is convention so worship. Moving in a very limited and confined sphere, from the close duties of their calling, actors have but little opportunity of studying the genera. world. Hence they depend upon what has always been received upon the stage as a portraiture of any particular class, rather than on a faithful copy of the class as it really does exist in society: but an actor may be assured that the more he discards these worn-out types for models formed from his own perception rather than the creature of the conclave, the less he will be in the possession of the stage.

The curtain fell amidst general applause; and Mr. and Mrs. Keeley, with Mr. Wigan, being loudly called for, appeared to receive the renewed acclamations of the audience.

HAYMARKET.

A comic drama in two acts, by Mr. Peake, founded, if we mistake not, on a little that appeared a few years back in Fraser's Magazine, was produced at this theatre on Thursday evening, and called "The False Mr. Pope." The period is the reign of George the First, when Pope is at the zenith of his fame, and various critics, professional and amateur, are passing their opinions freely upon his works and merits. Upon this false assumption, the situations of the piece depend an idea, however, which has been before made use of in other dramas, such as "The Iron Lion," &c. A very recent work of Mr. Pope's is brought forward with loud applause (by the company assembled at Lacey's) and entered in the notebooks of the guests, all of whom are in raptures with the supposed literary comedy, except Matt Lumpkin (Mr. Tilbury), a gamekeeper who has come to the town tacked, and he hires the chairmen to belabour the unfortunate Peter as he leaves the house, who beat him well nigh to death, until he is pulled into the house, by Lacey, turned out of doors. Then a scene between the true and false Pope takes place, Lacey has persuaded Rednung to keep up the joke by asking the ladies to "his villa at Twickenham," which is in reality the churchwarden's humble abode at Hammersmith.

In the second act we find the party assembled at the appointed spot, and several awkward inquiries are made after "the Grotto," "the Italian portico," and the other fixtures in Pope's country residence, which are answered by the host of Lacey, whose imitation of the echo is not a bad idea But in the absence of the gentleman, Mrs. Spooner (Mrs. Caulfield), Rednung's housekeeper, lets out the secret to Mrs. Bread (Miss P. Horton) Miss Jenny Quizil (Miss Lilla Bennett), his country-sister; and Mrs Nobblecomb (Miss Carre), an old maid; and they, to be revenged, dress up a sucking pig, that Rednung has baked for their supper in clothes, and declare it has been left at his door. This was an unfortunate introduction, and provoked a few sounds of disapprobation. All, however, is now explained, and the whole of the party are finally invited to spend a merry day together, with "the False Mr. Pope."

This is an outline of the plot: but we regret that we cannot record its complete success, as there was some hissing at the fall of the curtain. We must add, that the applause greatly preponderated. The mistake was in the introduction of the pig, which was an incident rather too broad for the Haymarket audience, which is a very peculiar one in its notions of stage propriety. But Mr Peake has too many good witnesses to character in his previous productions for the circumstance to affect his credit as a pleasant dramatic author

Every one contributed to the representation of the piece played admirably—and more especially Mr. Buckstone, upon whom the greatest responsibility rested. His acting was immitably droll. A little anecdote connected with the way he wore they not be without interest: It was told us in the theatre, iron authority upon which we can rely. The perake, then, was originally worn by George I. It afterwards came into the possession of Sir Walter Scott's grandfather, the Provost of Edinburgh Sir Walter gave it to Mr. Terry, the actor, who presented it to the late John Reeve, and he wore it in his well-recollected character of Mormaduke Mosey, in the "Wreck Ashore" At his decease, he left it to Mr. Buckstone, and it re-appeared at the H... market, on Thursday. Few articles of wardrobe, we opine, have passed through stranger hands

"Open Sesame" will b revived at the LYCEUM on Monday, when a débutante —Miss Georgiana Hodson—will make her first appearance as Copia Baba. The farce received shows a from the pen of Mr. Lunford.

Mr. Walter Lacy will not join the company now forming at the Princess'. We believe that he has some intention of entering himself upon the cares of management.

Mr. and Mrs. Honner are about to leave the Surrey, their benefit and last appearance taking place next Wednesday, on which occasion several popular members of the profession will contribute their services. The estimation in which they are held, will, no doubt, ensure a good house. Mr. Edward Stirling will it is said, succeed Mr. Honner as stage-manager; and Mrs. Fitzwilliam is to appear immediately on the termination of the engagement of Madame Vestris and Mr. Charles Mathews, which, to judge from the crowded houses, appears to have been a most lucrative one.

The musicals appear to be looking up at Liverpool, and music is in the ascendant. At the two principal theatres, operas have been performed "The Bohemian Girl," "The Mountebanks," and "The Daughter of St. Mark," at the Theatre Royal, supported by Miss Rainer, and Messrs. Harrison and Borrani. Mr. Macready is at present playing there. At the Liver Theatre, "Somnambula," performed by Mrs H. P. Grattan, Mr. Wesse, and Mr. Barker; and ballets by Mesdames Louise and Adele, and Mr. A. D. Webster, are the leading attractions. Concerts have also been given—one by Miss Whitnall, at which Grisi, Mario, Lablache, and Benedict appeared; and another by Signor Leoni, with Madame Castellan, Miss Dolby, Formasari, and Brizzi. All these entertainments appear to have been well attended.

Mr Henry Betty has drawn excellent houses at the Pavilion Theatre during the past week. He has been re-engaged for a few nights more, and will appear in Knowles's play of "Virginius," for the first time in London, on Tuesday.

COUNTRY NEWS.

THE ANDOVER UNION The inquiry into the conduct of the Master and Matron of this Union towards the paupers, has come to a sudden termination. Mr. Westlake, by whom the charges were made, has received a letter from Mr. Coode, Assistant Secretary of the Poor Law Commission, proposing to transfer the present proceedings by indictment to the next Quarter Sessions, in respect to the charges against the master. In like manner the Commissioners propose to cause an information before Justices to be laun against the master or matron for any act of embezzlement or misapplication of food, clothing, or goods, belonging to the Union. In the meantime they will recommend to the Board of Guardians to suspend the master and matron until the result of the indictment and information shall be known.

THE LATE ROBBERY IN MANCHESTER.—A man named Wm. Axon has been examined before the magistrates at Manchester, on a charge of being concerned in the extensive money robbery (the particulars of which we gave last week), at the warehouse of Messrs. Whitaker and Sons, New Brown-street Buildings. Mr. Beswick after stating the nature of the robbery, called, as a witness, a young man named Drinkwater, in the employment of Messrs. Tennants, Clow and Co., manufacturing chemists, whose warehouse is near to that of Messrs. Whittaker. The witness stated that on the mornings of the Monday and Tuesday before the robbery, which was committed on the night of the 29th ult., he had occasion to go to his master's warehouse rather earlier than usual, and was there a few minutes before seven o'clock. After opening the office he saw two men come out of Messrs. Whittakers' warehouse, and walk away. He had previously observed one of the men outside, near to the corner of the warehouse, and apparently keeping a look-out; and when they had left the warehouse, he saw them pass the place two or three times before eight o'clock. The prisoner was very much like one of the men, but witness could not swear to him. This was the only evidence against the prisoner, who denied that he knew anything of the robbery, or that he had ever been near the warehouse. On the application of Mr. Beswick, he was remanded.

FIRE AT ANDOVER.—On Sunday night last a fire broke out at Andover, in the new premises leading to Newbury, which, in spite of all the exertions of the inhabitants, continued to burn all night, and totally destroyed six houses. So rapid was the progress of the fire, that some of the families escaped in their night clothes, and were glad to save their lives, having no opportunity to save any thing else. The poor sufferers appeared in a miserable plight, as many as twenty of them having neither clothes, bonnets, nor furniture, and no money whatever to purchase any. Not one of them was insured; though the houses, which are the property of John Evans, Esq., of Whitchurch, were insured in the Sun Fire office. It is not known how the fire originated, but most likely from the overheating of a flue.

FATAL AFFAIR AT NEWMARKET.—A painful interest has been produced in Newmarket by the perpetration of a most unprovoked brutal outrage upon the person of a highly respectable inhabitant, whose death is universally deplored. The name of the deceased is Henry Thom, who carried on business as a hatter. The accused is Richard Archer, formerly a trainer of the race horses of a solicitor. The origin of the quarrel between the parties arose out of some proceedings in the Bankruptcy Court relative to the affairs of a person named Edward Edwards, in which Archer had been employed. The deceased having refused to oppose Edwards, the deceased (Mr. Thom) was selected to conduct the opposition. It seems that Archer was a personal friend of the bankrupt, and took offence at many words that passed the duty which he was called on to perform, he provoked the hostility of Archer, who repeatedly proclaimed his determination to have revenge These threats he found opportunity for carrying into fatal effect on Saturday evening last, when meeting the deceased in the market place near his own door, Archer, after a few angry words, struck Mr. Thom two heavy blows, which knocked him down, causing concussion of the brain. The deceased never roused from a state of insensibility, and he died on Sunday morning. Archer, who at first absconded, afterwards delivered himself up. An inquest has since been held, and a verdict of manslaughter was brought in against him.

POLICE.

THE FORGERIES ON RAILWAY COMPANIES.—Mr. Edmund Thomas Yeatkil and Mr. Charles Lander have been finally examined at CLERKENWELL, the former on a charge of forging the name of Colonel Howard Staunej, of the Home Park, Windsor, to the subscription contract of the South Midland, Northampton, and Leicestershire Railway Company, for the amount of £500, and the latter for having forged the name of Ferdinand De Lisle, merchant and banker, under similar circumstances. The prisoner Lander was first placed at the bar—Mr. James Shaw, solicitor, has his wife in his care of Russell Square, Balham-hill, was examined, and said he knew the prisoner Lander from his having been in partnership as a scale-maker with his wife's brother. The prisoner called at Russel House, and, after saying it was a fine old building, inquired whether there was any title to it. Witness subsequently received a letter, which had, however, been destroyed by his children. He could not say positively the prisoner's handwriting. The letter contained an envelope, directed to Russel House. Witness wrote to inform the prisoner that if any more letters came there he would not receive them. In consequence of the prisoner's conduct upon him and his wife "he was almost frightened me to death—what has happened?" and, placing his hands on witness's shoulders, he said, "Do you think I would do anything wrong?" The envelope contained in the letter received by witness were directed to Mr. C. Lander, Webbersteet, Blackfriars-road, and his wife had enclosed a letter directed to Mr. C. Lander, addressed to Ferdinand De Lisle, Esq. Mr. Clarkson now submitted to the bench that he had traced the handwriting to be that of the prisoner, and asked the witness what were the contents of the letter which he received from the prisoner, to the best of his recollection? Witness—The letter stated, "My dear fellow, as far as taking in a letter or two for me, it will do me a great deal of service (in the name of Ferdinand De Lisle, Esq.), for there are a great many accounts coming out for me, and as I have always been employed by Ferdinand De Lisle, they will answer his letters, although they may not answer mine," or words to that effect. The prisoner then stated he was signed to the above letter. Two or three days after that I received another letter directed to Ferdinand De Lisle, Esq., when I became alarmed and consulted some friends. I received other letters in the same description. —Ferdinand De Lisle, Esq., was then sworn: He did not know the prisoner. He never authorised him to sign any deed for him. Mr. Greenwood asked the prisoner whether he wished to ask any questions of the witnesses—The prisoner replied that the witness was not correct in what he stated for him. —Mr. Edmund Thomas Yeatkil was then placed at the bar, when, in addition to the former evidence against him, Mr. Clarkson called Mr. George Luton Brown, who said he was Secretary to the South Midland, Northampton, and Leicestershire Railway Company. The letter now produced was received by him in the course of business, and an answer sent with the allotment of shares to Colonel Howard Staunej, of Home park, Windsor. The prisoner here coolly asked Mr Brown whether he could furnish him with the company's prospectus?—Mr. Brown handed him one, when the prisoner asked whether it was really the case that the name of the company was to be found on some observations, when Mr. Greenwood asked him if it would not be better for himself to reserve his observations for the trial, as he had no legal advice with him. Prisoner (indifferently) Oh! very well—He was then committed for trial.

WEST INDIA PINE APPLES.—The effect of the alteration in the tariff has been effectually shown in the reduction of the price of pine apples to a luxury obtainable only on very expensive terms, but now, by the enterprise of parties connected with the trade of the Bahamas, has been made available to a much more extended range of consumers. No less than the enormous quantity of four hundred thousand pines!! have been imported this season, the last public sale of which, consisting of 2000, took place by Keeling and Hunt, and realised from 1s. to 4s. 9d. each, for the use of good quality; and it is to be hoped the prices obtained generally will be an additional inducement for a continued annual supply being secured to the public.

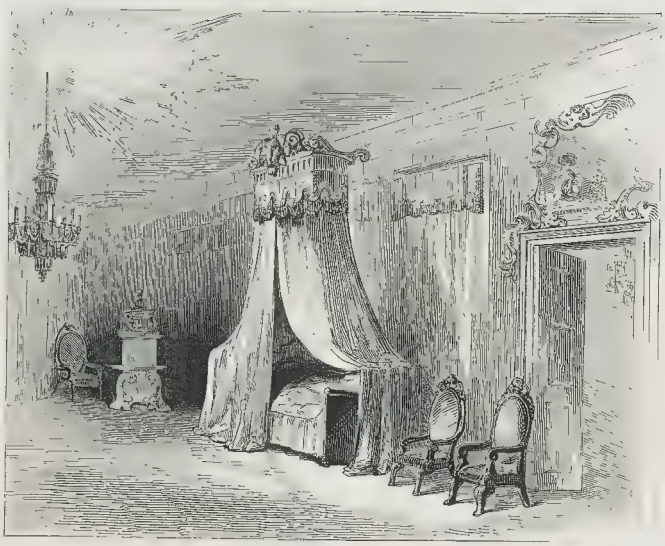
THE ROYAL PALACE, AT WURZBURG.

Although in our accounts of her Majesty's Visit to Germany we detailed her stay at the Palace of the King of Bavaria, at Wurzburg, our Artists were prevented, by the rapidity of the incidents of the Royal progress, from doing justice to the interior of this most magnificent of Continental Palaces.

In Murray's Hand-book of Southern Germany, we find the following:—"The Royal, originally Episcopal Palace, situated in a square, flanked by two tall singular pillars, was erected by two Bishops of the family of the Counts of Schönborn, 1720—40, and is of great size and unusual magnificence. The staircase (which we have engraved) is very splendid, and original in its design. Its architect was a German, John Balt'r Neuman. The entire Palace contains 284 apartments, including the suite occupied by the Emperors of Germany on their way to the coronation at Frankfurt; they are distinguished by their gorgeous display of gilding, marble, Gobelin tapestry, silken draperies, and mirrors. The Chapel is a rich specimen of internal decoration, in the taste of the time of Louis XIV. The whole edifice is not undeserving of the title of a German Versailles, being fitted up in the French style, and remarkable as an example of the unbounded wealth of the Ecclesiastical Princes of the Empire, which they possessed nearly to the end of the last century, when it was swept away in the changes which followed the French Revolution. Though termed the Residence, this Palace is rarely inhabited by the Royal Family."

The Grand Staircase, with the reception of Queen Victoria. (See the Engraving.) Her Majesty has ascended the first flight of stairs, and is led by the Grand Duke of Bavaria, who is about to present to her the principal authorities of Würzburg, to congratulate the Royal traveller. Prince Albert follows with a lady; and next the Royal suite. Sentries are placed on each flight of stairs, and they present arms as her Majesty passes; the walls are lined with shrubs, among which are figures bearing lamps; the doors of the state apartments are thrown open, and show them to be brilliantly illuminated.

The ceiling of this staircase is most gorgeously painted. In the centre is a large medallion of the Bishop who completed the Palace. It is borne by two genii, one blowing the trumpet of Fame, the other placing a crown on the head of the prelate; underneath is an heraldic eagle; and, on the right, is Mercury, with his caduceus. In this direction, also, are two colossal marble figures, supporting, in bold relief, a portrait of one of the Bishops of Würzburg. The picture is allegorical, and includes fortresses and a military pageant, with a procession of Bishops with croziers, &c. There are likewise emblems of architecture and painting, and a presumed portrait of Dieppolo, who was an architect, sculptor, and painter, and executed this vast work. The huge chandelier, as well as the eagle above it, is a fine specimen of wood-carving.



NAPOLEON'S BEDCHAMBER, IN THE PALACE AT WURZBURG.

The suites of apartments are plain in comparison with this splendid staircase; but they are exceedingly well lighted. Those occupied by the Royal party extended one entire side of the Palace; and, the doors being open, you see from one extremity of the Palace to the other—the effect of which is unique. A chamber next that occupied by the Queen has its ceiling and walls entirely of glass, of different colours, most elaborately painted with Chinese scenes.

Her Majesty's Chamber is hung with tapestry, the subject the Carnival of Venice, with figures of a life-size. It is a splendid work as a picture, though it suffers in comparison with the Gobelin tapestry of the two adjoining rooms, with subjects from Lebrun's "Battles of Alexander." There are several other superb apartments, in which are fine original paintings by German artists, and copies from Italian and other masters. We have engraved the bed-chamber appropriated to Lord Aberdeen, during the late visit: it was occupied by Napoleon on three different occasions, and is, accordingly, an object of considerable interest, independent of that which it now enjoys, from its successive occupancy by the Emperor and the English Minister.

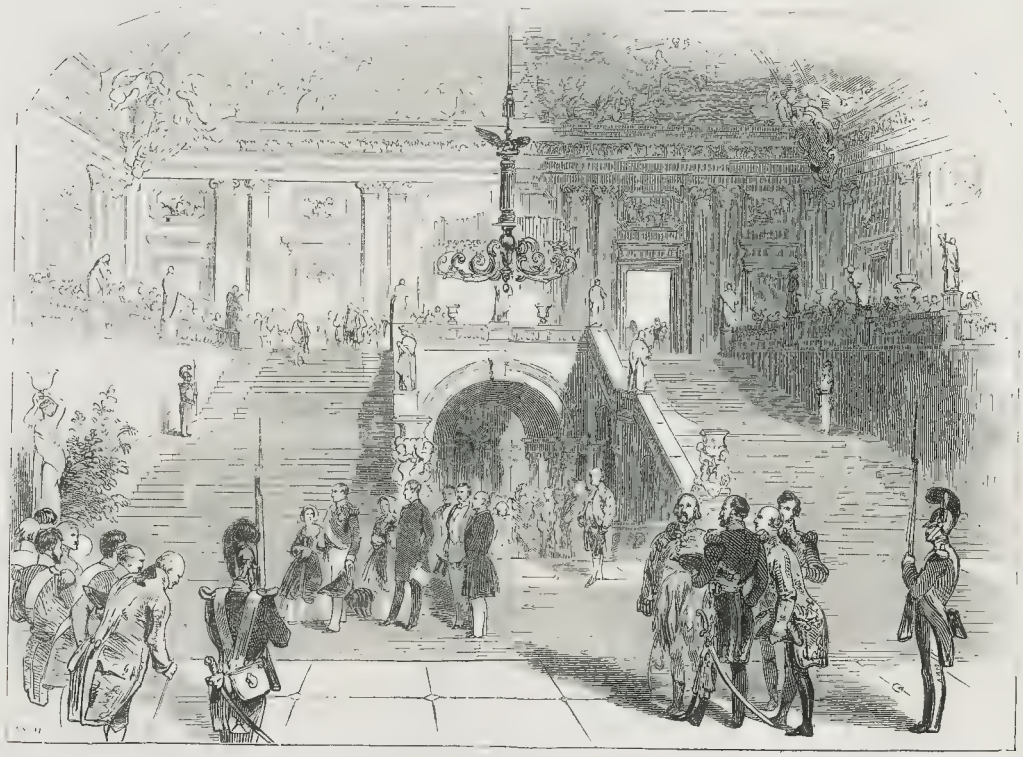
Nor must we omit to mention the magnificent Kaiser Hall, or Salle des Empereurs: it has a fine dome painted by Dieppolo, and his son, in the style of the Grand Staircase, and representing celebrated events in the lives of the Bishops of Wurzburg; and on the walls are their portraits. To describe the entire Palace would require pages; but, adds our artist, "This vast Hall, with its colossal marble columns and pavements, is certainly more than you would expect to find in such a town as Würzburg, and would grace any palace in any capital of Europe."

JOURNALISTS IN GERMANY.—A letter from a correspondent of a London paper, dated from Antwerp, says—"After trying several hotels, the party, of whom I formed one, were recommended to apply to the Hotel de St. Antoine, which is much frequented by English travellers. We had the same reply to our urgent entreaties for accommodation of any sort. Every apartment was occupied by two or three persons. The commissionaire of the hotel delicately hinted that our best chance would be to take the last train to Brussels, where we should find plenty of room. Before the parley had terminated, Mr. Schmitt, the proprietor of the hotel, made his appearance, and one of the party having incidentally mentioned that we were English journalists just arrived from Germany, the worthy old Fleming started up and exclaimed that his last room had just been ordered by Prince Jerome Buonaparte, at any price; but, as he felt more honoured at having the English journalists under his roof than any prince in Europe, he should send Prince Jerome to seek accommodation elsewhere; and we had the room, my portion of which was a comfortable mattress upon the floor."

PROPOSED VISIT OF HER MAJESTY TO SCOTLAND.—It is stated that, soon after her Majesty's return to the Isle of Wight, she will proceed to Scotland, on a visit to Lord Aberdeen, at Haddo House.

PRIVY COUNCIL.—The Queen was to hold a Privy Council to-day (Saturday), at Osborne House, Isle of Wight. The Council was appointed for one o'clock in the afternoon.

TRAVELLING ON THE RHINE.—The correspondent of the Herald says:—"I have frequently heard of the extortions to which travellers were exposed upon the Rhine, and I had myself paid for a few hours' rest the full value, in Prussian thalers, of the old chest in which I was deposited; but the barefaced imposition of the steward of the Prince of Prussia steamer, deserves especial notice. I breakfasted on board, with five other English gentlemen; we had coffee, a small dish of chops, fried potatoes and eggs. Every article formed a separate item in the bill. Coffee was set down at 16s. 6d.; one half-dozen chops and most of your readers know the mouthful of mutton which in courtesy is termed a cutlet on the Rhine—8s.; eggs, 2s.; and potatoes (a small dish), 1s. 6d.: total, with "service," £1 4s. The remonstrances of some of the party effected a reduction of 1s. 6d. in the bill.



THE GRAND STAIRCASE, IN THE PALACE AT WURZBURG.

THE CITY OF WINCHESTER.

MEETING OF THE BRITISH ARCHÆOLOGICAL ASSOCIATION, AT WINCHESTER.

On Tuesday, the Second Annual Meeting of this important Institution commenced in the ancient city of Winchester, than which a more interesting "local habitation" could not have been selected for the objects of the Society. These, it may be as well to state, are "to promote personal intercourse between antiquaries and historical inquirers, who reside in various parts of the country, and to afford an agreeable and instructive opportunity for the investigation of subjects of interest, especially such as exist in the locality where the meeting takes place." The first Annual Meeting of the Association was held precisely a year since, at Canterbury, since which period circumstances have led to a division among the Members; and there are now, consequently, two Societies styled "the British Archæological Association;" one of which met last month at Winchester, but in numbers far inferior to the Meeting of the twin Society in the past week. In the constitution and objects of the two Associations there are certain points of difference, which we have not space to particularise; but, although we sincerely deprecate dissension of every kind, and should be glad to witness the coalition of what may now be termed the rivals, we see no reason why each Society may not pursue its own tenor—"for the Encouragement of Researches into the Arts and Monuments of the Early and Middle Ages"—i. e., the study of Archæology—with high credit to itself, and interest and benefit to the public.

The arrangements for the Meeting, which commenced on Tuesday last, were very complete. We shall not, however, detail them in this place; but, must observe, that to the Clergy and Gentry, and the Mayor and Corporation, of Winchester, especial record is due for their hospitable reception of the Archæologists; as well as to the good citizens, for their repudiation of the usual practice of taking advantage of such occasions as the present to justify extortionate charges for accommodation. In no instance did we hear this complained of at Winchester: on the contrary, courtesy and civility were combined with moderate cost, and information was readily afforded, without consideration of profit. In a kindred spirit, too, the railway fares were reduced one third. With all these advantages (in some measure due to the exertions of the central committee, and their indefatigable secretary, Mr. Albert Way, M.A.), the reader will not be surprised to learn that the Meeting, as far as it has yet proceeded, has been brilliantly attended.

Winchester, as we have already intimated, is peculiarly localised for "the nourrice of antiquitie." It is to the Archæologist hoar and holy ground; and, although time and the destroyer, man, have swept away many a stately memorial, there are yet spared several truly noble piles and crumbling in the vast and richly decorated Cathedral, and the celebrated College its many beautiful appendages; in the picturesque ruins of Wolvesley in the Western and King's Gate—in the Guildhall and City Cross—in the ancient Chapel of St. Stephen—in the Kingly and Episcopal Palaces—in the Hospitals of St. John and St. Cross—in the old Roman defences upon Catherine Hill—and in the republican post immediately facing it, called "Oliver's Battery." These were attractive points to the Archæologists, to whom, in such instances, as were requisite, the edifices were liberally thrown open.

The ticket of admission is characteristically illustrated with Arthur's Round Table, preserved in St. Stephen's Chapel—

"And so great Arthur's seat ould Winchester prefers, Whose ould round table yet she vaunteth to be hers."

Provided with this introduction, we reached Winchester on Monday evening, just when the sun was gilding with his parting beams the architectural glories of the fine old city. Its general character the High street reminds one of that of Guildford: there are a similarly steep road-way, a Town Hall bracket clock in kindred style, and the bridge and mill towards the termination of the street. In the number and importance of its ancient buildings, however, Winchester is, of course, far superior to Guildford. Dating its establishment several centuries before the Christian Era, Winchester was called by the Celtic Britons Caer Gwent or the White City, from its chalky soil: and at the period of Cæsar's invasion it was possessed by the Belgæ. It was not, however, until after the conquest of Claudius that Winchester (then Venta Belgarum) became the capital of a large territory; and we may judge of its progress in civilisation from its then containing a public manufactory of cloth. The Romans were indeed excellent colonists, and this early record of their skill came forcibly upon our memory on Monday evening, as we lingered by the crystal stream of the river Itchen, and gazed upon St. Catherine's, where the mind's eye may trace the very footmarks of the Roman soldier. At every turn, you recognize the olden glory of Venta in and many an architectural fragment will carry you back through a thousand years to the period when Winchester was the metropolis of All England. Here you see a circular arch and cylindrical columns in the face of a modern brick wall; and even the Mill at the bridge is proud of its ancient descent, in its record of "rebuilt 1744." In such a locality, a century is but a score years. no wonder then that its abiding antiquity should thus early have attracted the British Archæologists to its winding ways.

"Long trails of light descending down;"

We were not so falsely luxurious as to be late on Tuesday morning, but rose early to enjoy the brilliant scene which our Artist has pictured at page 173, from one of the heights above the city. From this point the town is seen clustering around the massive cathedral—the longest, be it remembered, in the kingdom, and presenting one of its finest architectural studies, exhibiting every style, from a century precious to the Conquest till the Reformation; and, although in the picturesqueness of the scene we miss "the Butter Cross" of the time of Henry VI., and the fine old machicolated West Gate, in the distance is shown the stately palace in part erected by Charles II., now used as the barracks for the district. In short, this point commands a bird's eye view of the streets, churches, palaces, and ruins, beautifully interspersed with gardens, fields, groves, and streams.

The opening meeting of the Association took place on Tuesday, at twelve o'clock, in the great room at St. John's, when the Marquis of Northampton, as President of the annual meeting, took the chair amidst general congratulations. The room was well arranged for the occasion. on the walls was hung a fine collection of rubbings of brasses; and in front of the platform were a few casts of some admirable specimens of Anglo-Norman architecture from some of the city edifices. The body of the room was entirely filled with auditors, among whom were several elegantly dressed ladies; indeed, we have rarely witnessed on such an occasion, so great display of youth and beauty. The platform was occupied by the influential nobility, clergy and gentry, among whom we noticed the following :—

Lord Ashburton; the Speaker of the House of Commons, the Lord Justice of the Common Pleas; Count Mosras, Sir J Bolleau, Sir R. Harry Inglis, M.P.; Sir William Heathcote, M.P., Sir R. G. Simeon, Sir E. Westmacott, the Very Rev. the Deans of Ely, Hereford, Westminster, and Winchester; the Master of Trinity College, Cambridge (Professor Whewell); the Master of University College; the Visitor of Queen's College, Oxford; Wm. G Noel, J Paquillon, J. L. Petit, D. Rock, D.D., G Ryder, H. Salmon, E. Shepherd, J J Smith, G Southouse, G. Southwell, O. St. John, E. Stewart, D J. Stewart, F Swanton, J H Todd, D D, R. C. Trench, R. Venables, C Walters, J Walters, G. H. Webster, H. G. J. Webstead, R. Wickham, T. H. Wilkinson, W. Williams, W. T. Williams, R Wilis, J. Wilson, R. F. Wilson, W. H. Wither, E. Woodcock, R. J. W Wright, Rev. Bennet, Littlehales, Phillips, Hall, Mandeville, Hill, W. White, Wood; Mr. A Way, Honorary Secretary; W. Jerdan, Esq., F.S.A.; G W. Duke, Esq.; &c.

The Marquis of Northampton first addressed the meeting, and, having alluded to the effigies and memorials of the illustrious dead with which they were surrounded, his lordship remarked, that Archæology was the handmaid of History—without her History would be a mere skeleton; but Archæology served to reanimate the dry bones of facts, and give a colouring where all was lifeless before. The study of antiquities served as a guide to the states man, for, if he drew inferences from history without taking into consideration the agents in the causes produced, he would be infallibly wrong. The Noble President then adverted to the absurd notion of this being a polemical meeting, and concluded by observing—He was proud to see around him so many of the clergy; and that ecclesiastical monuments must naturally be interesting to them could not be doubted. They had only to look at the work of William of Wykeham (loud cheers), at the beautiful church of St. Cross so near to them, and it would require a mind, even of the professional, but architectural and archæological motives had brought them together, and not polemics. If any difference of opinion had arisen among the members of the Established Church those persons would be much nearer into any discussion upon them, but to call on all to join in maintaining those sacred edifices of which it was impossible to doubt a sincere piety, although accompanied with the superstition of a dark age, was the best protection. (Cheers). They could not doubt that architecture had been greatly exalted at a time when other arts were in comparative debasement. They might, if they pleased, discuss the work of Sir Roger Pratt, who was of the 19th century they had nothing whatever to do; and if they at all entered into the religious differences of the past, still they could not into those of the present. With minor compositions he would not trouble them. They were a large meeting, and proud indeed he was to meet them. It was not for them then to consider any differences that might have arisen among Archæologists; he deprecated this subject, although he could not but regret them. Their meeting was indeed a large one, and they could stand by themselves, holding out the hand of friendship to all delighting in the study of Archæology who would join them. (Loud cheers).

The Dean of Westminster then read a most eloquent and poetical paper, in defence of Archæology, which we regret that we have not room to give here, to-report. In concluding, he would be infallibly wrong. The Archæologist was not to be considered as a mere worshipper of the past, but there zealous contribution of papers to the Association; and concluded by moving a vote of thanks to the Dean of Westminster, for his very elegant and excellent discourse.

Professor Whewell, the Master of Trinity College, Cambridge, joined in feelings of admiration and gratitude for the noble address of the Dean of Westminster—a discourse calculated, in a short space, to do great good, and whose thoughts, if not before in their hearts, would now live and abide with them. (Loud cheers.) When a schoolboy, the Professor said he had met with Rickman's work on Architecture, and from that time the Lube he possessed that work it became to him the grammar of a new language. He looked back with extreme pleasure to that incident of his life, and many now attending that great work might be able to ascribe to it the same excellent effects. The Professor then seconded the vote of thanks

Dr. Williams, Warden of New College, Oxford, and one of the Canons of Winchester, supported the motion, and, in thanking the Noble Marquis, to whom a vote of thanks was then proposed by Lord Ashburton.

Dr. Plumptre, the Master of University College, Oxford, then addressed the meeting, and as Archæologist, he could not but feel great pleasure in congratulated them on seeing that Gothic architecture would form one of the chief branches of the study of the association; adding that a higher feeling than mere admiration of its architecture, and that was the Christian piety; not a feeling of servile imitation, but a respect for sacred things, and a higher appreciation of those great truths which that art was calculated to support. (Cheers.)

The Noble President then acknowledged the vote of thanks, congratulating the Dean of Westminster on his splendid discourse, and Professor Whewell for his work on the Gothic of England,

PARALYSIS, DEAFNESS, LOSS OF SPEECH, AND USE OF THE LIMBS RECOVERED.—To MR. CARBURN.
Dear Sir,—Having experienced such a wonderful recovery from a dreadful stroke, causing spasm of head and general debility, although given over by all my medical attendants, and lastly by Sir Astley Cooper), I feel great pleasure in recommending your Oil and Pills to other sufferers. You are at liberty to make use of this letter. I remain, dear Sir, yours, &c., Mrs. Veryan, near Tregony, Cornwall, who had been ill since last March with Paralysis, insomuch, that there was a total loss of speech, the use of one side, accompanied with deafness and loss of speech. This morning I called on Mr. Pearce and was astonished to find him so improved, that his speech is returned, and he can hear. I can truly say he is much better, but I am sure by perseverance in the Oil and Pill, he will get quite well. There are several other cases truly interesting, as to cure from my recommendation, the particulars of which I will with pleasure one day send you. I am, yours respectfully,
R. C. Falmouth, Cornwall, September 2, 1845.

ASHLEY'S THEATRE.

We this week present our readers with a portrait of Madame Klatt, the very clever female equestrian, of whose daring performances we have more than once had occasion to speak in noticing the equitation at this theatre She is represented in one of her most effective feats, which is always greeted with rounds of loud applause—causing her milk-white charger to rear up until he almost appears to be in danger of falling back upon his intrepid rider. The lady is, in our opinion, quite equal to, if she does not surpass, Mademoiselle Caroline, whom our readers may remember at Vauxhall three years. The present equestrian company at Astley's is by far the best we ever remember to have seen there, taken as a whole. Monsieur Tourniaire, the manager, was for six years the director of the Circus at St. Petersburg; and with his company has successfully performed at Berlin, Vienna, and Renaud's Amphitheatre on the Boulevards, in Paris. He belongs to a talented family, the whole of whom have been allotted, in his own words, "born on horseback." His brother, M. Ferdinand, is a clever equestrian; and his sister-in-law, Madame Louise Tourniaire, a most graceful pantomimist. Monsieur Tourniaire is the whole family—the intelligence. Their Esmeralda, as we have before had occasion to remark, is a really beautiful conception. She is a German by birth, as also is Madame Dumez, another admirable equestrian, who belongs to the company at Franconi's in the Champs Elysées, quite a child, and he then promised to become a clever rider.

We had no idea that the establishment of the Amphitheatre was so extensive, until we had an opportunity the other morning of going over the cool—all rooms may be termed so. There are at present about fifty horses in the theatre; the stables are clean, well, ventilated, and capacious, coversing, as may be imagined, a very large space of ground. In a stall at the end of one of them resides the pelican, who figures in the "Bride of the Nile." He is a portly comfortable-looking fellow, walking about gravely in a loose box by himself. He was fed whilst we were there upon Thames fish—specimens of cod "water conchs," which he devoured with all the gout of a Blackwall epicure. He came from the Surrey Zoological Gardens, is very harmless, and, apparently, much gratified by being caressed or taken notice of.

SOUTHWARK ELECTION.—RETURN OF SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH.

SIR WILLIAM MOLESWORTH, the successful candidate for the Borough of Southwark in the recent election, is one of an old and wealthy Cornish family. He is by no means new to the world of politics, having sat in Parliament for one of those ancient English anchors where everybody has heard of and nobody has read. His name has been bandied about on the hustings and at local meetings, as if all the world was quite familiar with him, and extracts from his pages, which have been reposing in dusty quiet for generations, have been stuck upon the walls, looking astonished at finding themselves transformed into hand-bills. How far they have influenced the decision seems uncertain. The works are expensive, we believe, and too little known to ground a substantial opposition upon. As the opinions of the hon. baronet are well known, they need not be here detailed; extracts from his recent speeches are also given elsewhere. He is still a young man, with a long career before him. As a speaker, he addresses an audience with some appearance of effort, but he prepares himself well for the subject, and acquits himself very creditably. While in the House, he distinguished himself as Chairman of the Transportation Committee. In person he is short, with pale complexion, and very long, fair hair. He was returned at the present election by a majority of 766.

Mr. PILCHER, the second candidate, made a gallant fight of it, and the number he polled is a flattering testimony both to the esteem in which he is held, and the zeal of his friends. He was proposed as the "local" candidate, a resident in the borough, and acquainted with its interests. In principles, he is a moderate Conservative, a supporter of the Church, and an opponent of the Maynooth Grant. He has served the office of Sheriff.

Mr. MIALL, the third candidate, did not seem to have a chance of success from the opening of the poll; if the battle of votes was between Mr. Pilcher and Sir W. Molesworth, the war of words was principally between the Hon. Baronet and Mr. Miall; they carried on the great Hobbes controversy above alluded to. Mr. Miall is the Editor of the Nonconformist, and an opponent of all Church establishments and endowments.

On Wednesday the nomination of candidates for the seat vacant for Southwark by the death of Benjamin Wood, Esq., took place at the Town-hall. The hour fixed was ten o'clock in the forenoon, but long before that time the front of the hustings, which was erected in front of the Town hall, was occupied with a dense mob of people, who kept up a continual confusion and uproar during the whole of the proceedings. They did not, however, form an united party. On the left was a crowd of ragged boys and lads, evidently with no sort of occupation whatever, who vociferated lustily for Sir William Molesworth, while, on the right, a group of brawny coal heavers and wharf porters, with Pilcher's cards prominently stuck in their caps, answered the cheers of the Molesworth party by corresponding cheers for Pilcher.

The High Bailiff having addressed the electors, and the accustomed forms having been gone through,

Mr. W. Hawes came forward, and proposed Sir William Molesworth. Mr. Martin seconded the nomination.

Mr. E. Palmer nominated Mr. Pilcher, whose seconder was Mr. T. Dare.

Mr. Apsley Pellatt proposed Mr. Miall. His seconder was Mr. J. W. Cobb.

There was uproar during the whole period of the nomination. When this was finished, it became the candidates' turn to speak, and the noise, uproar, and confusion were redoubled.

Sir W. Molesworth first addressed the meeting. He adverted to his formerly having had a seat in the House of Commons, and to his votes there. In his support of the extension of the suffrage, trade, &c., and then proceeded to defend his opinions in regard to the Maynooth grant. He then proceeded Now, a few words with regard to my antagonists. First, with regard to Mr. Pilcher. Mr. Pilcher is a Tory. (Great uproar.) I say it with every respect, for he has as much right to his conscientious opinion as I have to mine. Our opinions are diametrically opposed. Magnificent are the promises which Mr. Pilcher is reported to have made. He is reported to have said that he would maintain all the hospitals, support all the dispensaries, and contribute to all the charities with which this borough abounds. ("No, no; you are misrepresenting him.") —that he would cleanse your borough of everything filthy—that he would build docks for all the steamvessels—that he would accomplish wonders with regard to the river Thames. (Cheers, and much uproar.) Thus Mr. Pilcher would buy you. Take care (to use a popular expression) that you are not sold. (Cheers from Sir W. Molesworth's supporters, and uproar among Mr. Pilcher's friends.) Now, a few words to the friends of Mr. Miall, and to that gentleman himself. I trusted we should abstain from personalities towards each other, and that this would be a calm contest of reason. In these, my hopes, I have been disappointed, and for that disappointment I am not to blame. Not one word of disrespect, not one single syllable of reproach, did I utter against your candidate—Loud cries of "The Rev Mr Miall, who first sneered at that?") —until I was assailed. When struck, however, I am ever ready to strike in return. Who struck the first blow? You, Mr. Miall! ("No, no, you did it.") You quitted the high ground of argument; you descended into the arena of abuse; you accused me of dishonesty on account of my opinions with regard to Maynooth (Loud cries of "It's false"); you taxed me with insincerity because I possessed property in the Church of England; you called upon the dissenters of Southwark to shrink with horror from my opinions; you attempted to excite religious animosity and rancour against me; like an inquisitor of old, you presumed to question me on my religious belief, and to summon me before the tribunal of your private judgment. (Tremendious uproar, yelling, hissing, and every conceivable token of disapprobation.) I am glad to meet you here to day, face to face, to answer you, to unveil your pretentious (continued uproar), new to Before God, I disdain deceit. I tell you, in the name of religious liberty and equality, that no man has a right to interfere with the religious opinions of another man; that no man has a right to put a question or blame the belief of his neighbour. I tell you, that in your conduct and language towards me you have been untrue to the great principle of religious liberty ("'tis false—you are the traitor"); you have been untrue to that charity which is the essence of religious liberty. You have denounced me as the editor of the works of Hobbes of Malmesbury. Electors, I am proud of the fact. (Confusion.) I will rest upon it a claim to your support. I am proud to be called a friend of Mr. Miall. He is the author of the Nonconformist. I am the ed tor of Hobbes. To compare the two works together would be like comparing the vastest mountain on the earth's surface with a small anthill. I could point out to you hundreds of dissertations from Mr. Miall's friends, and cheers from Sir William Molesworth's supporters.) The works of Hobbes wil last more centuries than the Nonconformist will days. The writings of Hobbes will live as long as the Anglo Saxon race and language. They will be read age after age by the studious amongst the nations of our race, who will people the two Americas and the islands of the Southern Ocean. Hobbes was a man who stood up against and the bigotted herd who dared to assail so great a master of thought and language. (Loud cheers and disapprobation.) As one of that herd, Mr. Miall, it is your cue to denounce Hobbes. (Tremendious uproar.) You have denounced me as the editor of an infidel work; I have challenged you, and again challenge you, to make good your assertion. ("He is an infidel!") I have called upon you to point out one infidel sentence, one sneering sentence derogatory to Christianity in the works of Thomas Hobbes of Malmesbury Instead of doing this you have had recourse to subterfuge. It is a well-known, notorious fact that the very great discovery in astronomy, in natural history, in chemistry, or in any of the physical sciences that everything which has made us better acquainted with the heavens, with the earth, and with human nature—that every acquisition of knowledge which has tended to elevate humanity, every attempt at free inquiry, every effort to shake off the trammels of authority, has been successively attacked by the ignorant and narrow minded, as leading to infidelity. Under this malignant and accursed plea some of the greatest spirits of the human race have been persecuted and slain. Socrates was put to death as an infidel, he who first said there were Antipodes was hurled. The followers of Copernicus were persecuted as disbelievers, and the great Galileo on bended knees was compelled to assert that the earth was immovable. (Great cheering.) Bacon and Descartes were taxed with impiety; the doctrines of Locke were said to lead to materialism. Newton was accused of dethroning the Deity by the discovery of the law of gravitation; a similar charge was made against Franklin for explaining the nature of the thunderbolt. Priestley's library was burnt and his person endangered on account of his religious opinions, and, in our own days, Buckland, Sedgwick, and the other geologists are accused of overturning revelations by their discoveries in regard to the past existence of the earth. (Cheers.) In short, in all ages, and amongst all nations, infidelity has ever been the war cry which the base, the ignorant, the intolerant, and the bigoted have raised against the noble, the generous, the genius and spirits of the human race. (Great uproar and cheering from Sir William Molesworth's supporters.

Mr. Pilcher then came forward, and was received with vehement shouts by his friends, and corresponding yells by his antagonists. He said.—I know the wants of the borough of Southwark, I have no hesitation in saying, better than either of the other candidates. I have been a resident—(uproar)—have given my assistance in the various offices which it has fallen to my lot to be elected to. I have served in various capacities, not only in this borough, but in the city of London and in the county of Surrey. (Great uproar.) The grand object which I feel, and which I think every man ought to feel, when he is placed like me, independent of labour, and blessed with health and strength—in such a case, I think he is bound to come forward, and when called upon, for the good of his country. On all occasions I have been a firm supporter of the various charities of the borough. I have supported myself and my own hospitals, and your hospitals, and your institutions, and I shall always be glad to attend to the wants of my fellow townsmen. (Confusion.) Some persons have called me a Tory, and some have called me a Whig; but I will tell you what I am. I am a liberal and a friend to every cause existing in the country, and for the maintenance of your independence. (Cheers and uproar.)

Mr. Miall then, addressing the electors, said I am here to meet my antagonist face to face I have at no time put my literary reputation beside that of Hobbes or any other man. I have exercised myself, according to the ability which God has given me, to do good to my fellow men—to advocate the interests of our common humanity; and it is no matter of concern to me whether my name goes down to oblivion, or is handed up to the admiration of posterity. I stand on that ground, and none of the taunts of the Hon. Baronet shall make me ashamed of my position, or of the steps I have taken hitherto to make it good. With regard to the infidelity of Hobbes, I have been challenged to produce a single paragraph which, and avail evidence of his sentiments on that point. Why, the whole of his works are against Christianity,—against the civil liberties of the people—against the rights of individuals, conscience, and against that free and spiritual religion which we profess to reverence and hold dear. If I have erred on this point, I have erred in common with great names—with Cudworth, and Hallam, and posterity. Ingold Stewart, and Sir James Mackintosh; and if I have been foolish or dishonest in misrepresenting the sentiments of the philosopher of Malmesbury, then the whole literary, philosophical, and ecclesiastical world have been equally dishonest and equally foolish for two centuries past. The hon. baronet accuses me of bigotry and intolerance, taking his stand upon some misunderstood or misreported passage in a former speech. I tell him that he does not know my spirit or my sentiments, for if there is one individual in the world who would leave the human mind unfettered in science, in philosophy, in religion, that man am I, and I tell the hon. baronet that it was not until I had, in miserable taste, taunted me with the title of "Reverend," that I referred to him as the editor of Hobbes. (Cheers and uproar.) After attacking those Dissenters who had promised to vote for Sir W. Molesworth, as traitors to their principles, and declaring that this was only the beginning of a movement which would be carried out in other boroughs, he concluded by stating that if he was placed in the proud position of their representative, he should be happy to attend to the public interests of the borough, and if at any future time he should be opposed to their views he would instantly retire.

The High Bailiff then called for a show of hands for the different candidates; and, to prevent mistakes, he elevated a placard with each candidate's name as the show of hands was called for in his favour. For Sir W. Molesworth a very large majority of those present declared themselves; for Mr. Pilcher there were comparatively few, beyond the knot of coal heavers in front; and for Mr. Miall there was a fair show, but considerably inferior to that for Sir William Molesworth.

The High Bailiff declared the show of hands to be in favour of Sir William Molesworth, when all parties demanded a poll, which was fixed to take place at eight o'clock on Thursday morning.

The polling commenced at eight o'clock on Thursday morning. The following was the progress of the poll during the day, as given by the committees of Mr. Pilcher and Sir W. Molesworth:—

ASTLEY'S. SCENE IN THE [illegible] RIDING LADY.

At this time a dense crowd had assembled round the hustings, in the expectation that the candidates would address the meeting, but in this expectation they were disappointed, for the High Bailiff, after a short delay, adjourned the proceedings until Friday, when the numbers were officially declared.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—"A. B."—The problem sent is the celebrated Indian one which graces the wrapper of the "Chess Player's Chronicle." By sending his name and address to the publisher of that periodical, "A. B" will obtain the solution.

"J. W. H." submits the following:—If White, having K and Q against K and R, and being required, according to a well known rule of the game in such cases, to mate in 50 moves, succeeds, say at the 45th move, in winning the Rook, to be compelled to effect the mate in the remaining five moves, or is the position considered a new one, and fifty more moves allowed? This is a vexata questio among Chess Solons to the present hour. In our opinion White is, unquestionably, entitled, after capturing the Rook to 50 more moves.

"Marma."—Too simple for the merest tyro.

"V."—All problems under eight moves should be discovered from the diagram alone. There is no merit whatever in solving such stratagems by moving about the Chessmen.

"B. M. P."—The variation on one of Philidor's games by our correspondent "B. M. P." appears to establish the fact that Philidor might have won it, instead of merely getting a drawn game.

"225," Chelsea.—Mr. S. won eleven, his opponent six, and four were drawn. The position sent is childish; Mate can be forced in two moves instead of six.

"R. W. B."—A very beautiful problem, although, from the peculiarity of its conditions, unadapted to our columns.

"S. H. C."—Meritorious, but scarcely difficult enough. Try again, and send us the result.

"J. C." Wellingborough.—Buy Tomlinson's "Amusements in Chess" and Lewis's "First Series of Chess Lessons."

"J. T."—Apply for "O'Donnell's Problems," or any other foreign Chess work, to Williams and Norgate, Henrietta-street, Covent-garden.

"J. A. B."—In the position sent, Mate can easily be given in two instead of four moves. For an answer to the second inquiry, see our reply above to "J. C."

"B."—Stalemate is a drawn game.

An Amateur of Chess is desirous of playing a friendly game of Chess by correspondence; address to "G. F. E., Post-Office, Alford, Lincolnshire."

Solutions by "H. A.," "M. R. G.," "H. P.," "J. V.," "R. W.," "A. Z." and "Frank," are correct. Those by "A German," "Julia," "An Athenæ Tyro," "R. L. J.," Chester; "Tyro," Dublin; "W. W.," and "J. F.," all wrong.

CHALLENGE TO THE ST. GEORGE'S CHESS CLUB.—A challenge to play a match by correspondence (for what stake is not mentioned) bearing the signatures of M. Kieseritzki and some half dozen amateurs of the Café de la Régence, and the Cercle, in Paris, has just been received by the members of the St. George's Chess Club. Considering the source from whence it emanates, we cannot help thinking this Défi should have been addressed to the frequenters of Rice's, or Giddon's, or Goode's Divan, rather than to the most powerful Chess Club in Europe, the members of which, however desirous they may feel for a match of this description with the Paris Club, or with any other well known and established body of Chess Players, must hesitate to engage in such a contest with a few comparatively unknown amateurs. Under any circumstances, we hope the English Club will not again embark in the arduous labours of a Chess match by correspondence, except for a stake in some degree proportionate to the time and trouble which the task involves.

THE ANDOVER INQUIRY.

The best check on excessive power is the little wisdom its possessors often exhibit in using it; and this is, in its way, a consolation. Sufferings may arise from the neglect, blunders, or abuse, of great authority, but the indignation they arouse compels that authority to be more careful; and, if it persist in its disregard of the interests entrusted to it, there is a great risk of the misused authority being altogether destroyed. Common sense and common humanity cannot be outraged with absolute impunity, even by the boldest and strongest. Though the forbearance of a people is sometimes something marvellous, a crisis comes when indifference is lashed into rage, and tolerance repents of its lenity: such a crisis will evidently be brought about ere long with respect to the administration of the Amended Poor Law, unless the authorities to whom that administration is entrusted consider their ways, and be wise. We say nothing of a wisdom working in the spirit of Christianity; that is almost hopeless; but the degree of rational prudence that calculates in the "spirit of human dealings" surely is not too much to expect, if it were only for the sake of preserving the whole system from a destruction which would involve that of the Commissioners themselves, their seats, and their—salaries.

That destruction will assuredly overtake it, if public opinion is outraged, the public eye disgusted, and our national character among nations degraded, by such disclosures as those made in the course of the inquiry at Andover, suspended so suddenly and unaccountably, but now renewed, we would fain hope, from some kind of deference to that expression of popular feeling such statements were certain to excite. In such an investigation it was impossible to stop half-way; in Russia, the Government would have forbidden any movement in the matter, and there it would have ended; in England, the press discovers and exposes evils, the exposure excites discussion, and an inquiry cannot be avoided; but that an attempt should have been made to stop it when half complete, and when all the worst (it is to be hoped) had been made known, was an act of folly peculiar to those who having great powers, are very often embarrassed as to how they shall use them, and in trying to make them feared, cause them to be simply despised. It is something to find enough discernment existing to enable them to see the blunder, and resolution enough to endeavour, at least, to amend it.

The enquiry the Poor Law Commissioners were compelled to institute into the proceedings in the Union House at Andover, had two branches, or objects; one, the personal conduct of an official, an hireling entrusted with the administration of the law, who seems to have possessed every capability for making all that is bad in it, much worse by the way it was put in force, and the condition of those who were subjected to that administration. Into the case, as it affects the individual, we have no desire to enter; for many reasons, all the details of the evidence had better be consigned to oblivion. But the other branch of the question—the condition of the unfortunates, subjected in a civilised land to the operation of a law passed by a Christian Legislature—demands a little more consideration.

It is asserted—as yet without denial or disproof—that men, driven by destitution to the asylum the law and the public funds provide for it, have been reduced, by the pangs of a hunger keener than any that could be felt outside the walls of this "chosen seat" of charity, to gnaw, like dogs, the putrid matter from the refuse bones they were set as a task to grind for manure! Anything more horrible has never been told either as fact or fiction. We have all read in the annals of sieges and shipwrecks, of the extremities human beings may be driven to by hunger. There are depths of horror to which our nature can descend, inconceivable by those who have never undergone such dreadful trials, or anything even remotely resembling them. But, in the beleaguered town, or on the frail raft, floating like a mere speck on the boundless and hopeless expanse of ocean, all were under that one dire necessity that knows no law. This degradation of man to the level of the brute, occurred in the midst of wealth and abundance—nay, under the very roof where, if the witnesses are to be credited, riot and debauchery were not strangers, and that at the cost of the public, which does not pay its millions a year for fellow-beings to be driven to the meal of the hound, and batten, like the Ghoul of Eastern tales, on carrion! The imagination of the poet, to which we owe so many terrible pictures of human woe, never ventured to paint such a scene in the midst of a land "exulting and abounding" in all that can minister, not only to well-being, but to luxury; it would have seemed an outrage on all reason and possibility; "were this written, and played on the stage, they would condemn it as an extravagant fiction;" yet, here it is among us—a hideous reality!—a truth stranger indeed than fiction. Shakspeare heightens his picture of the epicurean self-indulgence of Marc Antony, by describing the sufferings he endured during his earlier and better days of soldiership, when,

> On the Alps
> It is reported he did eat strange flesh,
> That some did die to look on but it was when "at his heel did Famine follow;" under no other circumstances could such a violation of nature occur. In this case, we see men driven to a similar extremity, with plenty around them. When Dante, amid the terrible punishments of his "Inferno," pictured Count Ugolino feeding on the skull of his enemy,* his imagination did not suggest to him a scene so frightful as that of the bone-yard in this new "Tower of Famine," the Andover Union.

> Not more furiously
> On Menalippus temples Tydeus gnaw'd,
> Than on that skull and on its garbage, he.

But the poet redeems his subject from utter repulsiveness, by making the feast the banquet of revenge, which is a passion, not of hunger, which is a mere appetite; the savage and cannibal-like scene described as having occurred in the midst of our civilised society, we repeat, has no parallel, either in the records of fact or the tales of fiction.

If the New Poor Law were the best system of relief in the world—which it is far enough from being—such an incident as this is enough to rouse all men against it. But we cannot think such horrors are the natural consequences of the law itself; there is nothing in the enactment that warrants the supposition. Where then rests the blame? Plainly on those to whom is entrusted the carrying the law into operation. Here is the great failure of the system, and that in the very point in which it was to be superior to the old one. The forming many parishes into one union, the centralising the power and authority of that union in a Board of Guardians, with all the machinery of Commissioners, Assistant Commissioners, and Auditors, over them, was to ensure such a perfect control and supervision, that the administration must become as perfect as could be expected of anything merely human. Doubtless, there were abuses under the old parochial workhouse system, but the enquiry into it elicited nothing so atrocious and disgusting as that, a few years ago, was alleged against the old system of another kind; it was found that the diet of paupers was too good, with too much of it; that it was superior in both respects to the food of the independent labourer, and that it still formed a continual bonus to the better-disposed class to make themselves paupers, for the sake of the good things which abounded for those in that condition. So, Parliament, being persuaded that pauperism was a monster that in a few years would absorb the whole of the fee-simple of all the land and property of England, in an alarm passed the New Poor Law, by which destitution is made a crime, for the pauper is clothed like a criminal, imprisoned like a criminal, and fed—far worse than any felon in any gaol of the kingdom. We have gone from one extreme to the other, and should set about finding the middle point as soon as possible. The first thing to be done is to persuade ourselves that no machinery is so perfect as to work well unwatched. Unregulated, perhaps there is nothing so destructive as the operation of those systems that are the most elaborately constructed; they may crush those they were framed to serve, as in the present instance. That supervision must come from the people themselves. More than half the abuses we have heard of might have been prevented if Boards of Guardians did their duty honestly; the communications at Somerset House are not omniscient; even with the assistance of their travelling deputies, they cannot dive into all the mysteries of workhouse management. Those who are on the spot, and know, or ought to know what is doing, are most accountable for abuses and malpractices of this kind; and if they permit them, connive at them, and use their official power to screen a favourite employé from exposure and punishment, when both are deserved, they become the actual perpetrators of the crime, and will be so considered by the public. Whatever may be the result, it is to be hoped the exposures of the enquiry at Andover may be a lesson to every Board of Guardians in the kingdom.

JOHANNES RONGE.

Johannes Ronge is the author and head of a schism which has occurred in the Roman Catholic Church in Germany. It originated in the feeling of disapprobation with which many well-educated Catholics regarded the singular spectacle of the exhibition, at the Cathedral of Trèves, of a garment, said to be the Tunic of Our Saviour, or the Holy Coat, "without seam," for which the soldiers at the Crucifixion cast lots, it not being divided like the rest of his raiment. It is stated that a million and a half of people went in pilgrimage to see it. A few details of the strange scene may be necessary to a clearer understanding of the position taken by Ronge, and those details we borrow from Mr Laing's "Notes on the Pilgrimage to Trèves," just published, a vigorous and impartial history of the whole event.

The Bishop of Trèves, Dr. William Arnoldi, issued a circular notice, dated Trèves, 6th July, 1844, and signed by the Episcopal Vicar-General, Von Muller, that, in consequence of the urgent request of the clergy and body of believers in the Bishopric of Trèves, the holy relic preserved in the Cathedral, being the coat without seam worn by our Saviour, would be exhibited for the space of six weeks, from the 18th of the following August.

As an introduction to the public exhibition of the relic, a history of the holy coat in the Cathedral of Trèves was, by order of the Bishop, drawn up by Professor Marx, of the Episcopal Seminary, and published, with the Bishop's approbation, by Linz, at Trèves, 1844. The early history of this relic is somewhat obscure. The Empress Helena, who was either the wife, the mother, or the mistress of the Emperor Constantine historians have not determined which—was born some time in the third century, either at Trèves, or at Drepona, or at York historians have not determined which—and was crowned, after the victory of Constantine over Maxentius, in the year 312; and Constantine and the Empress Helena suppressed the Christian Church, put an end to the persecution of the Christians. About the year 326 this Empress Helena repaired to the Holy Land, discovered, by inquiry among the inhabitants, the exact spot of the crucifixion, the holy grave, and other sacred places, and recovered the cross itself, the inscription that was nailed on it, and the holy nails which had fastened our Saviour to the tree. She acquired, also, on the journey—according to the historic tradition at Trèves—the holy coat without seam—the garment without a seam of our Saviour, the identical coat for which the soldiers cast lots (John, xix. 24), and, out of regard for Trèves—by some reputed her birth-place, and in this age a city inferior only to Rome itself, and the capital of Western Europe—she bestowed this relic on the church of Trèves, through St. Agroëcius, then its Bishop. This is the tradition of the Chapter of the Cathedral of Trèves.

From this time the relic was lost sight of till 1196; by a Bull from Leo X. it was publicly exhibited in 1514; it was another Bull from the same Pope, about the same time, authorizing the sale of indulgences that produced the Reformation. We may remark here that two learned professors of Bonn, Drs. Gildermeister and Sybel, in two works, distinguished by an amount of erudition and reading "unequalled since the days of Gibbon," have decided against the genuineness of the relic altogether; they state that there are eighteen or twenty places where the same garment is said to be deposited. But we proceed at once to the exhibition itself.

The scene in the ancient city of Trèves, from the 8th of August, when the relic was displayed for the first time to the pious pilgrims, to the 7th of October, when it was again consigned to its shrine, must have very closely resembled the scenes of the tenth or eleventh century, when the Crusades were set on foot. Multitudes of pilgrims in processions, formed by the throng of people in the narrow roads and streets, with standards flying, and numbers of bands, variously clothed in white, strewing flowers, and the priest of each community at its head, came, singing hymns, or telling Ave and Pater osters on their rosaries, in regular columns. The whole Rhenish province, the districts on the Moselle, the cities of Cologne, Coblentz, Metz, Nancy, Verdun, Aix-la-Chapelle, Luxemburg, Spires, Limburg, Munster, Osnaburg, towns and districts in France, Belgium, and Holland, all poured their population in to continue the stream of pilgrims, moving on and on, without break or halt, towards the minster-tower, from which a white banner with a red cross was waving above the dense cloud of dust, and the dark mass of human beings. From the 18th of August to the 25th, at midday, 112,224 persons, according to the police lists, had come into Trèves, not reckoning the multitudes who came in and went out the same day, without stopping the night. As the record proceeds, from 1500 to 1700 pilgrims every hour in the day and night were reckoned to be passing through the city. From the 18th of August to the 14th of September, 600,000 pilgrims were reckoned to have entered within its walls. A Trèves newspaper of the 7th of October, the last day of the exhibition, reckons the numbers of pilgrims who had visited the holy relic, up to that date, at 1,100,000 persons. Others estimate the numbers at 1,500,000, and even at 1,600,000. Any correct statement of such a vast body as must have passed through Trèves within these eight weeks cannot be expected The numbers, like those of the first Crusaders, struck the local authorities into dumb surprise; and many of the devout may have repeated their visits to the shrine over and over, and thus have swelled the apparent mass of pilgrims. It does honour to the arrangements of Bishop Arnoldi, and of the clergy and municipality of Trèves, that, with this vast and sudden influx of people, there were few or no accidents; few or no deaths, from exposure to weather, fatigue, or want of food; and even a considerable rise of price in the necessaries for ordinary purchase. This fact was clearly proved by the Catholic newspapers, in repelling the forebodings and imputations of the Protestant press at the time; and this fact is, perhaps, the most serious, and, politically considered, gives occasion to the most serious reflections of any connected with the movement There was a concentration of physical force, within eight weeks, in a given spot of a kingdom under monarchic authority like which it would have puzzled a Napoleon or a Wellington to have drawn together, and, compared to which, be the numbers ever so much exaggerated, the standing armies of any Government, the two or three hundred thousand men of any army, are but a drop in the torrent.

This spectacle disgusted many Roman Catholics; but the first public expression of that feeling was given in a protest against the whole transaction, written to Bishop Arnoldi, by John Ronge, of whose life, from the work already quoted, we furnish a sketch.

He was born on the 16th of October, 1813, at Bischofswalde, a village in the circle of Neussen in Silesia. He was the third child of his parents, who had a family of ten children, and a small croft, or peasant estate, on which their labour supported them From his sixth to his twelfth year, he kept the sheep, and he also brothers helped to work the arable land. He was taught, at the village school, to read, write, and cipher; got the Catechism by heart, and little history. While attending his sheep in the field; and learnt progress and history of Silesia the last year he was at school. One of the teachers persuaded his father to send him to the Gymnasium at Niessen, in the year 1827, and he remained there until 1836. Ronge adopted the clerical profession, as most available to his own pious disposition and love of giving instruction, and also to his father's circumstances, who had eight other children to provide for He performed his military duty of three years' service while at the Gymnasium. In the years 1837, 838, and 1839; and in December, 1839, entered the Priest Seminary The training of the young priest—the crushing, although, feeling, devotion, and knowledge, into a round hole with hundreds separated from the common mysteries of our nature, by the conventional standing of the priest, are slightly but ingly touched upon, and disclose, no doubt, the real fe el ngs of many a young Roman Catholic clergyman, living in the world as a thing out of it, walking about in the crowd of human beings, not in the pride of a superior, but in the desolation and agony of heart of an isolated outcast. He was appointed to the cure of Grottkau in 1841, as Seelsorcher and schoolmaster, or chaplain. The chapter of the Breslau Cathedral, of which Grottkau was a chaplaincy, was then, in consequence of the vacancy of the see, presided over by Dr Ritter, the vicar-general of the diocese, an ultramontane, driving, who was endeavouring to bring back the darkness of the middle ages in the schools and in the pulpits under his control Ronge opposed this retrogression; taught and preached in the most enlightened strain permitted in other Catholic countries; and in an article in the "Vaterlandsblätter" of the year 1842, intitled "Rome and the Chapter of the Cathedral of Breslau," and signed "A Chaplain," which attracted much notice, exposed the attempts to bring back the superstitions and usages of the dark ages. For this he was called to account, and suspended by a decree of the chapter, in February, 1843; and he repaired to Laurahütte, as chaplain, and teacher of the school in the iron-foundry. As far from any moral delinquency being imputed, or being imputable to him, the whole inhabitants of Grottkau and Laurahütte, signed a testimonial of his irreproachable moral and religious conduct, and of their regret at losing him as their teacher and pastor; and even those who were absent at the time joined in sending their signatures afterwards to this testimonial. This "Justification" silenced at once all the false accusations of the party, and conscience-driven Catholic clerical life, and Ronge receded with the more force on the heads of his accusers.

All Germany rang with this case, and the principles it unfolded. Ronge was degraded and excommunicated by the chapter of Breslau. Robert Blum of Leipsic, a man known in the literary world, a friend, if we mistake not, of the poet Schiller, took up his defence Dr. Regenbrecht, a member of the chapter of Breslau, and professor of canon law in the Breslau University, wrote to Dr. Lassaulx, the vicar-general, or bishop pro tempore of the see, that "he renounced the Roman Catholic Church, as he could not reconcile its attempts with the spirit of Jesus"

In the meantime several families at Schneidemühl, a small town in the circle of Posen in Prussian Poland, united themselves under their priest, Czerski, renounced the Roman Catholic Church, and took the name of the Christian-Catholic, or Christian-Apostolic-Catholic Congregation; and applied, by a petition, dated 27th October, 1844, to the departmental government at Bromberg, to be acknowledged, regulated, and established according to law in their external affairs. No new sect or congregation is recognised in law, in the Prussian dominions, without the sanction of government. The new congregation likewise sent to the functionary government at Bromberg their confession of faith, and published it at the same time out of Prussia, at Stuttgard, under the title of "Public Confession of Faith of the Christian-Apostolic-Catholic Congregation at Schneidemühl, as to their Difference of Creed from the Roman Catholic Church, but is, the Hierarchy: published by Köhler, Stuttgard, 1844, for the benefit of the congregation" At the same time appeared, "A Justification of my Renunciation of the head Church of Rome," by Czerski, the priest of this congregation. This appears to have been the first organised congregation of the new church.

Since t at period the congregations have gone on increasing, but not so rapi ly as they would have done in a country where the people are less dependent on the Government. They have drawn up their articles declarations of Faith: they generally agree in what they renounce of the Papal doctrine, but are more vague and uncertain in what they affirm as their belief; they

Renounce the Pope, auricular confession, celibacy, and all the immoral and irreligious abuses, introduced, without any S ripural warrant, in the dark ages, merely for the support of the Papal power—to take the Bible, the whole Bible, and nothing but the Bible, for the rule of religious life and to establish an Apostolic Catholic Church—a church in which the Christian Church was in the time of the Apostles, and for three hundred years after them—in which there is no Pope or Papal power—in which the clergy are chosen by the members and congregations, from suitably-educated men, are duly ordained and intro uced to their fellow-clergy—and in which the service shall be in a known tongue. the German, not in the unknown Latin language—the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper dispensed to the laity, as well as the clergy, in both elements, the wine as well as the bread—the fees for masses, burial services, and other rites, together with pilgrimages, fasts, worship, worship, established saints, and the confession auricular as much of the sacramental servi e, mass, and liturgy of the Roman Catholic Church as it finds suitable, until a general council of the new German-Catholic Church be convened, in which the several congregations will take part.

The new Church has already to contend with differences among the leaders, and has also suffered by the attempt made by the "Friends of Light"—the rationalists of Germany—to identify themselves with them, which has given some colour to the assertion of the Roman Catholics that "infidelity" is at the root of the whole movement, which is very far, indeed, from the fact. Of the probable result of the schism, Mr. Laing gives the following estimate:—

A very important social element is at work here, however, be raised by this movement. It will not be a true church, but it will have all the machinery of a true church, viz., congregations and a clergy formed on just principles of social economy. The congregations are voluntary associations of persons who have simply educated men; they support them; and they and their clergy acknowledge no co. nection with or control from the state. These are sound principles of social economy Although not unveiled by any formal Christian doctrine, holding doctrines, in fact, which cannot be amalgamated they are united by these principles into one social body, which may check, or even annihilate, in many localities, among the upper classes, the speech of Rome and the Jesuits in the pulpit and in the school. They may cut down the weeds, although not sowing any valuable crop in their stead.

SALE OF RAILWAY SHARES. The members of the Manchester Stock Exchange, in order to set at rest the question whether sales of shares, represented by letters of allotment, bankers' receipts, or scrip, in Companies only provisionally registered, are legal under the Joint Stock Companies' Act, which came into operation last November, prepared a case for the opinion of the Attorney-General, Mr Ogle, of the Western, and of Mr Cowling, of the Northern Circuit, and the following is worth the attention of all interested in railways, and especially of the Boards of new Companies Sir Frederick Thesiger and his colleagues state:—"1. We are of opinion that sales of such documents are legal. 2. We are of opinion that Railway Companies established after the 1st of November last, are not within the provisions of the Statute (7 and 8 Vic. c. 110), and that, consequently, the sales of such documents are legal. 3. We are of opinion that Railway Companies established after the 1st of November last, are within the restrictions contained in the 26th section of the 7th and 8th Vic., c. 110, and we think that sales of letters of allotment, bankers' receipts, or scrip, attempted to be made after the expiration of, but before the complete regis tration of the Company are illegal. We are of opinion, that sales after the complete registration of scrip, issued by Railway Companies established subsequently to the 1st of November last, are legal It is evident from the latter portion of the 26th section, that the Legislature intended that Railway Companies should not be established after the 1st of November, or not think, independently of the Statute that the sale of letters of allotment, bankers' receipts, or scrip, would be legal." These opinions show that Companies must be completely registered, or their scrip cannot be legally transferred.

RAILWAY FOR HER MAJESTY AT GOSPORT. This railway, which consists of a branch, or an extension line, from the terminus at Gosport into the Royal Clarence Victualling Yard, constructed for the purpose of the accommodation on her visits to Portsmouth or the Isle of Wight, was opened on Saturday last by a special train, which arrived in London at a quarter before eleven, conveying Her Majesty's Ministers to a dejeuné at Osborne house at one P.M. This railway is now quite ready for her Majesty's use, and will be put in requisition for the Royal service on the departure of the Court from Osborne, on the 26th inst. Her Majesty's Ministers expressed their satisfaction to the directors at the increased facilities this railway would afford her Majesty for privacy and convenience. We believe the railway originated in a suggestion made to the directors by his Royal Highness Prince Albert on one of the Royal visits to the Isle of Wight. The length of the rail, from the Gosport terminus to the pier or stage in the Clarence-yard, is about 600 yards, and going through the Gosport [illegible] cross ing the most upon piles, a bridge or tunnel [illegible] through the lines, thus the upper part of the works are not in [illegible] and the permanent [illegible] for the public the same as before. The whole of the cost of construction is stated to be under 25,000*l*.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Wednesday.

The crimes committed in the environs of Paris have at length forced the attention of the authorities to some positive means of prevention. Hitherto not the slightest measures have been adopted. Men were knocked down and robbed, women insulted and ill-used by bands of ruffians, and the Government has evidently looked on without stretching forth a finger for the safety of the public The supposition has been that the depredators have found a refuge within the fortifications. M Persegnac, the Mayor of Romainville, has taken a military measure, which I think will lead to good results; and there are few doubts entertained that his example will be followed by the various Mayors in whose districts these misdemeanours have and are still occurring. The measure of prevention consists in verifying upon the register of all the communes the names of individuals who are found without papers. The verifications made, the individuals are summoned before the Maire, and are there questioned, they must give their christian and surnames, ages, profession, dwelling, and place of birth. Then a delay is granted to them, at the expiration of which, if they do not report their papers, or present themselves in person, they are arrested and conducted to the Préfecture of Police. The first operations which took place in the commune of Romainville, exhibited at once that more than half the persons living about the environs of Paris can commence work without papers. At the same time, it is but justice to add, that the majority of them were honest workmen; they demanded but a short delay to adopt the proposed measure, which will be a positive advantage to many, as it will at once separate them from the ruffians with which they have been too frequently confounded.

Every now and then the good ballade of Paris are frightened from their propriety. A few days since, a man about thirty years of age, very respectably dressed, rushed through the principal streets, menacing all he encountered, and uttering the most singular exclamations. "Back! back! Attaint the Republic! Back!" was the burden of the great man; you pretend that the great man is a coiner; you shall appear before the tribunal above, and Napoleon shall be my advocate!" These phrases, mingled with yells, collected an immense crowd around him; but, with the aid of a heavy bludgeon with which he was armed, and which he managed with great ability, he soon opened a free passage, and continued his career. When he had arrived at the centre of the Place de Grève he perceived a number of sergens de ville in pursuit of him; he vaulted lightly on the parapet, crying out from broke to pieces Napoleon, but you shall not smash me," and instantly precipitated himself into the river. A number of wherries rowed rapidly to the spot, but more than ten minutes elapsed before they could find him; when brought to the banks he gave scant signs of life. The unfortunate creature, from papers found upon his person, had, it appeared, speculated for the last six weeks, upon the calling in by the Mint of the six laird and the ten centimes bearing the initial N, and now in the course of having discounted a great quantity at eight and ten per cent in the hundred, hoped to get them easily accepted at the Treasury. But he was deceived in his calculation; the greater part of these coins held by the gudgeons, and also other persons who frequent the cafés and estaminets, being false, of foreign manufacture, they were, as a matter of course, of no value, and he had gained a loss by the affair of upwards of ten thousand francs. The loss had turned his brain. He was instantly carried to the Hotel Dieu, where succour was provided; but, up to the moment that I am now writing, no mental amelioration has supervened.

The following statistic of the public highways of Paris is rather curious:—All the streets, courts, quays, bridges, squares, and boulevards, placed from end to end, would form a road measuring two hundred leagues, and presenting a superficies paved with four millions five hundred thousand metres squared. The freestone pavement requires to be restored every ten years, and to be entirely renewed every forty years The total value of the streets paved in Paris is upwards of forty-five millions francs.

The workmen have nearly completed their important labours at the Palace of the Luxemburg and its dependencies. The four facades of the Palace in the great Court of Honour are in a state of forwardness; the court is raised, and the footpaths ornamented with granite pavement, surrounding the entire circle. The hideous barracks, which, we remember, obstructed the view of the garden in the Rue de Vaugirard, are to be splaced by a splendid gate of bronze and ironwork, of admirable design and workmanship Indeed, improvements are taking place in every direction. A grand reservoir is in course of erection at the side of the Observatory, in the Rue Cassini, which also on the Rue d'Enfer. The water is to be distributed in arcades and subterranean vaults, to receive the waters of Arcueil at their source, and to distribute them in this quarter. The new "Chateau d'Eau" is to be covered with vegetable earth, to be planted as a garden.

FRANCE.

Although the Paris papers, this week, do not contain the announcement of any important event, there are several facts in them which possess interest

The Royal ordinances, approving the adjudication of the concession of the Northern Railroad to Baron Rothschild and Co, and of the Fampoux and Hazebrouck line to Messrs. O'Neill and Co., were signed by the King, on the 10th instant at the Château d'Eu.

The Gazette de Bretagne announces the arrival in that city on the 9th of the Count and Countess Molina (Don Carlos and the Princess of Beira). "The ex-Pretender to the throne of Isabella," says that journal, "alighted at the Ecu de Noailles, which appears to become the rendezvous of the Legitimist notabilities of every country. Don Carlos occupies the first floor, which has been suitably prepared for the reception of the august traveller The presence at Morlaix of this personage has caused much excitement in the Royalist circles, and Don Carlos will probably receive numerous visitors."

Her Majesty's recent visit to France still occupies some of the Paris papers. "The Queen of England," says the Revue des Deux Mondes, "came a second time to visit the King of the French at the Château d'Eu. That short but gracious visit has been presented by the Ministerial journals in its proper light. On this occasion they did not foolishly make it a subject of triumph; they did not describe it in the style of an epic poem or romance; they adopted a simple and true language, the true tone suited to celebrate that happy event. France may feel flattered by the testimonies of esteem and affect in given by the young Queen of the Three Kingdoms to the crowned Representative of the Revolution of July. To confer that mark of friendship, Queen Victoria, sailing from the coast of Belgium, prolonged her sojourn on board by thirty-six hours—a circumstance which enhanced the value of her affectionate visit. On that account was her Majesty welcome to the coast of France, and saluted with a sincere enthusiasm by the people."

The weather had changed unfavourably in Paris, with every appearance of its continuing so The equinoctial gales were supposed to have commenced; but, in most quarters, the harvest was completely finished.

Letters from Nantes, of the 11th inst., state that the harvest was over in that part of Brittany; and that, on the whole, the produce was much greater than had been expected. The quality of the grain, moreover, had been a little impaired by the excessive rains of the season

The Presse states that the Duke de Broglie will be the successor of M. Royer Collard at the French Academy

We regret to learn, from other Paris papers, that Donizetti, the celebrated composer, who recently arrived in that capital, is labouring under a severe fit of illness.

The Duke and Duchess de Nemours arrived at Bordeaux on the night of the 13th. The next day their Royal Highnesses visited various public establishments, and the Duke conferred the Cross of the Legion of Honour on M. Martinez, nurse-en-chef, the battalion of Pompiers, and a lieutenant of the same corps, and on a private.

The Moniteur Algerien of the 10th states that a part of the western frontier is agitated, owing to the appearance in the Lower Molouia of the Emir Abd el Kader, at the head of several Arab tribes.

SPAIN.

Once more we have to record an insurrection in Madrid. It took place on the night of the 5th instant. About ten o'clock, it appears, a large body of persons was seen moving, armed, and in an hostile manner, from the gate of Recoletos, towards the barracks of the Artillery of the Puerta del Sol, and the Cuartel de Guardias, who fell in the conflict, was buried in the evening of the 6th with military honours. The number of killed was estimated at eight or ten, and that of wounded at one or three.

Such is the account of the affair given by the Ministerial papers, but the details derived from authentic private sources, leave little doubt that the Government entrapped the unfortunate persons engaged in the insurrection. It is acknowledged that the authorities were fully prepared for the plot. They knew that at a certain hour of the night, two bodies of deluded creatures were to meet, the one before the barrack of the Pesillo, the other before the gate of General Cordova. They knew that for several days previously proposals had been made to officers, which these officers reported, in order to draw out the plans of the insurgents, these officers were instructed to give encouragement, and so well did these spies perform their execrable task, that they assured their victims of the concurrence of the regiment of Navarre with their designs, and fixed the night of the 8th for their execution. Accordingly, the persons entrapped by the police agents, presented themselves, confidently, before the barracks; when there they were met by a volley from the regiment which they were told was friendly. They were surrounded on all sides, and shot, or made prisoners like sense, and from like causes, took place before General Cordova's house. A mob of fools was led to the slaughter by the agents of the police.

M. Thiers has been received in Madrid with great distinction. All the Ministers who were there walled upon him, and the Marquis de Miraflores invited him to a grand banquet on the 9th. It was attended by all the thirty persons, including the three ministers remaining at Madrid. M. Thiers was to leave on the 10th for the Escurial, and to return on the 11th. On the 12th he was to set out for Toledo, Grenada, Cordova, Seville, and Cadiz. At the latter place, according to one of the journals, he is to embark for Lisbon, and then visit England on his way back to France.

MUNOZ, Duke of Rianzares, Queen Christina's husband, has arrived at San Sebastian from Vittoria, accompanied by Senor Egana, one of the deputies of the province of Guipuzcoa. The object of the Duke's visit is to purchase for the Queen, if it be possible, a small estate in the beautiful valley of Loyola, with the picturesque mansion of which the Majesty was so charmed during her recent visit to San Sebastian. The only difficulty which retards the conclusion of the bargain is the high price demanded by the owner of the ground.

The Queen was expected to arrive in Madrid on the evening of the 12th. She was to be accompanied by General Narvaez and M. Martinez de la Rosa.

Letters from Saragossa mention that that city is in a state of great excitement, and that there was a great probability of an outbreak.

RUSSIA AND CIRCASSIA.

Private letters from Constantinople of the 28th of August give a very different account of Count Woronzoff's expedition against Circassia, to that already noticed, which was derived from Russian sources. In fact, instead of the success boasted of by the Russian accounts there is little doubt of the failure of the attack. Notwithstanding the triumphant tone in which these operations are spoken of in the official bulletin published at St. Petersburg, it is now evident that Count Woronzoff was forced to beat a disastrous retreat, in the course of which he was closely pursued by the Circassians.

One of the letters in question says —

"The news from Circassia, which has reached Constantinople by a letter from Odessa, of the date of the 22nd instant, is disastrous. It appears a very severe action has taken place between the Russian and Circassian forces; and that the former, although by name victors, have purchased the name of victory by disaster equivalent to defeat, and are now in full retreat for Tiflis. Thus it happened:—Shamil had, according to his wont, drawn the Russian army after him into the heart of the mountains. At the fortress of Dargo, however, he made a stand, that for being too important to relinquish, without a blow, to the enemy. Dargo is several days' march beyond the mountain passage called Les Portes d'Acier. Woronoff attacked the fort with great vehemence; but it was defended with equal vigour. After assaults had been reiterated by the Russians for several days, the place was entered by them, but the fighting continued now to be more obstinate than before. Woronoff fought on foot among his men, and enacted all the accounts agree, wonders of valour. At last the ammunition of the Circassians, whose force was partly composed of soldiers, fairly failed, and they were obliged to retire, but they did so in perfect order. They took their guns with them and all their baggage, and abandoned only the dilapidated walls to the Russians, who, according to the account received left no garrison in the place, but with a stand, that fort possessed of, but precipitately retreated. The loss of the Russians in this action is estimated at least at 8000 men, and whilst on their retreat, being pursued by the Circassians, they are said to have lost 3000 more. Many of their officers have been killed, and three generals

"On the whole, the advantage gained by the Russians is considered very dubious, whilst the sacrifice of life at which it has been purchased is very great; and the Circassians have shown that in close fight, even hand to hand, with Russian soldiers, they are quite their match. It remains to be seen whether Woronzoff has garrisoned and will be able to retain the fortress of Dargo. If not, he has gained nothing, but if he has done so, it may do that he has made an important step in advance towards the conquest of Circassia. The account at Constantinople is that he has contented himself with destroying the fortifications of the place."

THE RIVER PLATE.

Advices from Buenos Ayres to the 6th of July, per Sultana, have been received. It was generally believed there that the English and French Ministers had not succeeded in their mission, and that Rosas would not treat with them unless they previously acknowledged his belligerent rights, and allowed the blockade of Monte Video. Mr. Ouseley, it was understood, was not likely to take any hostile steps, not withstanding the large British naval force in the river, but would, in all probability, await fresh instructions from Europe. It was likewise believed there that the French Minister had been in favour of decisive measures, but that Mr Ouseley did not find himself in a position to act. Meantime, an English family named Kidd, living a short distance from town, consisting of nine persons, adults and children, had been murdered in the most brutal manner, the children having been murdered in the presence of their parents, and it was feared that this was only the prelude to a resumption of the former scenes of midnight assassination, but now directed against the Europeans and Frenchmen. The garrison of Obligado, after lying four months at Buenos Ayres, not seeing any hope of a speedy removal of the prohibition to land her cargo, which had been issued in consequence of her having touched at Montevideo for a pilot on her way up the river, has brought it back to Liverpool. The loss must be very great. The Fame and Jean Baptiste had returned to Montevideo, and, with the consent of the owners of the goods, landed their cargoes there. The Conservateur, French vessel, had landed part at Montevideo, and taken the rest of her cargo back to France. The Gentoo, Gartlee, and Richard Watson still remained at Buenos Ayres with their cargoes, awaiting events.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The sporting feature of the present week was the Great North Country Race Meeting at Doncaster. The Derby and St. Leger are two events that may not inappropriately be styled half way houses between pleasure and business. The Ernest, indeed, has a good deal of the gala character about it, while quite as many go the latter with the view to pursue as soon out of their misery as possible, as with any design of enjoying a holiday. The Leger is the most genial channel for betting in England—the especial country for enterprise of any sort. If any proof of its memorable sport were wanted, the vast preponderance of men over the gentler sex would be enough. Its average will be half-a-score of gentlemen to a lady, at the lowest. Moreover, the object of those who control its economy is to multiply facilities for betting, and to promote the convenience of those who resort to Doncaster to turn their penny, for the most part, out of their pockets. Nothing can exceed the excellence of the recent improvements on the Course, as this year. Instead of the offices that racing and hunting men had formerly to get at one another, they are now all carefully folded together in the good shepherds of the communities. A series of what are now termed the Grand Stand: the Jockey Club Stand and the Steward's Stand, all in one commodious lawn—where betters, trainers, jockeys, and horses are joined together in the most harmonious style. The Grand Stand is also carefully railed off into appropriate compartments, and rendered fit for an Asiatic's Pulka party: it has been made the beau ideal of turf. With all these applications and means to boot, it will be understood that the Doncaster Meeting of 1845 was a great one, the scene with great eclat. The weather, too, was brilliant: the St. Leger field dark. —heavy and art all conspired to make an occasion of surpassing interest. It must also be said, in support of the Doncaster Meeting, that it is a favourite for the mere pleasure-seeker, that there is a race-ball and a theatre—for the few: but in a great popular sport like this, there might conveniently be more general sources of recreation for the many.

The conventional agreement to centre all the observance of the meeting into one or two issues, has virtually reduced Epsom Races to two days—the Derby and Oaks; and Doncaster to the Leger and Cup. Many other days, however, now combine to make the Doncaster Cup a dead letter. The taste for old horses, so to speak, has clean passed away: and the season of the year in which it takes place makes the few in existence still more scarce. There is hardly a decent paster available in the month of September, and a good three-year-old is too formidable at the back of the year for the moderate old ones of our time to venture to meet. Thus all parties have a stand-up fight, and generally rallied off into appropriate compartments, and rendered fit for an Asiatic's Pulka party: it has been made the beau ideal of turf. With all these applications and means to boot, it will be understood that the Doncaster Meeting of 1845 was a great one, the scene with great eclat. Thus all parties have a stand-up fight. Doncaster Cup is not quite a handicap; and there seems no good reason why it should not. These are the days of racing philanthropy, in which the breeders and supporters of studs vs under it keep them for the owners and riders of their produce and of the ring. As the popularity—the racing popularity of the Cup wanes, the importance of the Two Year Old Stakes—the Champagne—increases. This year the field, on paper, was a very large one—the same wrought out of it by the betting people. But this is anticipating: let us be orderly.

In compliance with the resolution made last season, to reduce the present to to four days, Doncaster Meeting commenced on Tuesday, and terminated on Friday. Without being a very distinguished exception to the rest, the meeting was certainly a very good average one. The weather was just what an English autumn now and then gives us—fine and chilly, with glorious gleams of sunshine. The company, the miscellaneous respectability of the immediate neighbourhood, mixed with the gentility of Scotland, Ireland, and Wales, for it is the sporting rendezvous of the whole United Kingdom for the sport, for the most part, excellent—as we proceed to show, in reference to the chief issues of interest. On Monday, the first sport forth public races, which one was to boast—master enough for a racing afternoon. The chief of these was, of course, the Champagne. This brought out thirteen—against twelve of them one being backed even. This was Maholm, a fine strapping animal, but subsequently said to be amiss, which we know was the case. He also got off very badly, but caught his horses at the distance, and ran with them a few strides upon terms; he then gave way, and the Princess Alice won a very fine race, in a very fine form. This filly will be of mark in her next year's engagements. The rest of the sport consisted of events which require no notice beyond that given in the returns. Wednesday—the all-important Leger Day—had, out of five races set down, but two set before the company. Our sole affair is with the Leger. This great affair was, beyond all precedent, dull and spiritless as regarded the market. The night preceding, at the Rooms, no one seemed disposed to book a nomination at any price; and though there was some little betting just before the start, it may be said to have been the least sporting Leger ever known—speaking with reference to the public. One or two individuals, indeed, stood large fortunes against particular horses, and they got out, probably, upon the principle that fortune favours the brave.

Three o'clock was the hour named for the race, and it came off at a quarter to four. This was in some degree occasioned by the excessively dramatic way in which Lord George Bentinck organised it, for the behoof of the spectators as well as the fair play of those interested. Having drawn the fifteen, which constituted the field, together, at the St. Leger post, and marshal them in two lines, settled by lots, past the Stand, and nearly to the distance; then, wheeling them, they were led slowly back to the post, and the flag being dashed to the ground by the noble lord, off flew the eager phalanx. The instant they fell their legs, Twig sprang clear of the lot, making fearful play for the Baron, who was the last off, with a bad start. Next the leader lay Cheresby, Pantass, and then a couple of rows, for them was no rallying till the first mile was done. On filing the hill, the only change of moment was, that the leading lot had closed Twig, and that the Baron had brought up his lee-way. Then at very good speed they rounded the Red House turn, which came into the sun's declension. Here the front rank consisted of Miss Sarah, Pantass, Weasharbit, Cheresby, and the Baron sat coming up hand over hand. At the distance, Miss Sarah was in front. Pantass next her, and the Baron third on the outside. Those three ran thence a tremendous race home, the Baron coming out clear, just abreast of the Stand, and winning brilliantly by a length, Pantass beaten half a length for the second place. Though not placed by the Judge, The Pacha was fourth, Weasharbit fifth, and then came a body of horses with Mentor among them. It was as fine a Leger as ever was seen, and unquestionably run as chivalrously for as the best friend of the turf could desire. The settling will be easy, for the winner has not been at all permanently in the market.

DONCASTER, Thursday Evening.—The veterinary surgeons appointed to examine The Baron's mouth having given a certificate that he was only three years old, the setting took place at the usual time; it went off quietly, although several large sums remained unpaid. The balances generally were small. Mr. Watts himself not having won a sixpence above the stake, and very few of Scott's masters having had confidence enough in the horse to back him to any extent. We only heard of one defaulter—the amount not very heavy.

COUNTRY NEWS.

THE MURDER OF MR PEACOP, AT ROCK FERRY, NEAR LIVERPOOL.

Our readers will doubtless recollect the circumstances attending a most cold blooded murder perpetrated on an amiable young man, named Thomas Peacop, who resided at New Ferry, but also been connected in the house of Messrs. Golding and Co., corn merchants, of Liverpool, and the manager of their concern at Rock Ferry. The deceased was on his way home on the last evening of 1844, about ten o'clock, when he joined the company, and was proceeding along the turnpike road toward New Ferry, when he was attacked by three ruffians, who knocked him down and beat him in so dreadful a manner as to produce a fracture of the base of the skull, from the effects of which he lingered until the 4th, when he died. The same night a commercial clerk, Mr. J. F. Keyzar, who lived near the deceased, was on his way home, and he came up at the time the parties were engaged in the attack. He interfered, and received a blow on the head with a bludgeon, which rendered him insensible for a short time, but he recovered, and with difficulty walked home. Four brick makers were apprehended on Saturday night, on the charge of being concerned in the murder. It appears that one of the fellows turned approver, and that upon his information the prisoners were arrested. The grounds were extremely suspicious. Three hurdy gurdies at Birkenhead on Monday, and remanded. Their names are—Patrick Tallant, Robert Lynch, William Nowlan, and Michael Burns.

The examination was resumed before the magistrates on Tuesday, but nothing material when had hitherto prevailed had so far increased that the Court room and Town-hall adjoining were incapable of holding the immense crowds.

The magistrates, Mr. Rogers, Mr. M. Jones, and Messrs. Jackson and Potter, were on the bench, and, after the court was opened, it was found extremely difficult for the officers to maintain order, the yelling of some of the mob not being suppressed until repeated threats of commitment of the offenders had been made.

Patrick Tallant, Robert Lynch, and William Nowlan, were first placed at the bar, and afterwards Michael Burns, and Bernard Brannan.

Four or five witnesses were then called, including Mr. J. F. Keyzar, the gentleman who was attacked by the same party who murdered Mr. Peacop. He, however, could not identify any of the prisoners, nor could he speak with certainty as to whether the weapon found in the house of Lynch was the same he was struck with. One, he said, was much like it. The other witnesses deposed to Mr. Peacop leaving the shop at the corner of the Rock Lane, and about two hundred yards from the spot where the attack was made; that they heard cries of murder, and hastened to the spot, and afterwards the deceased, pointed to seeing two or three run from the spot where Mr. Peacop was found across the road, but see could not speak to those persons as being at all like the prisoners. Newton, the township constable, was at the time on the road, and hearing the cries ran to the spot, but the assailants had fled, and this will account for the fact of the whole of deceased's pockets not being rifled. A person named Myers, who was last with the deceased previous to the attack, deposed to a conversation he had with him the day after, from which it appeared that he had been robbed of 21s. 4d; that soon after he left the shop a tall man came up, dressed in white trowsers, and walked a short distance alongside of him, when he gave a shrill whistle, and immediately he received a blow on the side of the head, was then knocked down, and repeatedly kicked about the face and head. He added that three men were engaged in the attack upon him.

The further examination was then adjourned.

The town was in such an excited state that the military were sent for as an attempt at rescue was apprehended

FATAL ACCIDENT IN THE RAILWAY TUNNEL AT LIVERPOOL.—A workman in the employment of the Grand Junction Railway Company, met his death in the tunnel on Saturday. His name was James Nixon, and he was fifty five years old. At the moment, John Woodward, a plate layer, said, that about a quarter past ten o'clock on Saturday morning he sent the deceased, who was also a plate layer, down the tunnel to sand the rails, as they were very wet. Four trains were down between the time he was sent and a quarter to twelve o'clock, at which time witness saw him dead. William Ireland, the superintendent of the engine station at Edge hill, said, that about a quarter to eleven o'clock he went down the tunnel in a mixed waggon; and when about a quarter of a mile down he felt a slight obstruction on the rails, and heard a noise like the breaking of a piece of wood. He put the break on and stopped the waggon as soon as he could, got out, and looked along the line and from the brightness of the rails saw they were clear. He went down to Lime-street, and sent a man to examine the rails. William Jubilee Norton, a porter at the station in Lime street, said he was sent up the tunnel by the last witness to see for something that was supposed to be upon the rails. He got a light for that purpose, and about a quarter of a mile from Edge hill, he found the deceased lying across the down rails with one foot on one rail and his right hand upon the other rail. He was quite dead and cold. His right hand was completely crushed, and his left jaw was broken. There was also a wound upon the back part of the head. Dr. Arnot, the surgeon, stated that he found death had been caused by a fracture of the breast bone, the result of extreme violence. No further evidence was offered, and the jury found a verdict accordingly. There is very little doubt that he was knocked down by one of the trains, and instantaneously killed.

RAILWAY ACCIDENT NEAR SALISBURY.—A serious accident occurred yesterday morning week on the works of the Salisbury and Bishopstoke Railway, near the former city, which has been attended with the loss of life. The men employed in cutting through the chalk-hill at Petersfinger were undermining, preparatory to throwing down a portion of chalk, when the upper mass suddenly gave way, and completely buried them. Two of them were severely hurt, and conveyed to the infirmary, where one of them, named Joseph Edwards, was found to have received severe internal injuries, from which he died within an hour afterwards. The other had a thigh fractured, besides several external injuries, but is in a favourable state.

DIS. ANDOVER UNION. The inquiry in this case was resumed on Wednesday, at Mr Macdougal's office entered upon. Evidence was called to disprove the charge of sending tea, sugar, &c., out of the workhouse. His advocate not being ready with the defence on the other points, the inquiry was accordingly turned till Tuesday next. The inquiry has now lasted fourteen days

CONFLAGRATION OF FIFTY HOUSES NEAR EXETER. Last Saturday, a conflagration occurred at the market town of Morton Hampstead, Devonshire, which destroyed no fewer than fifty dwelling houses, besides consuming a vast amount of property. The town is situated about twelve miles from the City of Exeter. It appears that the fire was discovered shortly after midnight on Saturday morning, issuing from a baker's bakehouse, at the rear of his dwelling house, in one of the small thoroughfares, called Cross street. Notwithstanding the lateness of the hour, active measures were adopted by the authorities to suppress the flames. The wind, however, scattered the fire on to the roof of the dwelling, which being thatched, like most of the houses of the town, and in an exceedingly dried condition, it kindled with astonishing rapidity extending to the several apartments of the building almost at the same moment. The houses on both sides, occupied by small tradespeople, in less than five minutes afterwards ignited, and the flames progressing along the thatched roofs six contiguous dwellings were fired. By three o'clock the fire reached its height; it had pervaded the houses in Fore street, and at one time there were twelve or fourteen burning from their basements to the roof. The authorities at this juncture, fearing that the whole town would fall a sacrifice, wisely determined upon pulling down some of the buildings down, with a view of stopping the course of the conflagration. A number of labourers were instantly set to effect that object in Cross street and Fore street, and engines from Exeter having by this time arrived, the work of destruction was by six o'clock got under. The town now presents a most desolate appearance. The whole of Cross street, from the West of England Agency Office to the Bell Inn, is now in ruins; while a part of Fore-street presents a similarly deplorable sight. The number of houses consumed is calculated at fifty. Amongst them are the premises of Messrs Nix and Co., drapers, the Golden Lion Inn, belonged to Mr. Bellamy, and Mr. Robb's bonder. The entire portion of the building property is said to be insured in the Sun Fire office, but most of the inmates—chiefly of the poorer classes—are unfortunately uninsured.

ACCIDENT ON THE SHEFFIELD AND ROTHERHAM RAILWAY.—On Saturday evening last some villain or villains committed a most wicked and diabolical act, by which a dreadful accident was caused on the Midland line of railway, close by the Holmes station, where a short branch of about half a mile in length connects the Sheffield and Rotherham Railway—now amalgamated with the Midland—with the main line at Masborough. At half past seven o'clock a train left the Sheffield station, consisting of three passenger carriages, containing between sixty and seventy passengers, a parcel van, and seven luggage waggons, to join the down train from London, which was due at the Masborough station at eight o'clock, and with which it was to proceed forward to Leeds. The parcel van and luggage waggon were placed next the engine and tender, and the passenger carriages, at the tail of the train. When the train arrived at the Holmes station, the engine driver slackened his speed, as in passing from the Sheffield and Rotherham line to the branch alludes to above, there is a very sharp curve round the corner of the station. At this place the train was not proceeding at a greater speed than ten or twelve miles an hour, and had not passed the station more than fifty or sixty yards when it was suddenly stopped by some contrivance of villainy and murder, with the force of the shock, were completely lifted off the rails, and thrown on their broadside across both up and down lines; the engine driver, a man named John Edwards, and the fireman, named Hugh Hastinson, were thrown a distance of ten or twelve yards, and lay insensible for some minutes. Three of the luggage waggons and the parcel van were thrown off the line; and the guard, John Dunker, who was seated on the last carriage but one, with his back to the engine, was thrown with great violence upon the roof of the carriage in front of him, and, fortunately, escaped injury by catching hold of the rails on the top of the carriage. Two of the waggons were smashed to pieces, and a third rendered useless by the concussion. The shock was felt severely by all the passengers, who were thrown from their seats with great violence, from being at so great a distance from the engine, none of them received any injury beyond the shock and a few bruises. The guard immediately dismounted, and found the engine driver and fireman lying speechless on the ground, with the contusions they had received to a place of safety. The passengers, as soon as possible, got out of the carriages, when it was found that a "points," used for putting waggons off the main line, had been awicked open with an iron chair and a piece of limestone, so that it was impossible for a train to pass over without being thrown off the line. The two men who were injured were, as soon as possible, conveyed to Sheffield, and surgical aid procured: they are now fast recovering. The Midland Company, anxious for the public safety, have issued placards offering a reward of 100 guineas to any person who shall produce evidence to cause the conviction of the perpetrators of this villainous act.

ACCIDENT TO MR OAKELEY GORE.—An accident of an alarming nature occurred at Boreham House, Essex, the seat of Sir John Tyrell, Bart., on Tuesday night week. Mr. Ormsby Gore, who, with his lady, was on a visit at the mansion of the hon. baronet, on leaving his dressing room, over looked several flights of the staircase, and, losing his balance, was precipitated over the balusters. Mr. G., in his alarming descent, grasped the handrail of the next flight, but it gave way, and he fell with considerable violence into the hall below, severely injuring his head and shoulders, as well as one of his feet. Mr. Gore's watch, which was in his hand at the time, was dashed to pieces.

SERIOUS ACCIDENT TO MR. J. M. HOGG, ELDEST SON OF MR. HOGG, M.P. We regret to state that a serious accident has happened to Mr. J. M Hogg, eldest son of J. W. Hogg, Esq., member for Beverley. Deputy Chairman of the East India Company. Mr. Hogg, junior, had been for a short time past a guest at the Duke of Buckingham, at Wootton, Bucks, where a select party have assembled to enjoy the sports of the field. On Monday several of the party went out shooting in his Grace's preserves, when unfortunately the gun of Mr. Hogg, junior, was discharged, and the contents lodged in the right hand and arm, so much so that it is expected one of the fingers must be taken off. Medical assistance was immediately obtained, and no danger is at present anticipated. Mr Roberts, son of the banker in Lombard street was one of the party, and immediately after the accident occurred left Wootton by express for town, to convey the melancholy intelligence to the family. Mr. Roberts arrived in town on Monday evening at five o'clock, and found that Mr. Hogg, senior, was at his seat, Eastwick park, near Leatherhead, Surrey, he immediately got conveyance there, and that gentleman instantly went to Wootton. Mr. Hogg, junior, is going on favourably.

INCENDIARISM IN ESSEX.—A fire broke out on the premises of Mr. Isaac Livermore, Old Park farm, Great Waltham, on Monday. In a very short time the devouring element had laid low the two large barns, stables, cart sheds, pig styes, hen house, and granary, destroying also a number of valuable implements. There was only one horse in the stables, which was fortunately saved. The wheat barn was filled, and considered worth £300. The barley barn, in which the fire was first discovered by the looker, was also quite full; it was spacious enough for a waggon and horses to turn in it, and said to be one of the largest, if not the largest, in Essex. The farm belongs to Guy's Hospital, and the buildings, valued at £1000, were uninsured, the governors of the hospital setting their losses in such cases against the heavy sum it would require to protect their property. The crops and implements were fully insured in the Essex Economic, upon which we observe a loss of about £500. There appears to be every reason to fear that this fire, which has consumed the produce of nearly 100 acres, was the work of an incendiary.

ARUNDEL CASTLE.

We are happy to learn that his Grace the Duke of Norfolk has just directed that this truly magnificent "ancestral home" be opened to the public, for inspection, on Mondays and Fridays during the season; an announcement which will be very gratifying to tourists. The present may, therefore, be a fit opportunity for introducing our readers, by way of illustration, to the main features of the Castle and its picturesque locality.

The borough town of Arundel stands on the north-west bank of the Arun, at a short distance from the coast of Sussex. The river is embalmed in the memory of epicures, by its famous grey mullet, which, in the summer, come up to Arundel in large shoals, in quest of a particular weed, the feeding on which renders them a great delicacy: the eels of this river are also very fine.

Arundel takes its name from Hirondelle, in Norman French, Ourundele, a swallow, which bird is in the arms of the town, though the origin of the bearing is not decided. The earliest recorded notice of the place occurs in the will of the Great Alfred, where it is described as a manor. Subsequent to the overthrow of the Saxon dynasty, it became a fortress of strength and importance.

There is little in the town that merits special mention. It has, however, a handsome cross church, mostly in the perpendicular style, with a stone pulpit; and it had its Maison Dieu (God's Home), founded temp. Richard II. A considerable portion of the town is shown in the large engraving annexed: the situation is delightfully picturesque; the winding river recals the poet's lines:

> Wild Arun, too, has heard thy strain,
> And echo, on my native plain,
> Been soothed by pity's lute!

The Castle, as will be there seen, is the most striking feature; and we agree with Mr. Parry, that "a strong impression of ancient, feudal, and ancestral grandeur, is presented by the stately front of the Castle, placed on a terrace, with the whole central keep towering high above it, and the whole enveloped in ancient trees, and contrasted in front by the river of scanty breadth, but impetuous flow." (Hist. and Desc. Coast of Sussex.)

Dr. Beattie, in his elegant work on the Castles and Abbeys of England, observes:—"The Castle of Arundel enjoys a two-fold celebrity, in its great antiquity, and in its peculiar privilege of conferring the title of Earl on its possessor. The former reverts to a period much anterior to the Conquest; the latter was hereditary in the eleventh century, and confirmed by Act of Parliament, 11, Henry VI. But its chief and enduring interest is derived from the long list of warriors and statesmen whose names are identified with the place; and whose deeds, during the lapse of eight centuries, have shed lustre on the national history:"

> Since William rose, and Harold fell,
> There have been Counts of Arundel;
> And Earls old Arundel shall have
> While rivers flow and forests wave?

ARUNDEL CASTLE.—THE KEEP AND NORMAN GATEWAY.

The history of the Castle can only be briefly narrated. It is mentioned with the town in King Alfred's will; and it was given after the Norman Conquest, by William I., to his kinsman Roger de Montgomeri, created Earl of Arundel and Shrewsbury. Robert, one of the successors of this Earl, supported Robert Duke of Normandy, the eldest son of William I., against Henry I., the youngest son of the Conqueror. Afterwards, the Castle passed into the family of Albini, from them to the Fitzalans; and, at last, by marriage of the heiress of this race with Thomas, Duke of Norfolk (in the reign of Elizabeth), into the family of the Howards, by whom it is still retained.

In the civil war, between Charles and his Parliament, Arundel Castle was held and garrisoned by the latter. It was, however, taken by Lord Hopton, in 1643; and retaken by Sir William Waller. Thenceforth it remained little better than a mass of ruins, until it was restored by Charles, the 11th Duke of Norfolk, who died in 1815; the cost of such reparation being not less than £600,000. In this extensive work, a considerable portion of the old building was demolished. The modern parts are in the Gothic style, built of freestone; and stone of a brown cast was selected, in order to accord better with the remains of the ancient fabric.

The Castle stands high, upon a circular knoll, partly artificial, and commands an extensive prospect over the low flat country towards the sea, as far as the Isle of Wight. It has been supposed that the sea once washed the Castle walls, as anchors and other marine implements have been found near it.

The Castle is surrounded on the N. and W. sides by a deep ditch. The entrance Gateway, in the wide area beneath the Keep, was built by Roger de Montgomeri. "It consists of a square tower standing over an arched way, which forms the entrance to the Court, and communicates with the keep by a raised passage carried across the moat, and terminated by a flight of steps. The upper part of this Tower is supposed to be the work of the thirteenth century; but, the lower portion, comprising the whole of the covered way, retains its original stamp, and presents a striking specimen of Norman taste. The arch is circular, without a keystone, and quite destitute of ornament. A portcullis was formerly placed at the outer extremity of the passage, which was, probably, still further strengthened by a drawbridge over the fosse immediately beneath it." (Dr. Beattie.) This fine work, together with the Keep, is engraved on this page; it is, indeed, a beautiful scene of picturesque nature and art.

The Keep is a circular stone tower, and is reputed to be the most perfect in England. Dr. Beattie, from a recent survey, describes the height of the mount, from the bottom of the fosse externally, to be 70 feet; on the internal side, 69; and with that of the walls and crowning battlements, it presented a commanding elevation, on the east, of 96 feet; and on the west, of 103. The apartments, judging from the corbel stones still remaining, appear to have been arranged round the walls, converging towards the centre, from which they received their light, as from an open cupola. Externally, there were neither loopholes, nor openings in the masonry, from which, as in other keeps, an army could be annoyed; so that it was only from the ramparts and battlements that the garrison could repel an assault.

Such Dr. Beattie infers to have been the "Castrum de Harundel" of King Alfred and the Conqueror; which Roger de Montgomeri enlarged to the strength and space of a Norman fortress. "The external walls, accordingly, were faced with a new facing of Caen stone; the whole structure was supported, at intervals, by broad flat buttresses; and on the south-east side of the Keep an improved entrance was effected, where the Norman art is still visible. It is a wide semicircular archway cut through the solid wall, ornamented on the inner side with a plain torus moulding, and terminated on the outer by a smaller arch, richly carved with the chevron and other ornaments in common use during the latter part of the 11th century."

The Keep, the above Gateway, with some of the walls, are all that remain of the ancient Castle, if we except the Barbican, or Bevis's Tower—a Norman addition, now an ivy-mantled ruin. The Keep, too, is nearly covered with massive foliage. It has been long tenanted by some owls of large size and beautiful plumage, sent over from America as presents to the eleventh Duke. They are especial favourites with visitors.

Under the east end of the Castle is an immense vault, or dungeon, where the unhappy captive of war and the culprit were formerly confined. The Baronial Chapel (now the dining-room) is known to have existed in the 13th century. The south-east front is supposed to have been the work of Montgomeri, and has lately been restored. It crowns an abrupt descent, looking over the Arun, and has a remarkably fine effect. There is, too, a fine gateway, restored by Richard Fitzalan, flanked by two square embattled towers; besides the ruins of four towers upon the walls.

Such were the main features of the old Castle: the restoration and rebuilding of our time are truly magnificent. The grand entrance to the Court-yard is by an arched gateway of immense bulk: in this Court are the Baronial Chapel; the Baron's Hall, or Banquet Chamber; and an immense bas-relief of Alfred instituting Trial by Jury on Salisbury Plain.

The south side is part of the old structure restored: the Grand Entrance Doorway is in the pure Saxon style, the top finished with an elevated fencework; on the right of the doorway is a colossal statue of Hospitality; and on the left, another of Liberty. We have also engraved a portion of the Great Court or Quadrangle. The north-east wing, containing the Library and Alfred Saloon, has a Norman basement, and the upper part in the style of Henry VI.

The Castle contains some magnificent apartments; and it is, altogether, one of the most superb "show-houses" in this country. Among these state rooms are the Library, built in imitation of the aisle of a Gothic cathedral; the ornamental parts being copied from the cloisters at Gloucester, and St. George's, Windsor: the ceiling, columns, &c., are of mahogany—in very questionable taste. The Barons' Hall is adapted from Westminster, Eltham, and Crosby Halls: it has an open roof of Spanish chesnut, and a window of stained glass, representing King John signing Magna Charta; besides other stained glass windows, with family portraits. The Dining-room—formerly the Chapel—has also a fine stained-glass window, with portraits of the late Duke and Duchess, as King Solomon and the Queen of Sheba, at a Banquet. In the Barons' Hall was celebrated, June 15, 1815, the six hundredth anniversary of the great foundation of English liberty—one of the most gorgeous festivals given in our time.

The "baron of beef" was borne in to the sound of trumpet—the walls were hung with armour; and the entertainment resembled the coronation banquet of one of our early Kings.

The Park adjoining the Castle is finely wooded, and abounds with picturesque scenery. The adjacent country was formerly covered with vineyards, from the fruit of which wine was made; and, in 1763, there were sixty pipes of excellent wine, resembling Burgundy, in the cellars of the Castle, the produce of one vineyard attached to it.

RUBENS'S CHAIR.

Antwerp is rich in memorials of the genius of Rubens; but, probably, neither of them is regarded with purer veneration than the illustrious Painter's Chair, which is preserved in the Royal Academy of Painting, in the above city. The chair is finished with red leather, brass nailed, and has the name of the Painter on the upper part of the back, with the date "A. D. 1633" beneath. Cosway, the Royal Academician, is said to have offered two hundred florins for this interesting relic of the most celebrated painter of the Flemish school.

Sculpture on the Continent.—Amongst the numerous additions making to the splendour of the square of the Opera, in Berlin, the following sculptural embellishments are spoken of as in project or preparation. Gigantic groups of warriors, and of "Victory," are executing, after the designs of Schinkel, for the Royal Bridge; and the same artist is making designs for the ornament of the Guard house. On the side of the Unter den Linden, the monument of Frederick the Great is proceeding rapidly. Rauch having nearly completed its numerous figures. Opposite the colossal equestrian statue of that monarch, it is proposed to place a similar statue of Frederick William III. To the statues of the Generals Bulow and Scharnhorst at the Guard house, are to be added those of Kleist and Tauenzien; beside Blucher, to be placed bronzed statues of Generals Gneisenau and York and the palace of the Princesses is to be ornamented with statues of Stein and Hardenberg. For all these works Rauch, it is said, has already received the Royal command. The Austrian Emperor, on the occasion of his coronation at Milan, as King of the Lombards, gave a number of commissions to the most distinguished of the Milanese sculptors, leaving them perfect latitude in the choice of subject. These works, to the number of seven, are now exhibiting in Vienna.—A statue of "Peace," by Cajetano; a "Prodigal Son," by Alberodio Sanzorgio; an "Infant Jesus," by Rinaldo Rinaldi; "Rachel and Jacob at the Well," a figure of a "Fate," by Croff, and two by the Professor Pompeo Marchesi—one, a bust of the poet Monti, and the other, a group on the old theme of "Venus Carrying off the Weapons of Love." The marbles of the Pyrenees are coming into use for the supply of the large works executing in Prussia. Twelve fine columns of the marble of Campan have just been finished at Bagnères de Bigorre, for the Museum at Berlin. The monument decreed by the States of Bohemia to be erected to the memory of the Emperor Francis is begun. It is to be an equestrian statue of the Monarch, invested in his robes as King of Bohemia, and will be ornamented with twenty-four statuettes, representing the circles of the kingdom, the capital, and allegorical allusions. The whole is to be seventy-five feet high.

NEW CHURCH AT HARTSHILL, WARWICKSHIRE.

This Church, which is of Anglo Norman character, having a beautiful deeply-recessed western doorway, with a rose window above and the emblems of the four Evangelists carved in stone, was commenced upwards of two years ago, from a design by T. L. Walker, Esq. It is built chiefly of Hartshill stone, the gift of Richard Jee, Esq., and is adapted for the accommodation of six hundred worshippers, including four hundred free sittings. The funds then subscribed were somewhat limited; but, it was hoped, should deficiencies arise, that, when the spiritual wants of this populous district became known, more extended aid would have been given. The whole amount of the subscription has, however, been spent in completing the external building; consequently, the interior cannot be proceeded with, and thus, an edifice, which, it was hoped, would promote the glory of God and prove of inestimable value to many who, through the remoteness of the parish church and other causes, seldom or never enter a place of worship, stands unfinished and useless, for want of a few hundred pounds to fit it for Divine service. For this purpose, an appeal is now being made by means of a Bazaar (to be held next month), which has received very kind and distinguished patronage; and it is greatly to be hoped that the ladies will have the satisfaction of being instrumental in completing this good work. Many benevolent persons, entirely unconnected with the place, but acquainted with the urgency of the circumstances, have kindly sent donations; and others, who take a pleasure in extending the usefulness of the Established Church, have still an opportunity of exercising their Christian benevolence.

Hartshill is a hamlet of the parish of Mancetter, and contains about fourteen hundred inhabitants. It is a place of some note in history, being situated within the precincts of the ancient forest of Arden. The remains of a castle, with an adjoining tumulus, on which probably the keep stood, are seen in the village. It is also in the immediate neighbourhood of Oldbury, where, on an eminence commanding very extensive views, are the remains of a castrametation, which is supposed to have formed the summer camp to the Roman station Manduessedum, on the Watling-street, about two miles below. Three sides of the camp are well preserved, and the ramparts, which are about twenty feet broad at the bottom and six feet high, are now occupied by majestic oaks—the growth of centuries—as if to mark the antiquity, and defend the existence, of these surviving monuments of Roman conquest.

In an adjoining wood, called Hartshill Hays, is a small tumulus, which was opened about ten years ago, by M. H Bloxam, Esq., and proved to be of ancient British origin; and, from the remains of arms, burnt bones, &c., was doubtless the burial place of some illustrious warrior; the more probably so, as it is immediately behind a strong entrenchment, extending across the brow of the hill, entirely through the wood, and marking the spot as a fortified retreat of our aboriginal ancestors. Many other relics of the same ancient race have, at various times, been disinterred in several parts of the village. At Hartshill was born, in the year 1503, Michael Drayton, the celebrated poet. It is also well known from the veins of manganese that are found a few feet below the surface of the soil. The views of Leicestershire, Derbyshire, and other neighbouring counties, from different points of the village, are very extensive; the whole range of Charnwood Forest lies in the distance, and in clear weather between forty and fifty village churches are said to be visible.

FATAL AND ALARMING FIRE IN BLACKFRIARS.

On Tuesday afternoon, about a quarter before two o'clock, an alarming fire broke out in the warehouses belonging to Sir Charles Price and Co., oil and colourmen, situate at the bottom of William-street, New Bridge-street, the storehouse abutting on the north-west side of the Thames, nearly adjoining Blackfriars-bridge—at the right hand of which are the City Chartered Gas Works—the only intervening building being that of Messrs. Hoppe, coal merchants, the basements being immediately contiguous. So large a body of gas being in such near contact to the flames, naturally caused serious apprehensions in the neighbourhood—apprehensions which were considerably increased when it became known that several tuns of oil, vitriol, and turpentine were upon the burning premises; as well also, it was feared, a large quantity of gunpowder.

Scarcely a quarter of an hour elapsed before sixteen or seventeen engines were upon the spot, all of which were quickly supplied with water, and, in a few minutes more, the floating engine usually moored on the eastern side of Southwark bridge was brought up, and, it fortunately being high water, placed almost close to the burning pile. As this engine sent forth a volume of water exceeding a ton per minute, the effect was speedily seen in the partial subjugation of the flames, and it was hoped that all danger would shortly be at an end. These hopes, however, were not realised, for the conflagration again burst forth with redoubled fury, caused by the bursting of some carboys, containing vitriol and turpentine. The burning liquid immediately spread the fire all around, and, running with the greatest rapidity into the Thames, ignited some of the coal barges, of which two were much injured and sunk. In its progress the lighted vitriol came in contact with two fire engines which had been brought into the interior, the men engaged on which were hastily compelled to make their escape, but the whole of the wood work was entirely destroyed, leaving nothing but the iron behind. One of the brigade establishment, however, we are sorry to state, was not so fortunate as his companions—as the sudden irruption of the flames scorched him so severely that he was carried to St. Bartholomew's Hospital, with but little expectation of surviving the injury. The lighted turpentine then floated upon the river, and soon caught one portion of the floating engine, when those in the direction caused her to be moored near the middle of the Thames; but the flames caused so much fright and consternation among about fifty coal men, who were engaged in working her, that the whole jumped pell-mell into the water. This incident occasioned great confusion, and the efforts of those who were near in boats were of course directed to the extrication of the men who were in such imminent peril.

The floating engine having thus become suddenly unmanned, the conflagration increased for a time, and spread itself, on the left, to the premises of Messrs. Capel, coal merchants, which are partially destroyed—and on the right, to those of Messrs. Hoppe, adjoining the gas-works, the whole interior of which is levelled to the ground, leaving only the outer wall facing the river standing. Now the fears of the inhabitants were raised to a painful pitch, lest there should be an explosion of gas—in which case there must have been fearful devastation. However, when apprehension was at its height, the flames sensibly diminished, as the consequence of the very great and well directed exertions which were made by the firemen. At four o'clock the fire was mastered, without further damage than the destruction of the premises belonging to Messrs. Price and Co., and considerable injury to those of Messrs. Piper and Messrs. Capel.

The fire is generally supposed to have been occasioned by the running over of some turpentine in the boiling house.

Immediately that the directors of the gas works became aware of the imminent danger in which they were placed, messengers were dispatched to all the shopkeepers and inhabitants in the neighbourhood, to request that they would instantly light all the gas in their various premises, and thus, by lowering the quantity in the service, considerably decrease the amount of damage that would have occurred had an explosion taken place. This request was of course complied with, and the shops in Fleet-street and neighborhood consequently presented the unusual appearance of being all lighted up at mid day. Gas was also withdrawn from the gasometers, by being allowed to escape at a distance from the scene of conflagration.

The fire originated in that part of the premises termed the turpentine warehouse, a large brick building, sixty feet long, and fifty feet wide, situate on the western side of the works, and adjoining the property of Messrs. Hoppe.

The flames at one time ascended at least 100 feet above the buildings; they were seen at a great distance, and the smoke spread over Bridge-street, Fleet street, Chancery-lane, and the river in such dense masses, as to obscure the light of day. The heat was also insupportable where the engines were placed, and was felt at a considerable distance.

The man who lost his life is known to have been working at the engine that was destroyed; in all probability, he missed his way when he retreated, and, instead of jumping into the river, came face to face against a wooden gate, and was compelled to remain in that situation until the flames came upon him, and burnt him to death. A very small portion of his body was found, which was instantly conveyed to the Dane house.

The engine belonging to the Farringdon Station is entirely consumed, and the floating engine is scorched.

The property and premises are insured in the West of England and Alliance Offices.

FURTHER PARTICULARS.

Between twelve and one on Wednesday a male and female called at the Bridewell Hospital, and requested permission to see the remains of the man who had perished, as they had not a brother, and knowing that he was assisting in working one of the engines, they were fearful that he was burned. That request was immediately complied with, when they identified the remains as being those of their relative, a young man named George Spencer, of Black Bear alley, Fleet-street. The fearful nature of these poor people, upon seeing the blackened mass of all that remained of their brother, can be more easily imagined than described. The poor fellow, it appears, was one of many who occasionally earn a few shillings by calling the firemen, and working the engines at fires. A man named Wilford, who was working at the same engine, said that he was talking to the unfortunate fellow, when, all of a sudden, the fire rushed out of the windows, and through the doorway, completely enveloping the whole of the men who were then working. Such was the fury of the blazing turpentine, that before they had let go their hold of the engine, the flames became ignited, and they were forced to jump into the stream to escape being burnt to death. He noticed Spencer running at the same moment with himself, but the passage was not sufficiently wide for all to pass. At the same time the deceased must have been driven by the flames into the corner where the remains were found.

Some idea of the extent of the fire may be formed, when it is stated that at one time there were between forty and fifty puncheons of turpentine, from eight to ten tuns of rod oil, and a quantity of other oils, in a thorough state of ignition. The former articles were kept in large wooden vessels lined with lead, and there is no doubt that, as the fire reached those compartments, they exploded, and to that cause may be attributed the rapid progress of the flames. Mr. Inspector Woodroffe, and a gentleman named Richmond, of Broadway, Ludgate hill, had both a very narrow escape; and one of the firemen, named Hitchin, who was standing on a ladder directing the water through one of the upper windows, was blown down by the explosion of one of the cisterns or tuns.

Although every inquiry has been since instituted as to the origin of the disaster, nothing that could be depended upon can be learned. Some parties imagine that the flames arose from spontaneous ignition, and others that it was caused by a flue in the cooperage. This department is under that portion of the premises where the fire was first observed.

The total damage done it is at present impossible to tell, but it is believed to be under £10,000. The following is a copy of Mr. Superintendent Braidwood's official report.

"Tuesday, Sept. 16, forty minutes past one, p.m.—A fire broke out on the premises belonging to Sir Charles Price and Co., William street, Blackfriars, cause of fire unknown. The turpentine warehouse and contents destroyed on west side of wharf. The windows burnt out and roof considerably damaged of oil warehouse on the east side of premises. Most part of cooperage and stock at the west side severely damaged. Insured in the West of England and Imperial Fire offices for stock; the buildings, which belong to the Bridewell Hospital, it is unknown at present whether or not they are insured.

"C. Hoppe, Pig-quay Coal wharf. Counting-house severely damaged. Three or four barges extensively scorched, and one sunk; insured for stock in trade in the Licensed Victuallers' office.

"Messrs. Capel, coal-merchants: Windows burned out of counting-house, and several barges damaged by fire, &c.; insured in the Phœnix Fire-office.

"The fire was extinguished by engines belonging to the parish; the Bridewell; nine landed, with a floating one belonging to the London establishment; and the West of England and County ones, with their firemen and assistants."

A correspondent of the Chronicle says, "It is worthy of remark, that Sir Charles Price has always had a presentiment that this fire, sooner or later that the stores should be properly protected, the pol ce had full range of the premises day and night. Considerable astonishment has been manifested at the Corporation suffering the existence of such hazardous premises in the heart of the city of London after what had taken place a short time since in the Court of Aldermen, more especially as the turpentine stores almost adjoined the gasometer (the largest in the world in the works of the City Gas Company). Had the wind at the time blown as it did on Wednesday, the firm are convinced that nothing could have saved the opposite warehouses, and had the gas-works in the slightest ignited, it is impossible to anticipate the consequences.

"The firemen declare that they never saw such a terrific body of fire as when the turpentine casters fell in and flooded the yard. In the course of Wednesday Mr. Braidwood directed his officers to institute a full inquiry as to the number of persons injured by the lighted turpentine, and it has been ascertained that two or three policemen, a fireman, and a few labourers, were hurt about the hands, but not to any serious extent. A coal whipper, however, who was seen to jump from the quay into the river to escape the fiery liquid, is missing, and it is strongly suspected that amidst the confusion he got beneath the London Bridge Fire-engine, which was completely consumed, was quite a new one. It was worth £250."

THE INQUEST ON THE BODY.

On Thursday morning, at eleven o'clock, a highly respectable jury assembled at the Bridewell Hospital, George-street, Blackfriars, before Mr. Joseph Payne, to inquire as to the death of George Spencer, aged twenty-one, who perished under the circumstances stated above.

After the jury had viewed the body of the unfortunate man, which presented a most appalling spectacle, the following evidence was adduced.—

George Preedy, one of the fire brigademen, said—I was present at the fire which took place on Monday afternoon, about three o'clock, at Sir Charles Price's, in William-street, Backfriars. A very severe explosion took place of casks of turpentine and other combustible materials, which occasioned a number of persons who were working at the engines to rush towards the water-side. I observed the deceased, who, in the confusion, ran into a contrary direction, from whence he could not effect his escape. Shortly afterwards I saw the remains of the deceased, which presented a most appalling appearance as when seen by the jury. The deceased had been working at one of the engines.

William Walford, being sworn, said—I knew the deceased, who lived in the same house with me, in Bear-court, Farringdon-street. At the time of the fire, the deceased was working at one of the engines, with myself, and a number of other men. All of a sudden, the fire rushed out of the people, and set fire to the engine. I did not see the deceased again alive I made my escape by rushing towards the river, as did a number of other persons.

Mr. James Braidwood, superintendent of the London Fire Establishment, said—I arrived at the scene of conflagration soon after it broke out; several engines were then in full operation, and a vast number of persons were assembled; the whole of the premises were on fire, and fears were entertained, at one time, that the London Gas Works would catch fire. I did not observe the deceased until after the fire was put under control. In answer to questions from the Coroner and Jury, Mr. Braidwood said that most of the turpentine and other combustible spirit escaped without an explosion in consequence of not having sufficient room to expand, but such was not such as to doubt the explosions would have been more severe, and of a devastation consequently more extensive.

Mr. Payne, the coroner, in the first instance, said he was unable to account for the origin of the fire; there were 30 tuns of turpentine on the premises.

Other evidence was heard, after which the Jury returned a verdict of "Accidental death." The deceased was a green grocer.

The Papal Government having, as we have already stated, considerably reduced the import duties on various articles, and particularly cotton, the Minister of Commerce has addressed a communication to the Chamber of Commerce of Paris announcing the fact, and remarking on the effects which it is likely to produce as regards French trade.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 20, 1845.

We have alluded elsewhere to the inquiry now recommenced at Andover; since those remarks were written, we have received the following letter, which, as it is a strong illustration of the difficulties that lie in the way of any person undertaking to prosecute an offending official, voluntarily and on public grounds, we give it publicity. It bears matter-ally on the pending investigation, and is additional proof of the necessity of those placed in the position of "guardians," both of the poor and the rate-payers, doing their duty uprightly and fearlessly. Defects in the law itself must be amended by a higher authority.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

Sheffield, 15th September, 1845

SIR—I see you refer to the Andover investigation. I don't know if you are aware that I instituted an inquiry but last January, before the Honourable Clements, Assistant Commissioner, on charges brought again st the Union clerk; and succeeded in proving the case so fully, that the Commissioners dismissed him forthwith. Well, Sir, such is the defective state of the law, that the Commissioners can only allow me £3. 3*s.* 8*d.*, being simply for the bare attendance of the witness-s to give evidence. And are I am left, after devoting immense labour, at a sacrifice of peace of mind, loss of business &c., with the expenses of the prosecution, amounting to near £200. And to obtain this, I am called to appeal to my townsmen for their subscriptions, instead of the law at once ordering the payment out of the parish funds. Who, after my experience, will attempt to rescue the poor from infamy and ruin, or the rate-payer from being plundered? It is monstrous injustice! And, although I have to thank the rate-payers for the liberal manner in which they are now coming forward to pay the costs, it, nevertheless, is a subject that must be brought before Parliament in the next session. As the law now stands, it is most difficult to remove the greatest villains, and they know it. And I doubt not instances abuses are permitted the poor insulted, and the rate-payers plundered, because it is next to impossible to get evidence to convict them; nothing short of direct positive evidence will do. The fact is, the poor are afraid to give evidence, lest they get their pay stopped, and have their masters turned. What there has been sent in from the four Poor Laws, and out of doors Unions, look into them, see the murderous annoyance caused to the poor, and we are amazed such absurd laws are continued. Reading your remarks, let me send you these hasty lines, and I hope your efforts will not slacken to benefit the condition of the pauper poor.

I am Sir, your most obedient, J. S. HAWKSWORTH.

ABSOLUTE power, like "rebellion" against it, sometimes has "ill-luck," and, at the present moment, the Emperor of Russia is "Spur is cold" in the Caucasus. Notwithstanding the mystification attempted in the despatches, it is pretty clear that an overwhelming force of the Russians, after penetrating some distance into the mountains, has been compelled to retreat, adding one more to the list of disastrous expeditions which have been undertaken in a country which is the great Northern Power against these independent tribes. The war is one of aggression, and deserves to fail; the territory of Russia is already too vast for her strength, and she could gain nothing by the conquest of the region of the Caucasus, but a nominal rule over a few tribes, that might flatter the pride of the despot, but would add nothing to the stability or commerce of his empire; it is afflicting to think that human life should be thus wasted, at the mere bidding of a ruler, for so miserable an object; but it is a consolation to find that Russia, sometimes held up to Europe as a great bugbear, the Power by which every other State is, at sometime not specified, to be absorbed, or crushed, as weak in reality as she is so strong in her pretension. If she possessed one fifth of the strength and resources which have been claimed for her, the Circassians would, long ago, have been exterminated. But, happily, this is not so; the Russian army is formed of serfs, and the worst portion of it, the condemned regiments, constitute the force in the Caucasus. The officers are wretchedly paid, and the whole service is one gigantic system of fraud and peculation. No effective result can be expected from such an instrument, and without another European coalition, the gates of Paris are as safe from the Russian armies, as the English Channel is from her fleets, a large portion of which, it has been proved, exist only on paper.

It is a fortunate thing that people seldom know the extent of a danger till they have escaped it. In the midst of the most crowded part of London, chance, for it certainly was not foresight, placed side by side two of the most extensive and most inflammable establishments of the Metropolis, an oil and turpentine depôt, and the City gas works. The first took fire, and for some hours burned furiously, during which time one half of Fleet-street was in imminent peril of being blown into Holborn, if the gas works had caught fire also. Some preparation was actually made for the catastrophe; a request was sent round to the gas consumers to light up, and the mains were turned on in order to exhaust the gasometers as much as possible. Luckily, the fire was confined to the premises where it originated, and such a public calamity, as the explosion would have been, was averted. But is it right, that life and property shall be exposed to such risks? Some trades are not allowed to be carried on in populous localities, because they are nuisances, and injurious to public health; gunpowder stores, too, are prohibited in such spots; but there are other matters as inflammable and explosive; has the public no protection against their being continued side by side, so as mutually to assist each other in case of ignition, and do as much mischief as possible? The case is really worth the consideration of the City authorities.

LORD PANMURE.—His lordship, who, as we stated last week, had been much indisposed, was so far recovered as to be able to travel to Brechin Castle on Saturday, and is now greatly better.

POSTSCRIPT.

DEATH OF ANOTHER MEMBER OF PARLIAMENT.—We regret to state that Peter Greenall, Esq., M.P., died yesterday Friday) afternoon, at his residence in St. Helen's, in a fit of apoplexy. Mr Greenall was the Conservative member for the borough of Wigan, to which he was elected at the last general election, in conjunction with Mr T. B. Crosse, of Shaw Hall, in Surrey, but who was unseated on petition. Mr Greenall had once before unsuccessfully contested the borough in conjunction with the late John Hilson Kearsley, Esq. Mr Greenall was held in the highest estimation by all parties in this neighbourhood, of all politics, and his loss will be most severely felt in his immediate neighbourhood, being the proprietor of very extensive glass manufactories.

THE VACANT GARTER.—It is reported that the Marquis of Hertford is to have the vacant Garter

SHIPWRECK NEAR DOVER.—The brig Sole of Trieste, from Argostoli, Cephalonia, bound to Hamburg, Captain Andrew Pevnicik, was stranded at Deal, on the Goodwin Sands, during the gale on Thursday morning. The crew consisted of ten men, seventeen passengers, and a female servant, and after the vessel struck they were taken in with currants, &c., nearly the whole of which are lost, and the vessel is scattered along the shore in a thousand pieces.

THE INSOLVENCY OF MR. ALEXANDER LEE.—Mr. Alexander Lee, the musical con poser, came up for hearing in the INSOLVENT COURT, on Thursday. From his schedule it appeared that he had passed through the court in 1835. In the year 1838 he was a bankrupt, and again in 1841, but upon both occasions, he obtained his certificate. Amongst the causes to which his present insolvency was attributed may be mentioned the introduction of foreign music into this country, and the great opposition offered upon it by the fashionable world, and also the closing of the two national theatres. There was no opposition to his discharge entered by any creditor. In answer to interrogatories by the Court, he answered that he had no connection with the proprietary of Drury lane had led to his first bankruptcy, and his connection with the Strand Theatre had caused the other. It further appeared that Mrs. Waylett, the vocalist, had lent him some money, which was sunk in the Dublin Theatre. His talents to please and to instruct, it transpired, did not fall him even in the lock-up house, for he paid his fees by instructing the daughter of the jailor, and his daughter, in the charge of the Terpsichore. After complying with the forms of the court, he was discharged.

FORGING SIGNATURES TO RAILWAY DEEDS.—At the CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT yesterday, Charles Lounder, a surveyor, was found guilty of signing the name of Mr Ferdinand de Lisle to the deed of the South Midland Railway Company, with intent to defraud the trustees of that company, and was sentenced to transportation for seven years. The jury had previously strongly recommended the prisoner to mercy.—Mr. Justice Wightman: On what ground, gentlemen?—The Foreman said: On the ground, my lord, that we believe the prisoner to be the dupe of other persons, and that the railway company did not use sufficient caution in the allotment of shares. Seward Tennant Weaked, engineer, aged 30, was put to the bar on the charge of uttering a fictitious name to a railway contract deed. Sentence was deferred. The particulars of both these cases appeared in our paper a short time ago.

THE EXPLOSION AT WOOLWICH.—On Thursday afternoon an inquest was held at the Royal Mortar Farern, Woolwich, on the bodies of the unfortunate persons killed by the explosion at the Royal Arsenal, of which an account is given in another part of our paper. The bodies having been identified, the inquest was adjourned till Friday. It was then resumed. The witnesses examined were Colonel James Patterson Cockburn, Director of the Royal Laboratory Department; Lieut. Anthony Oldfield, of Royal Artillery; Col Charles Gurnwallis Dansey, Fire Master; Mr. Wm. Caffin, the Deputy Storekeeper of the Laboratory; and three other men employed in the department: but the following answers contains all that can be gleaned from their evidence as to the unfortunate affair. It appeared that the deceased men were employed in breaking up fusees in the shed in which the explosion occurred, which was not a building specially adapted for the purpose. The part of the floor where the men stood was, however, covered over with hides, and the whole of the floor was saturated with water. The mode of breaking up these fusees—the tools for accomplishing which were exhibited to the jury, was as follows:—The tube, about 10 or 12 inches long, is first emptied of the meal powder, which is done by boys. The fusee is then taken to a copper pan, and placed on an iron chisel, when it is struck with a wooden knife by means of a wooden mallet, the fuse is thus cleft open, and the composition falls into a pan prepared for the purpose. The question before the jury was, at what stage of the process the explosion took place? If it was placed in an inverted position, a portion of the meal powder would come in contact with the steel chisel, in which case there was great danger of an explosion. This was not the case, several questions, but the verdict of Accidental death was accidental y in the shed a few minutes b fore the explosion, severe distinctly that he observed the men break the fusees in such positions. The men, it appeared, also worked in sand-shoes. Two men, who had just quitted the shed, experienced a very narrow escape—one of them being blown off a cart that was loading outside the laboratory, the other being severely stunned by the explosion. The jury, after a deliberation of nearly an hour, delivered the following verdict, "That the deceased were killed by the explosion of combustible materials, but from what cause there is no evidence to show." They also accompanied it with the following note, which the Coroner read to Col. Cockburn, the head of the department:—"That the jury, in returning their verdict, in the case of Jones Cleary, beg to state, that without any want of caution to the authorities, in directing the mode of carrying out the work which the deceased was engaged in, at the same time submit their considered opinion that the process of breaking up the fusees is dangerous, and adopting, as formerly, the copper knife; and also that the men ought not to be allowed to work at such employment in walled shoes or boots. The Coroner added, that the precautions must be observed all the same, by means of water, so as to avoid all chance of danger.

TWELVE THOUSAND DOLLARS STOLEN.—The police have received information of the robbery of 12,000 dollars, besides a number of valuable memoranda, supposed to be of considerable value. The property was safe on Monday night, on board the brig Tarquin, Captain Sawtell, from Boston, and was discovered to be missing on the arrival of the vessel off St. Helena's Point. Fortunately, two persons have been apprehended in the captain's cabin, and the vessel was ship of treasure on Monday night, prior to going into dock next day. Two men and a boy, having absconded, are suspected of the robbery.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

GERMANY.—THE RELIGIOUS REFORMATION.—The Frankfort Journal of the 14th inst., contains the following animated account of the Pastor Ronge's reception in that city:—"The Pastor Ronge has arrived in this city, in a carriage covered all over with flowers. From 16 to 20 carriages followed that in which he sat, from Hanau and Offenbach. This cortège, so curious and imposing, was accompanied by thousands of persons, expressing in the most enthusiastic manner. M. Ronge having alighted, was taken to a neighbouring house, at a window of the second story of which he immediately presented himself, and recited another discourse to the immense multitude that thronged to listen to him. He expressed his regret that he could not remain among them—yet, pressed as he was for time, he felt it his duty to express the gratitude he felt on such a reception. He would, however, be back, in a while to return and dwell with them some time. At seven o'clock M. Ronge departed in a post carriage for Stuttgard, amidst the liveliest acclamations of the assembled multitude. It was impossible to approach or even press the hand that was there offered to him while he was seated in his carriage."

SPAIN.—The intelligence from Madrid, to the 11th inst., is of a gloomy character. Universal distrust prevails; the city is kept tranquil solely by military, and on the return of Espartero, would probably be placed in a state of siege. "Two leaders of banditti, named Manuel Sastre, alias El Perdon, and Felippe Perez," says the Heraldo, "have for this day suffered the penalty of the law. The peace of Madrid has not been disturbed, although an immense crowd has attended their execution."

THE WEST INDIES.—The Royal Mail steam packet, Severn, Captain Vincent, has arrived at Southampton, and 43 days before her time, having quitted the bar of the 22nd), and has brought the West India mails. The papers by this ship by vessel, however, contain nothing of importance. The mail brings no later accounts from Mexico than those received by the Tyne. Her Majesty's ship Pique was at Antigua, and her Majesty's steamer Hermes at Port Royal. The Superb, of Liverpool, arrived just as the Severn left Port Royal, Jamaica, on the 23d of August.

EFFECTS OF UNEXPECTED FORTUNE.—Edward Riley, living with his family in Hadlow street, Burton-crescent, having been proved next of kin to Major-General Riley, who recently died at Madras, leaving property to the amount of £250,000, to the whole of which he has become entitled, has, within the last few days, amused the neighbourhood by the following extraordinary freaks. From having been but a workman in the dock-yard in Maiden lane, he has now become a man of independence. On Wednesday he called in his cab upon Mr. Thornhill, tailor, of Seymour-street, and taking him to the dust-yard, desired him to measure the whole of the men in the yard for a suit of clothes, which, being accomplished, he ordered them to go to Mr. Tendan, the bootmaker, where they were all served. On Saturday he directed Mr Shepherd to supply each of them with a joint of meat. Riley has taken a house in Argyle-square, and upon entering it he proposes giving a dinner to all the dustmen in London, and illuminating the front of his house

AWFUL INSTANCE OF SUDDEN DEATH.—On Monday, about half-past four in Mr Moore, a highly respectable auctioneer, residing and carrying on business in Park row, Greenwich, leading to Maze hill, was standing talking to a gentleman at the corner of South street and Blackheath-hill, he was observed suddenly to stagger, and before the person he was talking to could catch him, he fell. Upon being raised he was carried into the shop of Mr. Grey, grocer and oilman, one of the overseers of the parish, where a medical man being sent for, promptly attended, when it was discovered that the deceased had breathed his last. A medical man immediately procured, and the unfortunate deceased was removed to his own house. The deceased was in his seventy fifth year, and much respected by all who knew him, and had filled successively all the parochial offices.—The Jury at the inquest returned a verdict of "Died by the visitation of God."

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

MEETING OF PROPRIETORS OF THE BANK OF ENGLAND.—The Half-yearly Meeting and ordinary Quarterly Court of the Bank Proprietors took place on Thursday, in the Bank Parlour at 12 o'clock. There was a full attendance of Proprietors. Mr. Heath, the Governor, presided. It is generally estimated that on considering the state of the accounts the Directors felt warranted in recommending to the Court of Proprietors that a dividend of 3½ per cent should be declared on the stock. The accounts were now differently made up to what they used to be. They were now made up, not in anticipation of what might be expected, as was the ordinary way, but from actual and positive data, as they should stand on the 28th of February and the 31st of August. After the payment of the dividend (less the income-tax, which amounted to £14,934 3s 4d.), there would be a surplus of £15,351 14s. 8d to be carried to the Rest account, which would make the total amount of the Rest £3,934 378 11s. 4d. He hoped the state of the accounts would be satisfactory to the Proprietors; and although the amount of dividend might not meet the views of some of the Proprietors, it should be borne in mind that money yielded but a small interest at the present time, and, considering the abundance of money which was at present unemployed, he believed that the dividend would, as he hoped, meet the views of the Court. The Chairman's statement was received with approbation by the great body of the Proprietors present. After some conversation, a resolution declaring a dividend of 3½ per cent. was carried unanimously, and the meeting separated.

DINNER AND PRESENTATION OF PLATE TO SIR J. TENNENT.—On Wednesday a complimentary dinner was given by the Kensington Conservatives at Lovegrove's. The Irish Society of London took the initiative in this mark of respect to its founder, and a splendid gold dessert service, value 700 guineas, was presented by his fellow-countrymen in the new colony of Ceylon. Sergeant Murphy, M.P., presided, Dr. Croly filling the vice-chair. Dwarkenauth Tagore, the Indian Prince-banker, attended the meeting, which numbered many distinguished artists, merchants, and literary characters. An admirable address was read by R. Bell, Esq., and feelingly acknowledged by the distinguished guest

THE DOCK ACCIDENTS IN THE LONDON DOCKS.—On Wednesday the new range of tea warehouses recently constructed by the London Dock Company at the west end of the docks were opened with great ceremony. The principal importers, brokers, and dealers in tea, and other merchants of the port of London, connected with the China trade, were invited to inspect the warehouses and partake of a déjeûner, which was provided on the occasion in the upper floor of the warehouses, and presided over by Mr. John Cadbury, the chairman of the company. The shipping in the dock and the warehouses were gaily decorated with the colours of all nations, and a union jack of huge dimensions was hoisted on the top of the new building. The new warehouses have been erected by the dock company for the sole accommodation of the tea trade, at an expense of upwards of £180,000 and are of vast extent, consisting of 30 rooms, and were built by Messrs. W Cubitt and Co. They are 300 feet in length, 100 feet wide, and 68 feet high, and capable of stowing and working 120,000 chests of tea. There are five floors rising one above another, and the roof of each is supported by strong cast-iron pillars, and each floor is divided into four rooms well lighted and divided by thick walls and double iron doors, rendering the whole completely fire proof. The gentlemen present expressed their approval of the arrangements in the highest terms, as capable of affording every possible facility to the tea trade, and likewise contributing to the interests of the dock company. The vaults below the tea warehouses are appropriated for the reception of wines, and some thousands of casks are already deposited there.

SUMMARY OF RAILWAY FACTS.—The Jamaica line, between Spanish Town to Kingston, is completed. The locomotives have been astonishing the natives at the rate of ten miles an hour.—Switzerland is to have railways. The Government of Belgium will be opened; but that the portion of the line from Amiens to Valenciennes, with the branch line to Lille is in such a forward state that in eight months from the present time it will be completed and finished and in full operation.——A new line from Windsor to London is contemplated. It is to proceed from Windsor to Staines, with a branch from Datchet to join the Great Western Railway at Slough. The adoption of this principle is to be adopted——A correspondent of the Times makes the following calculation of Railway progress up to the present day: 74 rai.ways completed, or in course of completion, for which bills had been passed previous to last session, £103,166,920 Branches projected by the foregoing companies requiring a further outlay of £35,000,000. 707 new companies, including those who obtained acts in the last session, and projected in the United Kingdom, projected up to this date, £464,698,856. Capita., £92,956,876. This is independent of the enormous sum which it is proposed to invest in foreign and colonial railways.——The Journal des Debats de Fer announces that the railroads remaining to be adjudicated will probably be disposed of in the following order:—1. The lines from Paris to Strasburg, and Tours, and Nantes, towards the latter end of October. 2 The Creil and St. Quentin, in the first fortnight of November. 3. The Paris and Lyons, and Lyons and Avignon roads, towards the middle of December.——The Great Grimsby, the Sheffield and Lincolnshire, and the East Lincolnshire Railways have amalgamated at par with the Sheffield and Manchester Railway; the last-mentioned railway paying five per cent. on all sums upon the three railways until they are made, which will be in three years.——The French, Bavarian, and Prussian Governments have finally made arrangements re-pecting the junction of the Lewis (Bavarian) Railway with the French frontiers by Metz and Saarbruck.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

TERRIFIC ACCIDENT IN THE ROYAL ARSENAL AT WOOLWICH.—

SEVEN PERSONS KILLED.

An appalling accident took place on Wednesday morning in the Royal Arsenal, at Woolwich, involving the sacrifice of no less than seven lives

The following are the particulars:—A few minutes before 10 o'clock a loud explosion was heard in the laboratory department, at a building known as No 1, Breaking up Shed. Assistance was immediately at hand, the men rushing from various parts of the department to the spot. As soon as ingress could be obtained, a fearful spectacle presented itself to the investigators behind the door, crowded together in a confused heap, lay the scorched bodies of five men and two boys. These were immediately removed to an adjacent shed.

The building being on fire, the alarm bell was rung, and the engines from the different departments, with the Royal Sappers and Miners and Royal Artillery were speedily on the spot.

The flames, by the exertions of the men, were soon subdued, their ravages being confined to the building, the roof of which had been already blown off, and some slight damage done to the roof of an adjoining building. It would appear, from what has been gleaned in other parts of the same department, for not one of the unfortunate beings in the devoted building has escaped to furnish any information, that the explosion took place at the time, employed in breaking up rockets, and, through some friction, the whole mass accidentally ignited, thus at once consigning seven unfortunate individuals to instant destruction.

The names of the persons who thus lost their lives are John Craike, master, aged 52, rocket maker, and one of the oldest servants in the department; Henry Button, an expert pyrotechnic, aged but a young man, Henry Butters, a young married man; Robert Burbage, and Michael Purtel. Four of these were what is called laboratory men. In addition to these, two boys named Leonard and Arthur Webb, R.E., employed to pull down the remaining parts of the shed, many of which were in a dangerous state. The remains of a dog were discovered in one corner of the building. It is the opinion of medical men that suffocation by carbonic acid gas was the cause of death, and that the disfigurement by fire took place after wards.

THE RECENT FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE BIRMINGHAM AND BRISTOL RAILWAY.

The adjourned inquest on the bodies of the unfortunate men who recently lost their lives on the Birmingham and Bristol Line was resumed on Monday morning, at Bedford, before C. Best, Esq. The most important evidence was that of James Bair, the stoker of the goods train, who said I belong to Scotland, and am a stoker on the B istol and Birmingham line. I knew Joseph Ward when living He was driver of engine No. 2 on that line. I was stoker to that engine. We left Gloucester on the night of the 30th of August, just after the mail left, leaving about nine o'clock. We had twenty trucks, eighteen of them loaded and two empty. We had wood and iron rails. Coming to Bredon, the pumps of the engine rather filled. Ward would not let me put more fire to the engine, because he thought we would need to put it out. Towards Evesham he said the pumps were working very well, and there did not appear to be any fire put on. I did so Coming to Defford station, and on passing Ward said there was something wrong He then shut off the steam Immediately afterwards I was thrown on the ground, and do not recollect what then took place, till I found some one pulling at me Ward was sober when we left Gloucester. We took water at Cheltenham, staying there about ten minutes. On approaching Defford, I saw no signal lights, as my head was down, attending to the fire all the way from Eckington to Defford. On passing Defford road Bridge, I saw no signals. I suppose he saw the truck when he said there was something wrong. I did not see the truck. I do not know on what part of the train the guard was. Ward was a steady driver. He has never neglected signals, that I know of. We were not going very fast when we left Cheltenham. We had been going about thirty miles an hour before the pumps were out of order, but I cannot say what pace it was at Defford. Between Bredon and Defford the steam was twice let off, on account of the pumps not working. The witness was present to define the exact rate of speed, but at first declared rather warmly that he could not, though at length he said it might have been thirty miles an hour! It is, in many instances, the duty of the guard, and in others that of the driver, to inquire at the stations what time other trains have left. I saw the mail train leave Gloucester. We had no wish to be before that train, as we were ordered to stop till that had gone forward. I did not notice any lamps at the rear of that tram, for I did not look. Ward said nothing to me about having seen signal lights. I there had been lights in a proper place, he must have seen them.

Mr Mowell, the engineer, was next called, and gave a very good character to Ward, the driver of the engine

Benjamin Giles, the stoker of the passenger train, was next examined, and deposed: I live at Bromsgrove, and was a stoker in the employ of the Bristol and Birmingham Company. On the night of the 30th of August I was on the quarter to eight train from Birmingham to Gloucester. Joseph Pickering was the driver. There were six carriages. When we came to where the repairs were begun, we had to stop till the up mail train passed. We then went on at a tolerable speed. At Wadborough we stayed, and also at Bedford. When we came in sight of Bedford station, the driver shut off the steam. I saw the red light on the platform. I put on my break, and, on turning myself round, saw something in the road, steaming. I saw Pickering reversed our engine, and I ran to the hind to jump off. We both jumped off. A collision then took place, and I found that my arm was out of its socket, whereupon I went to the station. The red light was there, and the driver also. Our driver was sober We were after our time, on account of stopping for the mail. I saw nothing of Miles (deceased) till we came to the station house. I saw nothing of Joseph Ward at any time.

The driver's witness was examined, and the inquiry was then adjourned till Wednesday.

On Wednesday morning the Coroner and jury re assembled. The first witness called was

Joseph Bromage, an agricultural labourer, residing at Defford. I heard of the accident, he said, and saw John Murphy about the line on that night. I was waiting for the third class train to go from Eckington, as my master was ill, and while waiting I saw John Murphy with his light; but he was gone before the train came up. His was waiting for the down train, I think. I was standing on the platform when the express down train came in. Soon after I saw a tram coming up loaded with iron. It was coming as fast as I ever saw one go on this line. That tram passed the station, and the engine was upset, and turned on its side. The other engine (the down train) I saw thrown across the "metals" (the rails). It was all in a minute. I saw no empty truck standing, but it was a dark night. I saw one of the carriages on fire. I saw the passenger (down) train. Some of its carriages were knocked to pieces, two I think. I saw one on fire. I did not render assistance to any of the passengers. I saw no other light than Murphy's till afterwards. The station lamps on the platform were lit. I was on the platform several minutes before the luggage train came up. If there had been a lamp placed on the opposite platform I might not have seen it; I did not see it. I saw no light near the bridge. There might have been one. I did not see Murphy when the accident took place, and do not recollect hearing any whistle. I did not see the driver of the goods train, as I did not take much notice. It was not particularly dark. I know Mr. Dore, who resides at the station-house. I had the ticket from him several minutes before the train came up. I received it in the office. He could see the railway from the door, but not from the counter, I think.

The Coroner here stated he wished to elicit whether Mr. Dore, as the signal master, was doing his duty. It had, however, been proved that when Mr. Dore went in to give the ticket, he was not at the platform.

By Mr Whateley.—There might have been twenty lights on the bridge towards Eckington, and I not have seen them.

By the Coroner.—When the last coach is up can't see up and down, for you can't see through the end of it. If a man had been at the bridge I could not have seen him. I was quite sober. I could not have seen a man if he had been waving his light towards Eckington.

Testimonials as to the excellent character of Ward (one of the deceased) were handed in by Mr Sanders, the secretary to the company They were unanimously to the effect that he was a steady driver, and could be trusted in consequence of the length of time that had elapsed since they were written. There was no doubt of their authenticity.

Mr. Mowell was also said he had additional evidence of the signal light having been placed on the mail train; but before the witness was sworn Mr. M'Connell wished to explain some part of his previous evidence by stating that he did not think thirty miles an hour a dangerous rate of speed, but that he did not recommend more than twenty miles.

By the Foreman:—When the engine-driver is attending to his business he is enabled to keep a good look out, though I admit a driver should be watched there for the purpose of looking out would be an advantage and a precaution; there would, however, be disadvantages connected with it. All active drivers are enabled to look out. The place for such a third person, if appointed, would be on the front of the first carriage.

Mr. Charles Mealen, of Pershore, sworn. I am a market gardener, and frequently bring vegetables to this station. I know Mr. Dore, the superintendent there. In a conversation with him he has said that Joseph Ward has passed by the signals. (This line of evidence, however, was stopped, as inadmissible.) I have had occasion to convey goods not being properly transmitted. I wrote to Mr. Payn, the manager, at Birmingham, but never had an answer. I have known the goods trains frequently behind time.

Mr. Dore, the superintendent, was next called, and Mr. Mealen repeated, in his presence, that Mr Dore had told him of Ward's neglect of signals, in defiance of the rules. Mr. Whateley put no questions or explanations, as he said it was not evidence. Mr Dore was then sworn. He said:—I recollect the special goods train coming in on the night of the 30th of August. I cannot recollect whether there was any lamp attached to the end to signify that another special train was arriving. I did not see one behind the mail train, as I was in the office. There ought to, and may have been, a lamp behind the goods train, as well as behind the mail; but we never have prepared for any train that was to come up. I never had occasion to report Joseph Ward. I did not know the man. I never mentioned Ward's name to the last witness I have mentioned other men.

By the Jury. I am sorry to say that signals have been disregarded. I remember five or six occasions in about a year and a half. I have not in all instances reported engine drivers, as I have done so on many occasions I had received no answer. But my impression was that my reports had not reached the proper quarter, as in general, on minor matters, I have been attended to. My reasons for not reporting every instance was, that my reports had only got circulated among the guards and others, and made me obnoxious to them. The reports had not got to the proper quarter. Some of them I had addressed to Mr. Humphrey Brown, and others to Mr. M'Connell, who succeeded him. I cannot state the names of the drivers I reported. I merely gave the No. of the engine, and the time I sent the reports by the guard of a following train.

After some further evidence, the jury gave a verdict of "Accidental death" in both cases, with a Deodand of £1500 (the value of the engine, as stated by Mr. M'Connell), on the luggage engine driven by Ward.

ALARMING COLLISION ON THE MIDLAND RAILWAY.—On Wednesday a collision took place at the Oakenshaw (Wakefield) station, on the Midland Railway, fortunately, no serious injury to the passengers has ensued, but, under other circumstances, the loss of life must have been fearful. The train from Leeds to Derby, which was due at half-past 8 A.M., did not arrive until twenty minutes after its time, and there being a great number of passengers going from Oakenshaw to Swinton (Doncaster) station, on account of the races, at least twenty minutes more elapsed without any appearance of moving on. At this juncture the train from Hull came up, following on the same rails, and dashed into the carriages of the Derby train. Most providentially several of the other carriages of the Derby train had been drawn off from the main body to admit of others being placed intermediate. These carriages received the blow; but having some space to be driven forward before they struck the other portion of the train, the severity of the collision was very materially checked. However, the shock in the carriages most removed was severely felt Several persons sustained severe cuts and bruises, and the greatest alarm was occasioned to all. In one carriage was a lady with eight young children, the eldest evidently not more than thirteen years of age, and her husband and one daughter were on the platform. Prince George of Cambridge was in the same carriage as the lady, at the extreme end of the Hull train, so that he would certainly have suffered severely, if he had not been killed, had the concussion been more violent. His Royal Highness fortunately did not receive any particular inconvenience, but he, like everybody else, looked extremely pale.

MELANCHOLY DEATH OF MRS. TREGARLD.—This lady, so well known for the sporting world, especially by those who hunt with the Queen's hounds, died on Saturday morning, at eight o'clock, in consequence of an injury she received on the previous day, by a fall from her horse.

LAMENTABLE AFFAIR AT YARMOUTH.—A sad event occurred at Yarmouth on Sunday night. A poor half witted fellow took it into his head that he would not get his donkey home unless he put his white shirt on over his other clothes, to frighten it. He did so, and, unfortunately, he frightened the wife of a drunken, dissipated character in the town, who beat him so severely that the poor fellow died next day.

SKETCHES IN SPAIN.—THE PRADO, AT MADRID.

SPANISH LADIES.

MANOLAS.

We now present to our readers the "first fruits" of our Artist's recent sojourn in Spain, with the view of illustrating the Social Life of Spain and Spaniards. Every town and district of this remarkable country is rife with peculiarities of that endless variety which makes up human character. We commence with Madrid, which has been described as "the fit capital of a country of anomalies;" and start with a few of the

COSTUMES OF THE PRADO.

The Prado (the meadow) is the Hyde Park of Madrid; for horsemen and carriages, and nigh fashion. It may, indeed, be said that the Madridmes spend half their lives here. Strange as it still appears, it is, however, sadly fallen off from the good old times before the fatal invasion and the nuevo progreso; every afternoon the march of trans-Pyrenean intellect is crushing some national costume and custom. Except the mantillas of half the number of ladies, you will find few traces of the national Spanish costume and character; such is the rage for Parisian fashions.

You rarely meet with a manola; and, as to the caballeros, in cloak and sombrero, it is nearly all over with them. Pilot coats, or in summer, the elegant opera toilette, are indispensable: the Spanish gentlemen will almost starve to assume a fine appearance, and to show himself on the Prado, from 3 to 5 o'clock in winter; and from 8 to 12 in summer. The great number of military or Government officers in uniform somewhat relieve the monotony of the black coats and round hats. Our artist emphatically adds: "Mark! the Spanish are the most servile copyists of the Paris fashions; and any of the engravings in Tailors' Journals, that you see in the windows in London, will give you a complete idea of the dress of the male population of Madrid: without any restriction, everybody here dresses well—at least, with great pretension." Still, we are enabled to select a few exceptions—a few wrecks from this denationalization of the Prado, the mirror of Madrid.

One of the groups of promenaders represents the costumes of the upper classes, in which the mantilla plays its accustomed part. It is kept in its proper place by the fan, abanico, which is part and parcel of every Spanish woman, whose nice conduct of it leaves nothing to be desired. No one understands the art and exercise of it like her: she can express with her dumb fan nearly as much as Paganini could with his fiddlestick, and a hand-book might be written to explain its code of signals. A frulling sound, like the chattering of birds in a cage, reigns in every direction, produced by the tremulous shake, and opening and shutting of innumerable fans of all colours and sizes, so many eloquent tongues speaking an intelligible language to conscious observers.

Even as flowers are "the language of love" in the East, there is nothing in the soft science which may not be explained by a Spanish lady with her fan. Deprive her of her fan and white handkerchief, and she loses her self-possession and half her fascination. She is, if young, a fairy without her wand; if old, a witch without her broomstick. Hundreds of light, supple forms keep up their graceful elastic step for two or three hours together, regardless alike of the dust and heat, and shoes a great deal too tight, even for their diminutive feet, proving that vanity suffers no pain. "Que pie hermoso! Que chiquitito!" (What a lovely foot! What a little bit of a thing!) whispered by a cavalier as he passes, more than repays their cramps and agony.

The manolas (grisettes) display another variety in their kerchiefed heads, and the shawl, corresponding, if we mistake not, with the mantillas. They are, however, rarely seen in the Prado.

But the best characteristics will be found in the two groups of wet-nurses, of whom there are hundreds in the Prado promenade. "Fat wet-nurses," says a recent tourist, "from the mountains of Santander, with showy handkerchiefs tied about their heads, tight cloth jackets, and gorgeous laced petticoats, frequent this place with their squalling charges; not to mention the juvenile gambols of a crowd of little angels of both sexes." There is something peculiarly aboriginal in the mode of carrying the child, swung in a sort of fringed cot at the back; it reminds one of the North American Indian custom. This sisterhood of nurses are said to be fast disappearing.

As might be expected, the national sport of the Bull-fight is a grand opportunity for costume; as seen in the next Illustration, which likewise shows one of the modes of going to the fight. Nothing can exceed the gaiety and sparkle of a Spanish public going, eager and full-dressed, to the fight.

The remaining Illustration presents a Grand Review of Cavalry and Infantry, in the Court-yard of the New Palace at Madrid; her Majesty and suite witnessing the spectacle from the balcony of one of the principal windows of the palace. As they defile, the troops salute her Majesty with long-repeated shouts, waving of swords, &c., in token of their loyalty and attachment to their Sovereign.

GOING TO THE BULL FIGHT.

OTELLO.

A TALE OF THE OPERA.

The overture had begun when he entered; he threw himself on a seat from whence he could observe the Princess' box

In it she sat—all of her rank and beauty, the Princess Sophia was seated by her mother's side; her eyes sparkled with delight; her open brow was the seat of contentment and happiness; a sweet smile played round her finely-moulded lips, probably the excuse-lon of the pleasure she felt in having her whole attention engrossed by the opera was to be performed, that it was "Otello" which had crowded the house to overflowing with such a brilliant audience. At intervals, she turned her glass, and surveyed the company, as if she were trying to single out some one from among the mass. Those guileless heart, thus flattered in vain; they glances will rest on him no more; those ear will never catch the sound of his footstep—all vainly thou turnest that beautiful head to the opening door, that tall and manly figure will never cross that threshold again!

She took her glass; a slight cloud of disappointed expectation gathered over her fair face, and knit her brows together with a nearly perceptible frown She grew thoughtful, and rested her hand on the front of the box, looking down into the country for a few days."

Sophia grew pale as she spoke; "Gone! not in the theatre! Where can business have called him so suddenly? Do you think he would have left without seeing us? No, no, this is some lover between you; and now I can guess why a certain note has been delivered to me."

The Major saw the worst was at hand, and had nearly sank into the seat beside him: "A note!" said he, in a voice of terror, "Sophia! you never received—you could not!" but she smiled, and, turning over the leaves of her book, drew out a small piece of paper peeping from beneath the bread Jewelled bracelet that encircled her beautiful arm; "A note she must have slipped mysteriously into my hand, you can see by your eyes that you are in the plot. I have not yet been able to open it, but as soon as I return"—

"Your Highness, I implore you, in the name of Heaven, to give me that paper. It was not meant for you—it is entirely a mistake."

"Indeed! then it is so much the better; accidents are always more interesting than designs. I would not give it up for the world. I will perhaps explain some mysteries about certain people we know. At all events, I am sure it was meant for a lady: it is real delightful to think it came to my hands."

The Major would have made light of her to give up the paper; but the Prince thrust his large head between them, and the two Generals broke in with a set of common-place questions that produced an equal number of common-place answers. The Major was obliged to fall back. Pursued by the darkest fears, he returned to his own box. He covered his eyes with his hands, to shut out the sight of the fair being whom he saw standing on the brink of an abyss without the power of saving her; his misery was complete. He could not think, and sank over every gesture. The diamonds of her bracelet sparkled with a brilliancy of a thousand colours; their beams seems to pierce the recesses of the Major's box and went to his heart like stinging serpents. "What suffering and sorrow those sparkling gems conceal! When she unclasps them in the solitude of her chamber she will unlock a fragility, mystery! Her pulse beats against the worthless bauble with terrible knowledge, even as I have been a party to the interview she received! I will not stand still when she breaks the seal, and casts her eye upon that which will dim the starlight smile of her youth with the darkness of misery and tears."

The voice of Desdemona rose to the notes of the harp: the mournful chords thrilled through the silent house, and the first words were heard of that lay, which, to the gentle Venetian, was a real song of the Swan. It is with what wonderful power this air—so sad, so melancholy—penetrates every soul! So simple, so child-like in its melody—yet so deeply tragic in its effect! The heart of the listener feels heavy and oppressed; he anticipates the coming of some dread event; he imagines, in the distance, the stealthy tread of the murderer, he feels that irresistible hand of destiny stretching over a all, and casting on beauty, and innocent a and love, the dark, withering shadow of death. She tells it not; gentle, guileless as an infant, she sits at her harp heavenness and sorrow should glide the impulse of her song; she breathes the words of love for him who is to be her death-yet! she will call to her side the very one who will come—to slay her! She prays for him, who, in the moment of agony, will answer her—with a curse!

The Major looked from the singer to the Princess. She was listening, rapt in thought, to the air; tears hung in her eye sashes; she wept unknowingly over her own ruin. The chords of the harp died away; she gazed before her as in a dream. "If I die, let it be my song of fate when," seem to ring in Major's ear. "Truly did she speak," he said; "it is the dying song of her happiness.

Otello is heard. Desdemona's handkerchief, the token presented to her lover, she looked down at her bracelet, and played with the chain. A fearful music seemed to chase away the face of recent sorrow: she threw a rapid glance round her; but Major watched every movement, and saw her unclasp the jewelled paper as it had it in her handkerchief: he thought he could perceive her break the seal, and, to regain, her box and rushed along the corridor. He knew not what power impelled him to the Princess' box. He was on only a few steps from it, when the door was suddenly thrown open. A sound of many voices issued from it—attendants and ladies in waiting appeared, bearing a lifeless figure in their arms. He looked and the question he scarcely dared to ask, and received as the answer "The Princess Sophia has suddenly fainted!"

IX

Three or four days after this accident, Major Laurun was sitting alone, gloomy with the thoughts that oppressed him, in his chamber. His head rested on his hand, his eyes bent on the ground, from time to time a tear gathered in them—though they had long been strangers to the hard old soldier. He thought of the dark destiny, in whose meshes he had himself become entangled; he could trace all the threads which, invisible to others, were yet so strongly knotted together; he saw how they were spun from afar off—how they gradually gathered together, and entwined with each other, till they formed but too strong a net around a delicate and gentle creature, dragging her down to misery. Laurun felt the bitterness and hatred mingled with these sombre meditations: his comrade, his companion in arms, once the brightest star in the horizon of fame, and one of the bravest, were all were brave in the field, had become debased into a being without word, conscience, or honour—the betrayer of a loving and trusting girl her form, too, would mix itself up with these thoughts; and he was compelled to think how he should pass through the sad scene which he knew he was about to encounter.

The first lady in attendance on the Princess, had that morning called to know what report her child was enjoying. She had been informed that Sophia was ill—that the physicians gave but little hope of a favourable result, for they considered her malady to be a violent nervous affection. She said further, that the Princess had told her of—she had entrusted her with a secret of the utmost importance. The Princess was aware that there was only one man in the city, who had been intimately acquainted with Zrono ieski—and that he was Major Laurun She had, therefore, in the anguish of a long sick bed, begged the attendant to make her confidante to seek out the Major, bring him to the palace, and permit her to speak with him for a few minutes, alone. The courtly dame knew how grievous a violation that would be of all the rules of etiquette; but the sight of the interesting girl, who seemed to look forward to this interview as her last hope on earth, banished her scruples, and she had sent a message to the Major, desiring him to be at the palace that evening, at nine o'clock. She might admit him to the apartment of the Princess, unknown to the other attendants.

The Major had not refused to go; he knew he could tell her nothing consolatory; but he felt, such a child of affliction, the longing for sympathy from some one becomes overpowering.

Yet what should he say? It was of this he sat thinking, alone, in his chamber When a message was brought to him requesting the events of, a last days, would [illegible] to accelerate her [illegible] plunged in thought, when a servant announced, that the carriage, which was to take him to the palace, was waiting for him. The Princess' attendant was in carriage, he took a seat beside her, and they proceeded some distance in silence.

"You will find the Princess very ill," said the Lady at last; "I have given up hope. I cannot think that any thing you can have to communicate to her, will produce any improvement. If you have no consolation to give her, you shall expire like a lamp which has lost that which fed its flame. And even if you could raise her spirits, and yet give her hope, the white effigy of death is fortunate, that I could almost wish she might die, rather than bring her Royal line to shame."

"And is it death that my tidings will bear to her," said the Major, with a bitter [illegible] what did they [illegible]

"The family, the court, and the city, know [illegible] nor, Major, except that the Princess must have caught cold. The foolish people are talking about the fatal sports—and raking up old stories about it—and my she is dying of thello! What are both know, Major, is known to none besides, there are several ladies who have for some time suspected the attachment, but could not be certain of it."

"And I fear," said the Major, as he threw a piercing glance at the attendant—"I fear she is dying by treachery! This attachment has been suspected, traced out, made a certainty—a separation has been attempted—the circumstances of the Count have been enquired into"

"Do you think so?" said the lady, the colour forsaking her cheek, and her lip quivering, as she tried to avoid the Major's eye.

"A separation has been determined on, at all hazards. The plan has been to drive the Count from the city by threatening to tell the Princess that he was already married. To this point the scheme was not a bad one; the villain deserved no less than to be met by treachery. But, unhappily, they wished to cure the poor girl so abruptly of her affection: they have suddenly told her the secret of the Count, thinking the passion would be forgotten in a day. Their zeal and pride have blinded them. They can might have done for the nerves of a dragoon, but it is rare carried it into effect on a delicate girl."

"I beg you will remember," said the attendant, with her usual coldness of manner, "that this delicate girl is a daughter of the princely house, and was brought up with ideas far above a sense of connection. Even if such a plan has been formed, I cannot condemn it, had it been a little better managed."

"What could you do?" said the Major, fiercely. "You have gained your point; the Princess will die"—

"I have gained my point," said the lady, indignantly. "I beg, Sir"—

"You!" replied the Major, impatiently: "I meant not yourself; I meant those who did it—those who have brought it about."

The lady bit her lip and was silent. A few moments afterwards they stopped at a side door of the palace.

An old servant led them through a labyrinth of corridors and staircases. At last the passages grew wider, and were better lighted; and the Major remarked that they entered one of the principal wings of the palace. The servant offered the Major to a side door: he passed through several other rooms, till he arrived at a saloon, which appeared to belong to the apartments of the Princess. The lady requested the Major to take a seat for a short time, till she called him.

The Major waited a long and weary while, and the lady again appeared. She told him that, in consequence of the earnest prayer of the Princess, he would see her alone; that she begged him not to prolong the interview more than a quarter of an hour. She would wait in the ante-room, where, unless they spoke very loud, nothing could be heard.

The theatres have, during the past week, remained in a state of perfect quiescence as far as any novelty is concerned. Indeed, they have nearly exhausted its variety, and are now resting, upon the impetus derived from their exertions, to carry them on to the renaissance of the dramatic world upon the return of the fashionable season to London; as an engineer rests for a time, when he finds there is "way" enough on the train to carry it on to the next station; and then, when there is a fresh access of passengers, it will be let on again.

The prospects of the approaching season at DRURY LANE has been issued—and from it we learn that opera and ballet will form, as heretofore, the staple entertainments of the establishment. Two novelties will be produced, and we remarked, that a theatre, however specious may be the prospectus of a manager cunning in literature, is a more commercial speculation, undertaken by an individual who, ascertaining how much a house will hold when full, over the current expenses of the establishment, strives to put forward that style of entertainment which is most likely to place the entrepreneur in a secure position. Clever literary men, with free admission, who can command heavy-sounding words, write much about the elevation of the popular mind and the influence of the drama—common-place, ordinary people, who pay their money to be pleasantly entertained for an hour or two, which appears to be the chief end of theatres, go where they think the best amusement is offered at the price, whether it be dramatic, musical, or terpsichorean. All other speculations on the subject will be found to be more or less conventional

But we must return to Drury Lane; promising, however, that the foregoing remarks are not intended to apply more to that establishment than to any other We are to have, in the operatic dep rtment, for tenors, Messrs. Harrison and Allen, with some useful second-rate auxiliaries; for basses and baritones, Messrs H. Phillips, Borrani, Bennett, and Weiss; for soprani and contralti, Madame Anna Thil on. Mollie Jenny Lind, who has turned all the heads in Berlin, Miss Romer, Miss Rainforth, Miss Poole, and a Miss Helen Lane. Donizetti, Meyerbeer, Benedict, and Wallace, a great name well known in the musical world, are among the composers of the operas to be produced M. Adolphe Adam also has written the music of a ballet, in which department we find several new names, Mdlle. Adèle Dumilâtre is to appear, having quitted the Italian opera.

The HAYMARKET has been doing tolerably well The "False Mr. Pope" has been judiciously improved, and now goes through at with roars of laughter Mr. John Parry is to make his first appearance there. She will now be able to understand the bathos of the composition, speaking the mock pathe to lines As if she had been a subscriber to Mr. Mitchell's Classics; and consequently much pleased. Miss Reynolds has a youth and beauty on her side, and could write voice, which proper training would render still more effective. She was encored in the parody on the "Casta Diva" Pasquale" serenade; and the same compliment was paid to her duet sing with Mrs Keeley; and she was called before the curtain, at the conclusion of the piece, which has been revived with great care The orphan es, generally, are to be locked—both a, and the fostern lale, is a great point; and the dresses sufficiently gaudy to no p the ensemble. The houses have been very good.

Mr W. H. Lacy and Mr. Honner are both in treaty for the CITY THEATRE, and we hear that M. Philippe has taken the STRAND, for his "Soirées Ayst-rieuses" An interesting amateur performance will take place this evening, at MISS ELIZA BERKLEY'S (Mrs. Mellis, &c.) The opening piece will be, a drama by Mr E. L Blanchard, called "The Queen of Bohemia; or, London in 1664"—and a mythological bur esque by Mr. Leman Rede, entitled "The Boyhood of Bacchus"

We regret to announce the death of Mr Benson Hill, a gentleman long known to the theatrical and literary profession.

THE LAY OF THE LEGER,

A GRAND DON CASTER BALLAD.

The Leger—l on of the wees,
Was all the sporting go,
But ah, the rain fell fast from clouds
As black as any sloe!

You dare not stand without your hat,
Amid a storm so dreaded,
For who would have the head to bear
His pelting al. bury stead!

A jockey scarce would take one off,
Even to salute his master,
So all who could a Castor don,
Did don it at Doncaster!

Still much the rain annoyed them all,
Those sporty g birds of feather,
As drake will say to Mother-bit,
Are Sorrby bit by weather!

The people who to races go
Will understand us fully,
When we say the course was like a ditch,
And a ditch like a gully.

But Gully ditch and Gully man,
Have quite a different sense,
The last is like an Author, and Knows how to make a book.

A cash book tho' at that he digs
An hand as any credgey
A cash-book which he still contrives
To balance with his leger!

Now let us see what Leger did,
The suspect while we are on,
The race was not a berrow, I
For it was won by Baron

Ful. well the jockey swept the course
No riding could be subtler,
A Job no one yet derived
More service from his Butler.

Holmes was Miss Sarah's whipper in,
And claim'd a second's glories;
But by Billy Holmes was whipper-in
For years or all the Tories!

If, spun sweet Miss Sarah's name,
We wish'd to make a sally,
We'd say, in reference to her "go,"
That Sally was the "belle!"

Poets are jockeys now a-days,
(A proof that verses are low),
Sir Bulwer and Paulina rode
By Barham and by Barlow!

Lane Fox's June, too, took a start,
And ran, if we remember,
Just, reader, only fancy, June
A-running in September.

And June, for rider has contrived,
A little Joy to borrow—
Who loses—so the joy of June
Becomes in September sorrow.

Maroon was not the son to Mar
His racing—with the tail,
Is, being forth comin. higher up,
A sing fourth with Innandale!

From this Old English Leger race,
Old England's was away,
So sa. Day, his rider, didn't ride,
He didn't win the Derby!

MUSIC.

THE NORWICH MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

NORWICH, Monday.

This great meeting is always regarded as a musical event. The profits are devoted to the hospitals, dispensaries, and infirmaries of the county of Norfolk: thus, every town has an interest in the support of the Festival; during the continuance of which, the Bishop of Norwich and the leading nobility and gentry keep open house; and hospitality on the part of the townsmen is also unbounded. The Directors of the Eastern Counties and Norfolk Railroads have made liberal arrangements for the accommodation of visitors, and there is every probability of an immense attendance. The direction of the musical arrangements, this year, falls on Jules Benedict, the composer and pianist. At previous festivals, Professor E. Taylor had the conductorship, and amateurs had reason to complain of a monopoly of Spohr. True, several great works of that distinguished composer have been first produced in that town; but there is a number second-rate mind whose star is now in the ascendant, and whose productions have been equally wanted for. We allude to Mendelssohn, whose compositions have been unaccountably bur ied at Norwich, until M Benedict has assumed the baton. We may hope, from this salutary change, that the oratorio of "Paul" will, in the next festival, find its legitimate place in the programme. The rehearsal to-day has been satisfactory. Benedict will have the work properly done, and he is right. Rehearsals are too often neglected in this country, from the facility of playing at sight obtained by our executants, who forget that something more is required than the mere mechanical execution of the notes.

The orchestra numbers 114, led by T. Cooke, and amongst them are Lindley, Harper, G. Cooke, Howell, Williams, Pizzi, Baumann, Lazarus, &c. The chorus consists of 84 trebles, 50 altos, 68 tenors, and 70 basses, numerically strong, but sadly wanting in delicacy. The principal singers are Madame Grisi, Miss Dolby, Madame Caradori Allan, Miss Poole; Signor Mario, Signor F. Lablache, Herr Standigl, Messrs. Hobbs, Hawkins, Machin, and Bradbury. The omission of two such names as Mr. H. Phillips and Miss Hawes, on a festival where sacred music occupies such a prominent part, is a great mistake. In this school, these two singers are unrivalled, and their loss in Handel's oratorios cannot be supplied by any continental celebrities. The opening night's selection was Spohr's "Calvary," were rehearsed to day. The last is a ponderous production, replete with learning, but without a particle of that sublimity with which Handel would have clothed the principal incidents in the Saviour's great. Haydn's Seasons, and Dolby sang the "Cujus animam," and Staudigl the "Pro peccati." Grisi was a soulless in the "Inflammatus," and the quintet, without accompaniment, "Quando corpus," was finely given by Grisi, Miss Dolby, Mario, and Signor F. Lablache.

The programme of last night's Concert opened with a selection from Mozart's "Don Juan." Mario was received in "Il mio tesoro," as were Camoleri and Lablache, in "La ci darem." Staudigl as our Leporello's music capitulo. Beethoven's Symphony in A, No. 8, commenced the second part, in grand style. The movement under the sole time was familiar. Grisi was encored in "Di placer mi balza il cor," and Staudigl, in "Rudine than the Cherry;" and Miss Dolby, in a Scotch air, "It is come," from the "Puritani," was also encored a second time. A March and Chorus from Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens," excited also, some sensation.

The Festival, as regards the expenditure, is considered as quite safe. If we will, indeed, be a small surplus—an agreeable fact for the responsible stewards.

A RAMBLE IN THE REALMS OF CHAT.

Whatever may be said of the Andover Union, there is certainly no union in Andover. The place is set by the ears; if the poor had bones to pick by themselves, the people have now bones to pick with each other where it was once all "marrying" it is now all wrangling. With Commissioner Parker it is all "barker"—with Missing the barrister, it is all hitting—with Curtis the attorney, the snarling provokes you to exclaim "what a Cur tis!" The rage of the workhouse is worse than the odi P. of the play-house—the rage of the master is beyond all mastery—of the governor quite ungovernable—of the guardians, altogether unguarded—while Mr. Westlake, in the elicited disclosures, has painted more naked tru ths, than Mr. East.ake ever painted naked figures—which is saying that one has prosecuted his inquiry as ardently as the other has prosecuted his art—a compliment equally complimentary to both. But, whatever we think of the Andover prosecution, we know of nothing more unseemly than its defence. Motives impugned—decisions one-sided—admissible evidence rejected—inadmissible evidence received—crimination and recrimination—these are, surely, not the proper elements of a Court of Justice; and, last of all, the vacillation of the Poor law Commissioners is even more detestable than the partiality of their official—the swagger of their guardians—the cruelties of their master, and the wholesale impertinence of his counsel and his attorney. Charges are brought, enquiry is ordered; the charges are proved and the enquiry stopped. Then Somerset House seeks to take refuge behind the alternative of an indictment for any one offence of a servant who has committed many; then this wickedness of evasion is scouted by the public and the press: then Somerset House retracts itself again, and now the enquiry is re-instituted, and the evidence for the defence is going on. This writhing among the toils of a very serious dilemma proves to the public that they are ill at ease with their case, at the same time that it disgusts them by its manifest evasion of justice. A solemn tragedy of suffering has thus initiated a solemn farce.

Now let us consid*e de quelque autre chose.*

A morning paper very properly remarks upon the immense inconvenience and absurdity of a practice now becoming legally alarming upon the circuits of assize—that of referring the most important cases to arbitration, which most expensive preparations have been made to submit to a jury, simply because they may happen to be trammelled by questions of account. Let us "galetize this gravity," and put the point "chit chattishly" to our readers.

THE FARCE OF ARBITRATION

We'll commence at once, by supposing in song
That plaintiff has suffered a terrible wrong;
Robb'd on the right,
Robb'd on the left,
In a manner that isn't removed from theft.
Foines and frauds, the dape of a lease,
With thousands and thousands at stake on the issue.

Well! the alternative's not very nice;
He goes to his lawyer all in a trice—
Gives to counsellors—serves the writ—
Recovers the money?—the devil a bit!
Defendant waits for the occasion,
Then puts himself on the "truth of the nation;"
Employs his case,
The plaintiff to tease
With half a hundred impossible pleas;
Bottles a phial
Of wrath for the trial,
Begging his counsel of course to deny all
Right of the plaintiff at all to recover,
And brings a "set off" and an action of trover.
Plaintiff's a little astounded—but he Sends a retainer to Murphy and Shee,
Collects his body
With "Special" for Kelly,
And is danced up and down like a fly in a jelly,
In pouncing his paw
On the facts and the law,
That will leave all his case without failure or flaw!
The trial comes on. It is held out of town
He has paid some tuns dozen of witnesses down.
And while there—they dine—in which case I like them well,
If they haven't carte blanche at some leading hotel.
His fishes to Counsel are given and bagged,
No kind friend is absent—in which case he's dragged;
They're all in the Court—not a man in the street;
The crisis is ready—the case is complete
And the Plaintiff will see it all work like a fury,
Till it comes in its consequence full on the jury!

The Junior has stated the case—at a nudge
The Senior has risen—when coolly the Judge
Says—"This issue can never be tried here—'tis fudge;
The pleas have quite taken the Court by surprise,
At the least it would occupy half the assize."
Complication—confusion,
And then no conclusion.
The Jury remaining still under delusion.
We really can't try it.
The Court—I deny it,
And did we—the parties would gain nothing by it.
"I must be measured and weigh'd in a place far more lonely;
Arbitration it's fit for, an I fit for that only.
I deeply regret that the Court cannot hear you,
But there's one Mr. Rapty Bag,—will never fear you!

And so a case involving thousands and thousands of pounds, which the wronged plaintiff wishes to submit to a jury of his country—for which he has heavily feed Counsel who never act—paid travelling expenses for those who need never have travelled, and witnesses who hear and swear witnesses at all—is baffled by the artifice of false pleas, which have cunningly made it a question of account—while Justice is plunged neck and crop into the slough of an imaginary arbitration.

The bull fights progress in Spain, and now her young Majesty selects the Sabbath day for the exhibitions, and generally frequents them from the altar of her God. At the last display by way of whetting its interest for the French Princes beside the sacrifice of bulls and horses—a human being was all but included in the butchery. At all events, he was led out for dead, and has probably died since.

Our own little Queen has got her own railway open at Gosport, and it will be brought into Royal use and occupation on the 26th, when her Majesty will once more return among her loving subjects of London, or gladden the hearts of the Windsor tradesmen with a sight of the flag Regal on the Castle staff.

Archeology has been quarrelling with Archæology—and society has been stirred by the 4 spatulous rivals as such.

"Pewter Mr. Wright and Mr. Way	Until, at last, it grew quite grand,
Tie quarrel rose, they say,	And then quite Patti Gasw
And Way would have it he was right,	It ended thus—the parties twain
And Wright Jeered the way!	Abstained from being fairly—
And soldiers and learned joined	So Northumberland's got an "Institute,"
The riot, not a few,	And Lord Albert's "society."

And the "Archeological Institute," and the "Archeological Society," are now the distinct bodies over which those two rival potentates (as well as by) had decided the attention of the community and the Legislature. I refer us to find our journal the record of so many lamentable and fatal catastrophies as this week so sadly regards.

The merchant interests of the country are beginning to be affected by the desperate and reckless conduct of La Rosas in Buenos Ayres—and not less, perhaps, by the views of sufficient functionaries from our own Government to Mr Gore Ouseley, our Envoy. This is monstrous and we read to day of a horrible butchery of an English family, accompanied with other crimes, which seems to cry for vengeance at the gates of heart and honour. We suppose that England can afford to protect the lives and the commerce of her subjects against the wretched barbarism of a South American "Bloodthirsty Chief."

America is pouring her troops into Texas, and there is a fine howling war cry in all the Yolks States.

Ireland is greatly stirred in its Protestant district, and Repeal will be somewhat saddened by the death of poor Davis of the Nation, to whose remains they talk of giving a public and even a patriot funeral.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

COLONEL CROMWELL MASSEY.

This gallant officer entered the service of the East India Company, on the Madras establishment, in early life, and rose through every successive military grade to the rank of Colonel. During the course of his career he saw and shared in much hard service. He was on the 10th September, 1780, at the sanguinary battle of Perimbaucum, in Mysore, against the forces of Hyder Ali. There he, Colonel Baillie, Captain (afterwards Sir David) Baird, and about two hundred British soldiers, were taken prisoners. Their captivity is thus described:—being without ammunition, their waggons having accidentally blown up, they formed themselves into a square under the fire of the enemy's numerous artillery, and resisted and repelled thirteen different attacks, until, borne down and trampled under the feet of the elephants and horses, they yielded to numbers, and, though still fighting, were overpowered, and, on being seized, they were chained together, two and two, and were thus cast into Hyder's dungeons at Seringapatam. In this state, suffering from wounds that had no surgical aid, scarcely clad, and exposed to all the treatment and ill-usages, and numerous privations, they lingered on as captives for three years and nine months, when the death of Hyder led to their release. Colonel Cromwell Massey retired from the army the 1st October, 1800. He died on the 8th instant at St. Lawrence, Ramsgate, at the patriarchal age of 103.

MONSIEUR ROYER COLLARD.

France has just lost, in M. Royer Collard, a sound constitutional statesman, an eloquent orator, and an able writer. Born at Sompuis, near Vitry-le-François in 1763, this distinguished man died on the 4th inst., at his residence Chateau Vieux in Berry, aged 82, leaving behind him a bright example of the most persevering and unshaken consistency of principle. He was the venerable patriarch of the Constitutional Royalists, of the Restoration, and the founder of the political system, of which Guizot is so illustrious a disciple, and under which France now enjoys a more tranquil ty, happiness, and true glory than at any previous period of her history. From the earliest days of the revolution of 1789 to the close of his earthly career, M. Royer Collard maintained faithful to the same view, devoted to the same convictions. That which he desired in the first struggles of his youth, at the Commune of Paris, of which he was a member until the 10th of August, and then at the Council of the Five Hundred, wherein he sat for the department of the Marne, he proclaimed with all his might under the Empire and again under the Restoration.

In 1811, on the organisation of the University, he was named Dean of the Faculty of Letters and Professor of Philosophy to the Faculty, whose courses were attended by the Normal School, and in that elevated position, during the two years he filled the chair, increased his already extended reputation. At the Restoration of the Bourbons, he received high administrative functions, and remained charged, until 1813, with the direction of National Education. He subsequently, in opposition, vehemently, in no small degree, by the power of his orations, and his admirable interpretation of the public feeling, to the second part of the Constitutional Regime and to the propagation of small democratic tendencies. It was thus he gained great hold on the opinion and esteem of his country, and attained such popularity, that seven Electoral Colleges returned him at the same time—an honour to which his nomination to the Presidency of the Chamber seemed scarcely to add.

After the Revolution of 1830, Royer Collard continued to sit as a deputy, and took a conscientious oath to the new dynasty and to the resolution of which the address of the 221 had formed the standard. But of late years the advance of age, with its infirmities, seldom allowed his appearance in the Tribune; and it was only on very important questions that one was reminded of the brilliant period of his former years. The most memorable of these occasions was when he pronounced his eloquent and mournful tribute to his lamented friend and associate Casimir Périer.

SIR FRANCIS FREELING, BART.

This gentleman, whose death took place on the 14th inst., at the early age of twenty-nine, was an officer in the Royal Navy, and served for some time as flag-lieutenant of H.M.S. Howe, of 120 guns. The Baronetcy, which he inherited at the decease of his father, the late Sir George Henry Freeling, in 1841, was conferred in 1828 on his grandfather, the well-known secretary of the Post-office, has now passed to his next brother, Henry Hill Freeling, Esq.

IRELAND.

DEATH OF A MEMBER OF THE REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—Mr. Davis, the principal contributor to the Nation newspaper, and the acknowledged leader of the Young Ireland party, died at an early hour on Tuesday morning, after a few days' illness. His death was occasioned by inflammation of the stomach, particularly by all who were connected with him in politics. He died of malignant typhus fever. Mr. Davis was known as one of the speakers at Conciliation-hall, but his reputation was derived more from his writings than from his personal eloquence.

THE POTATO CROP IN IRELAND.—As the disease in the potato is of such commanding interest, we have to tell what is extensively the case on that subject from the provincial journals:—"There was never a finer 'poor man's harvest.' The oats and potatoes are most luxuriant.—Leinster Express. Much uneasiness is felt among the farmers in this district of country, in consequence of a disease showing itself in the growing crop of potatoes, by which they are rendered useless to both man and beast.—Northern Standard. The potato crop is reported to be very unfavourable. We have lately in the county of Leitrim and borders of it, great complaints are making as to a rot in the ground. Large quantities have been planted on guano in this county, and the yield is reported to be very unfavourable. We have seen potato stalks growing on guano and stable manure in the same field, side by side, the former were withered and yellow, while the latter were fresh and green. The report is quite general as to turnips, which have been greatly benefited by the guano.—Vigo Journal.

ANOTHER UNPROVOKED MURDER.—On Wednesday evening (last week) Mr. Bowles, a respectable farmer, residing at Cloughnalaw Bay, county Clare, was waylaid on returning to his father's house, and barbarously murdered within a pistol-shot of his home. The father was alarmed by the report of a gun, and on going out, what he first perceived he saw was a young person of the name of sexton, in the same neighbourhood, hurry off with a gun under his arm, and a few yards further on, the unhappy parent was almost deprived of his reason on coming before his eyes, the fatal ball having penetrated his forehead; and the assassin, not content with his deadly aim, had also broken the poor young man's skull, with a blunt instrument, probably the butt end of his gun. The murderer has not been apprehended, but a verdict of wilful murder has been returned against some person or persons unknown, as more than one may have been implicated. To account for his revolting act, as well as the vindictive outrage, it is sufficient to explain that Kenny, father of the murdered lad, had recently taken a small farm, about seven acres, from Pierce Carrick, of Ennis, Esq.

AWFUL INSTANCE OF SUDDEN DEATH.—On Monday afternoon, the 15th instant, between the hours of five and six o'clock, three gentlemen were walking together round by the terminus of the Rochdestone and Heywood Railway, at Strood, by the banks of the River Medway, when one of them suddenly fell to the ground, and on raising him he appeared to be in a fit. Mr. Colley, a butcher residing at Strood, facing the Canal-road, seeing the circumstance, immediately rendered assistance, and had the gentleman conveyed to his residence, when Dr Brown, of Strood, with promptitude attended. It was, however, found that medical aid was of no avail, as the gentleman was dying, and he expired very shortly afterwards. The name of the deceased is Mr John Grabham, residing at No 23, Ashley crescent, Guy road, and proprietor of the bathing establishment at that place. The names of the two friends who were with the deceased at the time of the awful occurrence were Mr Lean, No 5, St. Paul's Churchyard, and Mr. John Brandwood, of No 15, Bateman's buildings.

CHRIST'S HOSPITAL.—On Monday next, the 22nd inst., being the day after St. Matthew's Day, the Lord Mayor, aldermen, and Sheriffs, with the Governors of the several Royal Hospitals, will attend Divine Service, at Christ's Church, Newgate-street, where a sermon will be preached by the Rev W. H. Gollmard, M.A., Fellow of Peterhouse College, Cambridge; after which they will proceed to the Great Hall in Christ's Hospital, where four orations will be delivered, according to annual custom, by four of the senior scholars, on "The Benefits of the Royal Hospitals;" the first, in Latin, by E. F. Sturgis, the second, in English, by E. Evans; the third, in Greek, by W. F. Greenfield; the fourth, in French, by George Vogt. Eight poems will also be recited by the other Senior scholars, viz.—A Latin Alcaic Ode, on "The Norman Conquest," by T. J. Potter; Greek Iambics, a translation of part of "Bellsi's Speech," from Milton, by M. Lobb; Latin Ode, on "Cuba," by Thomas Steuman Foleham Pitt; Latin Hexameters, translation of part of Pope's "Windsor Forest," by Edward Hay Mathew; Greek Iambics, "The Address of Regulus to the Senate," by E. Algernon Newton; Latin Elegiacs, on "The Murder of the Two Princes in the Tower," by Charles E. Searle; Greek Sapphic Ode, on "Her Majesty's Visit to Christ's Hospital," by J. D. Williams; and an English Poem, on "The Fall of Babylon," by Willie Allen. Powell.

THE RETURN OF THE "GREAT BRITAIN" STEAMER FROM NEW YORK.

The Great Britain arrived at Liverpool on Monday last, from New York. She left New York at Noon on Tuesday, the 26th of August, 7 p.m. pilot left at the Bar early at seven o'clock. She had very little westerly wind on the passage. On her arrival off Liverpool, the pas-engers presented Lieutenant Hosken with a complimentary address, in which occurs the following pas-are:—"The question as to the fitness of iron vessels of large prop rtions for the navigation of the ocean we do it to be now determined in the affirmative. As regards the Great Britain steam-ship, we beg to observe, that the voyage has not been so rapidly performed as has been expected, because every advantage has not yet been taken of her admirable qualities; and a sufficiency of steam is not produced to work the engines with the power for which they are calculated. In all other respects we consider the Great Britain to be unrivalled, her motions are remarkably easy, her accommodations for comfort, and air.—Liverpool, September, 1845. Signed by the passengers."—The Great Britain brought 600 tons of general cargo and 57 passengers.

It appears that during the whole voyage the vessel was never worked at a greater pressure than 600 horse power, although her engines are of 1000 horse-power. The natural consequence of this was, that instead of making, as it calculated she can, seventeen and a half naval miles per hour, she averaged but thirteen. The following table shows the degrees the vessel made, and the degrees run in each twenty-four hours.—

SAILED FROM NEW YORK, SATURDAY, AUGUST 30, FOUR P.M.	Lat.	Long	Distance.

Saturday Morning, Sept. 13, made land.

The vibration so generally complained of in paddle-wheel steamers is scarcely felt in the Great Britain, even at the stern-most part of the vessel, and midships, and at the fore, it is not at all perceptible; while, as a proof of the excellence of her machinery, it may be mentioned that, throughout the whole voyage not a screw or pin became loose.

A gale of wind appears to be more calculated to show the vessel's great powers than a calm. In the former, when the wind keeps the sails still, she keeps on her course, while a calm prevails, she rolls tremendously.

The "rig" of the Great Britain is not yet perfect, and it is, we believe, the intention of her gallant commander, before making his next trip, to effect some important alterations in it. The wire rigging is not found to answer so well as was anticipated.

During the voyage she carried away her main topmast, about half way down, an accident the more to be regretted, as it is stated to have arisen from an insufficiency of hands to take in the sail, on a sudden squall of wind rising. This insufficiency, it should be stated, arose from the desertion of a large portion of the original crew at New York, just as the vessel was upon the point of sailing, which obliged Lieutenant Hoskens to make up his number with the best men he could procure on the spot.

On attempting to remove the stump of the broken mast, the day after the accident, two of the crew were seriously injured. One of them had his arm completely smashed—amputation being performed on the spot by the ship's surgeon. For this poor fellow the passengers subsequently collected a purse containing £25.

MEETING OF THE BRITISH ARCHÆOLOGICAL ASSOCIATION, AT WINCHESTER.

Our report of last week terminated with a notice of Wednesday's proceedings: we return to them, as they were necessarily brief.

On Thursday, the main attraction was the splendid lecture by Professor Willis, in the Great Room, at St. John's, which a correspondent has obliged us by sketching during the lecture for our Journal. The apartment is described as the "assembly room" taste—gilt festoons, oval recessed glasses, &c.; and there are three or four paintings, one of which, a large portrait of Charles I., hangs over the platform. The walls were also hung with the rubbings of brasses, some of them remarkably fine: those from Lynn and St. Alban's, and three cross legged effigies, being very rare. On the platform is the President (the Marquis of Northampton) in the chair, with the Dean of Westminster on his right hand; and on his left, Professor Willis, who, with a wand directed attention to various plans illustrative of his lecture, the large plan of the night being a ground-plan of the Cathedral. The room was crowded wi h fashionable company, among whom were many ladies.

The Professor repudiated the idea of any of the Saxon foundation of Ethelwold remaining, and attributes the ear iest portion to the time of Walkelin, the Norman Bishop appointed by William the Conqueror. It was a general rule with the Norman Bishops to pull down their cathedrals, and re-build others in their place. The Professor quoted a chronicle entitled "The Annals of Winton," to show that Bishop Walkelin "destroyed the whole of the old church in a year, with the exception of the apse and the high altar," and again, "the succeeding year the relics of St. Swithin were removed from under the high altar," which of course involved its destruction. In regard to the statement that the tower only was rebuilt by Walkelin, this was satisfactorily answered by the legend that the tower fell in consequence of the burying under it the remains of William Rufus, who died without receiving the last rites of the church, and who was also a King of bad reputation. Now Walkelin died eleven years before Rufus, consequently would not have rebuilt the tower, which was most likely done out of funds left by Walkelin for the repairs of the cathedral. The Professor alluded to the fall of the tower of Ely Cathedral, built by Ambrose, the brother of Walkelin, and most likely by the same hands, and under similar directions, and contended that both towers fell from the piers being too infirm to bear their weight, and this accounted for the immense size of the present piers, being as much too large as the others had been too small, and it was from the faults thus committed on both sides that the medieval architects learned those true and beautiful proportions which were now so admirably admired by all who viewed them with any interest. The plan of the crypt showed that Walkelin's choir was the same size as the present from examinations that had been made under the supervision of members of the association, a bed of concrete had been found, which proved that it was originally intended to have towers at the west front, making the nave 20 feet longer than at present. In 1202, according to the MS. in Queen's College, Oxford, Bishop Lucy built the aisles and vaulting outside the Lady Chapel. In 1370 oil in Kingston left a sum of money for the completion of the nave. In 1387 William of Wykeham was appointed architect by that Bishop; and, having thus set it down the building to the time of William of Wykeham, the Professor read a long extract from the will of William of Wykeham, showing what has been done by that Bishop, and what he left to be done, leaving limits bound him for the work. There was no historical account left of the choir, but, from its heraldic decorations, they were enabled to place the date during the time of Bishop Fox and his contemporaries.

At the conclusion of the lecture, the Marquis of Northampton proposed, and Professor Garrod seconded a motion of the cordial thanks of the meeting to the Professor for his truly excellent lecture.

Mr. C. R. Cockerell then read a very interesting paper on the two St. Mary Overies, or Lodges, highly suggestive of the talent displayed by William of Wykeham in those two buildings.

A party of members then accompanied Mr. Cockerell to the College in Winchester, and some few visited the picturesque ruins of the Castle and Palace of Wolvesley, which we have engraved: it was noticed at page 174, last week.

At seven o'clock, Professor Willis accompanied a very large party over the cathedral, and almost repeated his lecture, provi ng his deductions and showing the method of his research in a manner most gratifying to those who had the pleasure of accompanying him.

In the evening the Rev. the Dean gave a most brilliant soirée, when he received nearly four hundred visitors; and the Museum was again thrown open.

THURSDAY.

Although we have already noticed this day's proceedings, we return to the Historical Section, and Mr Halsted's brief address, pointing out the province of the section, and distinguishing it from the other two sections of the Association. Mr. Halsted made some remarks on the relation of monumental evidence to the study of history. Antiquities involve the consideration of something tangible and material to be the basis of discussion; this department is founded on written and printed documents which it is of great importance should assume a dignified character. There are some decrees which belong to the English historical school, but its distinctive character is remarkable accuracy, arising from the patient investigations of the people, and producing a more just appreciation of evidence than is usual among our continental neighbours. In the progress of this Association it will be endeavoured to take an enlarged view of the objects of this study.

FRIDAY

This morning a large body of the members of the Association visited Porchester. During the inspection of the outer walls of the Castle, the Rev. Mr. Barnabore pointed out the supposed Roman portions, the nearly perfect Norman Keep, and the ban dings of the fifteenth century. The party then visited Porchester Church—a fine Norman structure originally cruciform, but the south transept is destroyed. The west end is partially good, and there are some singular features in the chancel and north transept, especially a stone bench along the wall, with a sort of canopy over it, without shafts. The Font is good and rich Norman round, with interesting arcades.

A few of the party found time to visit Titchfield, and inspect its Norman and Perpendicular Church, with its Decorated Chapel; and splendid Key bethan Monument of the Lady Jane, Countess of Southampton, dec 1574. Others visited Titchfield-place House, a valuable specimen of the domestic architecture of the fifteenth century, formerly the seat of the Earls of Southampton. Another party went to Boarhurst Church, of the time of Richard I., lately restored. Still another party visited Southampton, Netley, and Beaulieu Abbey. Mr. Thistlethwayte, the proprietor of Porchester Castle, hospitably entertained a large party to luncheon at his seat, Southwick Park.

In the evening the following papers were read :—

On Porchestor Castle, by the Rev C. H Hartshorne.

On Pointed Arches, by Mr Edmund Sharpe.

On the Secret History of a Passage in the Life of Margaret, Duchess of Savoy, by Mr. J. G Nichols

The following is a summary of the first —

The natural position of Porchester rendered it eligible as an early fortress so soon as the Romans had gained a footing in Great Britain; the precise age of it is uncertain; probably later than the works at Richborough, Pevensey, and Dover

The inhabitants of Hampshire having assisted those of Brittany in their revolt against the youthful Crassus, urged Cæsar the following year to undertake the conquest of Britain Landing place doubtful, but it happened exactly 1 900 years back

The foundations of these buildings, upon examination, show them to have been laid in conformity with the rules given by Vitruvius. The towers in the walls, the modes adopted to give them stability, and the methods of binding together, by means of Roman bricks, the bad building materials employed in the work, are all in obedience to the precepts of this great architect, as shown at Leicester, Lincoln, Burgh, Richborough, Dover, Porchester, and other places. The same system, in fact, prevails from Caerwent and Caernarvon to Dover and Silchester, and from Lillebonne and Soissons to Autun, in France. The durability of these tiles is occasioned by the clay having been thrown up a long time previously to its being used.

The more important question of cements was next entered upon, from which it appeared, that by a careful analysis having been made of several, they were found to agree with the rules of Vitruvius, and moreover showed that their peculiar hardness depends upon their coarseness, which hastens crystalization, and causes the latent cohesiveness of the slaked lime to be brought into action, so that the mass becomes more perfectly carbonated

By the application of this kind of inquiry it is found that Porchester still exhibits, notwithstanding the continued repairs it has undergone from the reign of Henry II. to the present day, indisputable marks of its high antiquity; but there is no connecting link between the genuine Roman work of the second century and the Norman Keep of the 12th. This Keep, which was the temporary residence of King John on nineteen different occasions, gives a curious insight into the domestic inconveniences of the early English Monarchs, who when compelled to stay within doors must, of necessity, have passed much of their time in murky twilight, a gloom they tried to dissipate by the great quantity of wine that was always ordered to precede their visits.

SATURDAY.

In the Nisi Prius Court, Sir Thomas Phillips, Bart., read a manuscript account of the marriage of the Duke of Burgundy with the Princess Margaret, sister of King Edward IV.

Mr Edward Hawkins then communicated his observations on the ancient Mint and Exchange at Winchester. The existence of the Exchange had hardly before been suspected. The mintage for the whole kingdom was long held at Winchester, but all notice of the Mint of Winchester ceases after Henry III The nomination of the moneyers was by the City, but their final appointment by the Exchequer. There is no notice of the Mint in Doomsday Book On some occasions, all the moneyers were ordered to assemble at Winchester, when none were found perfectly honest but three, and those three were all Winchester men. (Loud cheers.) After detailing some historical notices respecting the Mint at Winchester, Mr. Hawkins concluded by stating that the historian often errs from not consulting, or being debarred from examining, local records of past times; but he trusted that a more intelligent, as well as a more liberal, spirit of research was now prevailing, and that greater facilities would be afforded, both by Corporations and by the Government, for the examination of ancient documents. (Hear, hear.)

Sir F. Madden's paper "On the Common Seal and Privileges of the Men of Alverstoke, in Hants," was next read by Mr Newton, of the British Museum, Sir Frederick having been prevented from attending. This paper involved several important points of inquiry for the Members of the Association.

The next paper was read by Mr. T. H. Turner (the indefatigable Assistant Secretary to the Association), consisting of notices and extracts from the episcopal registers.

The Rev C. H. Hartshorne then read one of the most interesting communications of the week, "On the Ancient Parliament at Acton Burnell, in Shropshire."

There were also several papers read to the sections of Early and Mediæval Antiquities, and the Architectural.

In the afternoon, nearly all the Members visited the Museum at the Deanery, when a series of Drawings of Antiquities found in Ireland were exhibited, by the kind permission of the Council of the Royal Irish Academy, to whom they belong.

RUINS OF WOLVESLEY CASTLE AND PALACE, WINCHESTER.

MONDAY.

The chair was taken at 12 o'clock by the Marquis of Northampton, at St. John's.

The Treasurer read an abstract of the accounts, showing a balance in hand of £529.

Mr A Way read the Report, and announced donations to the Library, received from the Chevalier Bunsen, Royal Irish Academy, &c., and stated that the number of subscribing members amounted, at present, to more than 700.

The President read letters of excuse for non-attendance, from various persons of distinction, and proceeded to address the meeting at some length, replying to the late anonymous attacks on the Association, and successfully refuting each of them. His Lordship, in conclusion, proposed that the Society should, in future, be called "The Archæological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland," which was carried unanimously.

Mr. Burge, the Recorder of Winchester, proposed a vote of thanks to the President; seconded by the Dean of Winchester.

The Marquis of Northampton returned thanks.

The Dean of Winchester then moved that the Marquis of Northampton do take the chair for the ensuing year, and said, let me add, in the words of the poet,—

"Northampton take the chair,— Nor quit it till thou put thy equal there."

(Loud cheers.) Mr. J. H. Markland seconded the motion. The noble Marquis accepted the offer, and read a list of the General Committee for the ensuing year.

The President then proposed that the next meeting should be at York. Carried unanimously.

Thanks to the Dean and Chapter were moved by Sir R Westmacott, R.A.; seconded by Mr. A. B. Hope, M.P. The Dean of Winchester returned thanks.

A vote of thanks to the Recorder of Winchester was then proposed by Count Mortarr, seconded by Mr. Kemble. Mr. Burge returned thanks

Mr. J. H. Markland proposed a vote of thanks to the Nobility, Gentry, and Clergy, for their kindness: it included all who had been present.

Various other votes of thanks then passed; including one to Mr. A. Way, the Hon. Secretary.

STATUE OF DR. WATTS.

Although, by the new appropriation of Abney Park as a Cemetery, the mansion in which Dr. Watts passed a portion of his peaceful life, has been removed, it has been resolved to perpetuate his memory and association with the spot by other and more classic means. A subscription has accordingly been opened, headed by Mr. Hankey, the eminent banker, for placing in the Cemetery a Statue of the Reverend Classic of the People, as Dr. Watts has been termed. The height of the Statue is 8 feet 3 inches; and that of the pedestal on which it stands, is 12 feet; the whole being executed in Portland stone. The commission has been executed by Mr. Baily, R.A., whose usual charge for such a Statue in Portland stone is £500; but, in consequence of his estimation of Dr. Watts's character and talents, he undertook to execute the work considerably under that sum.

The Statue is simple, yet dignified; and embodies the spirit of Watts's character and writings, which beam with freedom, toleration, and piety.

The setting-up of this statue should not lead persons to infer that Dr. Watts is buried here; for he rests in Bunhill-fields; where Lady Abney and Sir John Hartopp erected a handsome tomb over his grave.

DISAPPEARANCE OF TOM THUMB.—A great sensation has been created at Nantes by the sudden disappearance of General Tom Thumb. The pigmy General, wishing to attend the races at Quimper, left Vannes with his suite, at six o'clock, and was expected to have soon returned. Apartments had been previously engaged for him. His carriage broke down near Roasie, a village situated a short distance from Quimperlé, inducing a very disagreeable delay. The postilion refused to wait the requisite time for the necessary repairs, observing that his orders were positive to return to Quimperlé at a particular hour, and vain was all persuasion to change his resolution; but he assured them that he would inform his master, and that another conductor should be immediately sent with fresh horses to continue their route. After waiting a considerable time, the conductor and horses arrived, the repairs were completed, and General Tom Thumb mounted the carriage Scarcely had they driven a league when the horses stopped suddenly, the conductor descended, and perceived an immense heap of billets of wood, at the same instant four men, masked, seized and bound the driver, and threatened, if he uttered a cry, to shoot him. During this scene the General and his suite were locked in the arms of Morpheus. One of the four masks mounted the seat of the carriage, and drove rapidly to St. Thurien. It was only at this place that the General learnt his misfortune. The carriage started from St. Thurien to where is still unknown. Amongst many it is conjectured that he is concealed in some inviolable domicile. Others affirm that a lady, from excess of fantasy, has eloped with him to the neighbourhood of Guilligomach. The most likely version is, that the four men in masks belong to the band of Zizo, called Compte d'Avenal, famed for its audacity and temerity. One fact is certain, that the General has not been seen or heard of since his departure.

THE GRAND CHALLENGE CUP—ROYAL MERSEY YACHT CLUB.

This piece of extremely handsome silver work, standing nearly three feet high, has been executed by Mr Joseph Mayer, of Lord-street, Liverpool. It consists of a tripled base, the angles of which are formed of dolphins, and the prows of vessels, with buoys, anchors, and other nautical emblems, surmounted by three Livers; on the façades are chased in bas-relief the following subjects — "Her Majesty visiting the Royal Yacht Squadron, off Cowes;" "Queen Elizabeth visiting Sir Walter Raleigh, at Deptford, after his voyage to America;" and "Cleopatra sailing down the Cydnus to meet Marc Antony."

Standing on the base is a large Wine Vase, the handles, with their pendants and the other ornaments, being in the Elizabethan style. The cover is surmounted by a figure of Nautical Victory, holding in each hand a wreath, indicating that the possessor must win it twice before it becomes his property.

On the body of the Vase is the following inscription, on one side:—

THE GRAND CHALLENGE CUP, PRESENTED BY THE MEMBERS OF THE ROYAL MERSEY YACHT CLUB, 1845

On the other panel is the device of the Club, as worn on their ensign—namely, a Liver, surmounted with a Royal Coronet, and the letters R M Y C.

THE GRAND CHALLENGE CUP.—ROYAL MERSEY YACHT CLUB.

There is, also, a beautifully embroidered Purse, with the heraldic bearings of the Club, and other devices, emblazoned upon it, containing fifty sovereigns, which amount is given to the victor at each match, every year the Cup may be contended for

We understand that the sailing match for the Grand Challenge Cup and Ladies' Purse of fifty guineas, came off on Thursday, the 11th instant, when the Victoria (an Irish yacht), belonging to Daniel Connor, Esq., of the R C Y C., came in first, and the Edith, belonging to to J. C. Ewart, Esq., came in second. We believe the race is disputed.

"THE DONCASTER CUP."

The design for this magnificent prize-plate is stated to have been suggested by the Right Honourable Earl Spencer; and it bears the impress of his truly classic mind. The composition represents Diomed in one of the ancient quadrigæ, or one-horsed chariots and driver, at full speed, thus spiritedly described in Pope's translation of Homer—

"High o'er his head the circling lash he wields, His bounding horses scarcely touch the fields;"

the fields in the group being bright green, and contrasting well with the silver-work and black marble base. The action of the horses is as impetuous as life, and realises the poet's lines—

"THE DONCASTER CUP," 1845.

CAPEL COURT.—RAILWAY SPECULATORS.

"And the fierce coursers urged their rapid pace
So swift, it seemed a flight, and not a race."

The anatomical beauty of the horse, his muscular powers, and proportions, are admirably displayed. The design was sketched by Frank Howard; the horses were grouped by Macarthy; and the whole modelled under the superintendence of Mr. Bailey, the Royal Academician. The group has been admirably executed in silver by Messrs. Hunt and Roskell, late Storr and Mortimer. Indeed, it is long since we have seen a performance more creditable to the skill of the respective artists. The value is 300 guineas.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD IRELAND.

GOLDSMITH'S HOUSE, LISSOY.

About six miles from Athlone, in the County Longford, is situated the small, wretched-looking village of Lissoy, the residence in early life of Oliver Goldsmith. He was born in this county, in the poor village of Pallas, about two miles from the small town of Ballymahon, on the 10th of November, 1728. His father, the Rev Charles Goldsmith, came to reside here about two years after Oliver's birth, when he was appointed to the rectory of Kilkenny-West. Here the childish and boyish days of the poet were passed; and here his brother, the Rev. Henry Goldsmith, continued to reside after his father's death, and was residing when the Poet dedicated to him his poem of "The Traveller."

The village of Lissoy—the "sweet Auburn" of Goldsmith, and by which name it appears in the maps—is situated on a gentle eminence, and still preserves the features of the beautiful poem that has immortalized a most unpoetical spot; for although we may trace the general outline of the place as the original of Goldsmith, the mill, the church, and the other places mentioned, have no charm except what he has lent them. A few mud cabins, each owning a couple of windows composed of four squares of glass, a hedge inn at one end, and ruined huts at the other, comprise the "sweet Auburn" of Goldsmith. It is, however, but just to say that, in the time of the Poet, the scene was, by report, much better. The ruined residence of the Poet's father and brother was a snug house, with its orchard, and a handsome avenue of trees leading from the road to the door. A glance at our view will show what it is now—a mere shell, uncroofed and shattered, little trace of the once trim garden, and remaining but a few trees of the once shady avenue. The house and the whole village are as dirty, desolate, and lonely as any in Ireland.

Goldsmith's house was tenanted until within the last 25 years. Its roof was thatched. It measures 68 feet by 24 in depth; it is but one story high, having five windows in the upper story, and four and a central door on the ground-floor. Such is where the immortal author of the "Vicar of Wakefield" passed his earliest and most cherished days. His brother, the clergyman, is still remembered by the old inhabitants as "a nice, kind little gentleman."

"The village preacher's modest mansion,"

THE STAG-SONG.

A CAROL OF CAPEL COURT.

Within the range of Stock Exchange
The privileged assemble;
Without the range of Stock Exchange
Stag-speculators tremble!

At any other race, men back
The very foremost riders,
But all the Sport in Capel Court,
Is won by the Out-siders.

They poach a railway, like a hare,
To see who first can bag her,
You start to see them stagging on,
It really makes you stagger.

"Shares! Shares!" they cry, like "cherry ripe,"
As once composed by Horn O,
"Shares! Shares!" they cry, from morn till night,
"Shares! Shares!" from night till morn O!

GOLDSMITH'S HOUSE, LISSOY.

A STAG 'll bid, and bid away,
W thout a ghost of he.p—
You'll never want an au ti neer,
He'll knock you down himself.

A STAG 'll bid, and bid away,
(Still quoff not from his cup),
In any way you bid with him,
Be sure he'l. pick you up!

You say he has no home—a Stag—
That may be, more or less;
But if he hasn't got a home,
He's always an address!

Address! address! address! you cry,
I know he has; but, dear it!—
He gives it me, and, when I call,
He's not to be found at it!

A Stag! I own I do not like
The animal at all:
What use is it to Call on one
Who cannot 'pay the Call,"

What in the world but "note for Scrip,"
Is "Listen Scripts?" Plain it
Into pure Irish, and it says—
"I ask for Shares—and 'mave it!"

Oh! CAPEL COURT! who'd go for sport,
To Germany, from you?
You have enough of Stags at hand
To get up a bullfight!

And so long live the noble game
Of Railway Speculation!
And ne'er may stags who haunt the same

EPITOME OF NEWS.—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

The Dusseldorf Gazette states, that a farmer living on one of the estates of the Duke d'Aremberg, near Dusseldorf, has discovered a mode of preventing the rotting of potatoes, and even of curing it when it has already commenced. The method is very simple: it consists in merely harrowing deeply the earth in which the tubercles are planted so as to produce evaporation, which will diminish the fermentation caused by humidity. This plan has proved com.letely successful.

The disorder commenced with cries of 'Long live Frederick William IV.' Rouge did not pay attention to it, but continued to converse tranquilly with the members of the Christian Oath in Church."

The Gazette de Cologne contains the following:—"We find it stated in a letter from the frontiers of Bohemia that there is a serious question of a treaty between Austria and Italy for the purpose of facilitating the entry of colonial productions, of a kind such as existed between Prussia and several states of Southern Germany before the Customs Union was established. Although for the moment the matter is only in contemplation, yet it is said unlikely that it may end in a complete understanding between the Zollverein and Austria."

On the night betwixt the 2nd and 3rd instant, the wind blowing freely from the N W, there fell upon the whole mainland of Orkney a shower of fine impalpable dust, evidently of volcanic origin. The dust fell in such quantities as to whole cultivated fields, and admit of being easily gathered. It is presumed to have been caused by an eruption of Mount Hecla, in Iceland, as a similar phenomenon which occured many years ago was ascertained to have proceeded from that cause. The dust exactly re-embled fi ely ground pumice s one

Letters from Sweden and Moscow inform us that the potatoe crop there is excellent, disease being unknown, the cold having been more favo rable to these tubercules than heat. THE VICTORIA PICTURE GALLERY AT ET—The Journal des Débats gives the following account of the Queen's Picture Gallery in the Chateau of Eu, arranged for her Majesty by the gal antry of Louis Philippe — "The two extremities of the gallery are occupied on one side by the portraits of the Queen of England, placed between those of her consort, Prince Albert, and the Queen of the Belgians. The chief furniture of the apartment is as complete as it is splendid. It is manufactured of carved oak. The oak wainscoting, enriched with gold filagree, has been constructed with the same promptitude as the paintings, eight days ago they were scarcely commenced. On entering her palace, the Queen discovered, in the private boudoir which she occupied two years ago, the full length portraits of her father and mother, they having been placed there by special command of the King together with two splendid water colour drawings descriptive of the coronation of Queen Victoria. THE MARKETS.

CORN-EXCHANGE (Friday).—The accounts received to day from the northern districts report no change in the progress making in harvest work and being very satisfactory, and the arrivals of wheat of home growth being small, compared with those of many previous weeks, we have to report a further improvement in the value of that article, which has obtained an advance, in the currency as obtained on Monday last, of from 1s to 2s per quarter, and on finer qualities 3s per quarter. The demand for foreign wheat continues very active, and in the absence of further arrivals, the supply is reduced to about four or five weeks' consumption. Several orders having been again received for the Continent, and for ports under the Baltic tariff, we have to report a further rise of from 2s to 3s per quarter There was no new barley a market. Grinding malting and distilling qualities are in good request, and the turn in favour of the latter, for which the trade have been long looking for, has at length appeared to have commenced. Malt has had a more inquiring sale to-day, but the amount of business has not been extensive. Beans and peas are in request for export, and the turn in favour of the latter is to be quoted higher. Oats have been in good demand

PILBROW'S ATMOSPHERIC RAILWAY.

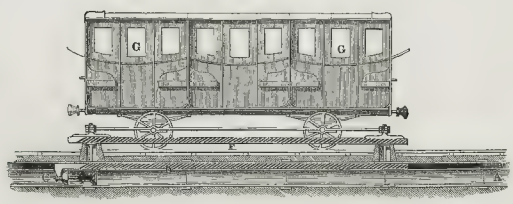

FIG. 1.—THE LEADING CARRIAGE, WITH WHOLE APPARATUS.

Although, in the fourth volume of our Journal, we have illustrated the working of one method of Atmospheric Traction, the subject has, of late, acquired so much additional interest in connexion with the vast extension of the Railway System, that it becomes important to investigate every phase of the invention. Accordingly, we have chosen for present illustration, the method of Atmospheric Traction invented by Mr Pinkus; contemporary with whom, in the invention, were Messrs. Medhurst and Vallance; and their views being almost simultaneously brought before the public, it becomes difficult to determine who had the legitimate claim to priority. There is, however, satisfactory evidence to prove that Mr. Vallance first proposed employing the power of the atmosphere against a vacuum, as Mr. Medhurst proposed a plenum

Twenty four years elapsed from the time that Mr. Pinkus's views were first published, to the time when an experiment on a large scale was presented for public inspection. But, since the year 1834, when Mr Pinkus's first pattern was taken out, and his first experiment made, there have been others who have either made some alteration in his plan of propulsion, or have proposed entirely new methods of applying atmospheric power.

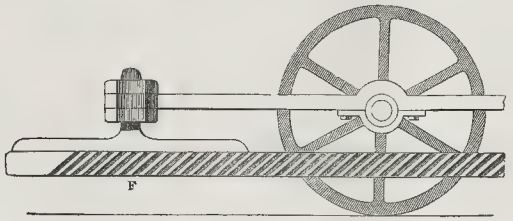

FIG. 3.—CARRIAGE RACK AND FASTENINGS TO THE CARRIAGE.

Among these are Messrs Clegg and Samuda, Mr. Nickel, Mr Pilbrow, and others of our own country; Messrs. Aragon Halette, Chanerol, and others of France. We make this statement upon the authority of a paper read by Dr Hewlett, before the Society of Arts, in the present year.

In our description of the Kingstown and Dalkey Atmospheric Railway [Jan 5, 1844], we stated "Atmospheric propulsion on railways to be an accomplished fact;" and, during the last session of Parliament, the adoption of the Atmospheric principle was highly approved of by a Committee of the House of Commons: indeed, on the 27th of June the Committee on the Group N. voted the preamble of the Portsmouth Direct Atmospheric Railway. The next question to be determined is, which system has the least commercial difficulties to encounter?—and this advantage is claimed for Pilbrow's method, of which the following is a general description:—

on this chamber, at given distances, are small square boxes, into which a pair of spindles are perpendicularly inserted, having a small wheel at either end with oblique threads or channels on its surface; the edges of these wheels enter the chamber above the piston. Into the tube the piston is placed, carrying with it an arrow, or bar, or oblique channeled rack, in the square chamber above. The progress of the piston brings the arrow between the edges of the spindle wheels, and turns the spindles round with great velocity. This description relates to all that is under the surface of the road midway between the rails.

"Above the surface of the road, are the media of connexion with the moving power. The spindles have wheels at the top in every respect corresponding with those which enter the chamber below; along the centre of the leading carriage there is placed a rack, in shape and form, only rather wider, similar to the piston rack. This rack is of sufficient length to be in two pair of pinions or spindles at the same time, and, by consequence, it is never out of gear during the whole time the propulsion apparatus is acting on the carriage. The terms employed in the description may be better understood by a minute and detailed examination of the accompanying wood cuts" Dr Hewlett, in his lecture, then proceeds to explain certain difficulties anticipated.

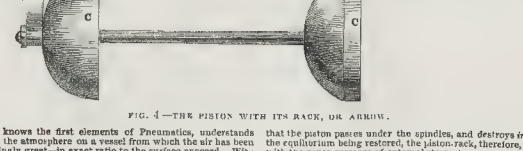

FIG. 4.—THE PISTON WITH ITS RACK, OR ARROW.

"Every one who knows the first elements of Pneumatics, understands that the pressure of the atmosphere on a vessel from which the air has been removed is exceedingly great—in exact ratio to the surface exposed. With much truth it may be said, if a vacuum be produced beneath the spindles, must not the pressure be so very great as to wrest the piston rack, or, at least, occasion a degree of friction, which must be ruinous? Admitted: the premisses are sound, and the conclusion implied in the inquiry is correct. But, the piston is so adjusted as to be a little in advance of the piston rack, so that the piston passes under the spindles, and destroys in loco the vacuum: the equilibrium being restored, the piston-rack, therefore, has not to contend with the super pressure of external atmosphere

"Another difficulty is also prevented by this arrangement. As the spindles are slightly raised by the passing of the piston rack, it might, on a primâ facie view, be supposed that leakage would be occasioned, from the fact above stated, the air is not admitted until the piston has passed, and the air rushing in behind the piston that aperture, which might, in other circumstances, be the cause of leakage, is the admission of fresh air, adding impetus to the piston.

"In practical working on the usual scale, with the broad or narrow gauge, the spindles will be placed at intervals of thirty feet.

"The tube is not exhausted directly, but by means of a pipe connecting it with a receiver of an adequate size. The receiver is exhausted by an engine-pump, and when the mercury rises to 22 deg. the vacuum is found sufficient for practical purposes. When the receiver is exhausted, the tap of the connecting pipe is turned, which occasions all the air in the tube to rush into the receiver,—the atmosphere then presses on the surface of the piston and propels it with great velocity. This remark applies exclusively to the model now at work at the Adelaide Gallery.

"In practical working, the exhausting engines will be placed at intervals of ten miles."

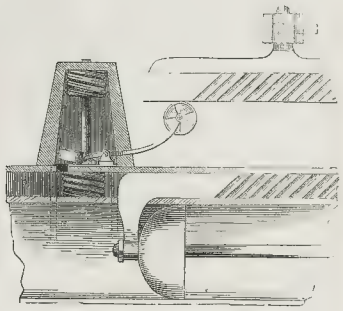

FIG. 7.—KEY OR VALVE FOR ADMITTING THE AIR INTO THE TUBE.

Among the comparative advantages of Pilbrow's invention over the present Atmospheric System, as stated by him, are, in Construction in having no discontinuance of the main, and therefore no section valves at crossings, &c; no necessity for bridges for cross lines, roads, lanes, &c.; no continuous valve, fewer engine establishments, one to every ten miles being sufficient, instead of one to every three miles; for there being no long valve in Pilbrow's method, the leakage will be proportionally diminished: it has, likewise, no necessity for the heating apparatus; for cranes or elevated rails, for the taking on and off carriages, as that would be done in the usual manner again, this arrangement will permit of the main being varied in its diameter at different parts of a long line to suit any irregularity in the general level or gradients, or traffic, which is often greater at one part than another.

Two causes of the most fearful accidents are avoided by the Atmospheric principle, viz, that of collision, as it is impossible there can be two trains in opposite directions and on the same line; and that of running off the line, as the carriage rack upon which the propelling power acts, must, of necessity, keep the carriage in its proper place. Provision is made ordinarily for stopping the carriage ad libitum, by the brake; and on extraordinary occasions by an opening valve, similar to a flute key, which can be opened by a slight depression of the carriage rack under the control of the conductor. (See Fig. 7.) The remaining advantages of this system, common to other methods of atmospheric propulsion, are the avoidance of smoke, steam, and falling flakes of fire: the impossibility of collision—the rapidity of progress over gradients of considerable height—and the extraordinary saving of expense.

RAILWAY REGULATION.

The Railway world has been scared this week by a report that an Order in Council had been issued, or was about to be issued, suspending the provisional registration of new companies for the formation of new lines. The rush to the Registration Office, to go through the necessary forms before the dread edict should take effect, was tremendous; all the managers of every new line—the announcements of which render the largest sheets of the daily press too small to contain them—were thrown into dismay, and Capel-court was literally in convulsions. But the rumour turned out to be destitute of foundation; it was a mere stock-jobbing report, that, for a few hours, threw the market into a ferment, but without any effect on prices; it merely spurred on the concoctors of those schemes which were far enough advanced, to get them registered without delay, lest they should appear at a disadvantage among the many plans earlier in the field. But they had been frighted by false fire; no Order in Council had suspended the authority of the Act of Parliament, which legalises the association of any number of men almost for any conceivable purpose—and Capel-court was comforted.

The amount of railway business already prepared for the House of Commons in the next Session is certainly something tremendous; more, indeed, than the Legislature can possibly get through properly, unless it sits in permanence, like the French Convention during the political convulsions of the Revolution. If an order suspending the further registration of new plans, was to have the effect of preventing the increase of railway business beyond its present point, there may have been some reason for it; but, in effect, it would not have been fair: some of the worst and most unsound may have been registered already; good ones might have been placed under a disadvantage. And as all the schemes, good and bad, must go through the ordeal of a Parliamentary investigation, it is difficult to say what real benefit would have sprung from the refusal of the registering the Companies as yet unborn, or only about to see the light. It might have caused a rise in the shares of those lines which had had the good luck of precedence; but speculation would have been as active as ever, and any attempt to put a stop to that on the part of the Government we believe would be hopeless.

The sensation excited by the rumour, transient as it was, shows, however, what immense effect any interference on the part of the Government in railway business is capable of producing. It has a power, and sooner or later will assuredly be compelled to exercise it; not through Orders in Council, suspending an Act of Parliament, but by some actual supervision of the lines proposed, that shall furnish fewer chances of success to a bad or unnecessary scheme than the present Parliamentary Committees. Under the present system there is no bill, however badly it may be got up, and however rotten and unsound its scheme in every respect, that has not some chance of getting through. There was more than one instance of this last Session, and the number will be increased in the next. It is time some distinct principle should be laid down on which the necessity for a railway should be decided. The Map of England, with the lines completing and proposed, is beginning to look frightful; and when is is considered what an enormous amount of property must be cut through to construct them, all obtained by a forced sale—for the powers of the "Act" are nearly as absolute as those of a Russian Ukase—some check in the exuberance of engineering really seems inevitable. Two or three lines between the same points, varying from each other slightly, but substantially the same, cannot be required by the traffic between those places; one well-planned line would be sufficient for every purpose. What are called "competing" lines of railroad, under a good system, ought to be impossible; as far as the public are concerned they are quite useless; they create a parliamentary contest, involving both Companies in all the enmities and more than the expense of a county election; to the shareholders in the one that fails, it is so much money lost, as uselessly as if it had been thrown into the sea; if they are both constructed, it has happened—as it will happen again—that neither of them pays, and the result is an "amalgamation" that places the public completely at the mercy of the Company, whose object is to get as much and spend as little as possible. Competition is a sound principle of trade, and productive of great benefit where it is possible to carry it out; but it may be doubted if the competition of railways ever produced any lasting benefit. At present, "starting an opposition line" is talked of as coolly as if the road was the vehicle, and a hundred miles of railway cost no more than the building of one of the old stage-coaches, of the "opposition" between the proprietors of which, such amusing traditions are yet extant. But, to cut up the face of the country by two lines when one would suffice, is a national injury, which it is the duty of a Government to prevent. We have no desire whatever to see the energy of private enterprise superseded. No one would wish to make the Government the be-all and the end-all, of every speculation, every social improvement. But some kind of guidance or control is required for the preservation of that social order, without which we shall retrograde instead of making an advance.

We are not disposed to be alarmists in railway matters. We have heard the present activity in speculation compared to the mania that prevailed at the time of the South Sea Scheme, and there have been predictions of a result equally disastrous. We do not anticipate any such a convulsion. The cases are not identical. The South Sea project had no foundation whatever, except some insane notion of trading with some region of the Southern Hemisphere—a kind of revival of the El Dorado that haunted the dreams of the adventurers of the reigns of Elizabeth and James. The shares in that too famous Company had, for some time, a certain value, and people bought and sold them, never reflecting on what that apparent value rested—neither buyer nor seller could have explained it, if the question had been asked. But a Railway is something tangible; we have them in full activity all over the Kingdom, paying, in most cases, a fair return for the capital their construction absorbed. Fresh lines are proposed; there is a probability they will pay equally well; and there is a keen competition to obtain possession of the shares. This is the fair side of the question. But there is a reverse to the picture, and it is this:—Four-fifths of the people who have obtained shares have not the most remote intention of holding them permanently, and becomin the real constructors of the line—paying up calls, and laying out money, instead of pocketing it. They have procured shares, or buy them, only to sell at a profit, more or less; everybody is just now buying, which explains, in some degree, the extraordinary phenomenon of the shares in almost every scheme being at a premium as soon as they are issued. When the Bills are obtained, and the calls begin to be made, there will be a rush to sell; and then probably every transfer will be attended with a loss. But the plan itself will be as sound and good as ever; the panic will only be among the imposters, to whom all schemes were alike, as they never meant to be real holders in any. We do not believe there will be anything like the panic of 1825, or that the losses will be at all equal to those the country has sustained by foreign loans,—the money raised here for the rotten Republics of Mexico and South America, and the repudiating States of the Union,—or equal to what was sunk through the gullibility of the public, in foreign Mines. That there are dangerous facilities for imposition in the present system, we admit. The eagerness to buy anything that comes out in the shape of railway shares, is a strong temptation to those in whom swindling, under the guise and forms of business, has been perfected by practice in this great commercial world, to a profession. It is easily done: an Ordnance Map suggests a line, a Board of Directors is soon formed, and a Prospectus issued; the public does all the rest. Now, there is nothing to prevent every one of the original directors from selling out every farthing of their interest in the undertaking, leaving the last shareholders to get their bill and construct their line as they can. We do not say this has been done, but it is possible; and the coming session may discover things quite as strange as this. What the public requires in these matters is knowledge, and scrutiny into the characters of those with whom they embark their property. This the Government cannot do for them; they must protect themselves. But when matters ripen to the actual construction of the line, then the Executive Government must step in, and resolutely and imperatively refuse the vast powers of a railway bill to unnecessary or defective lines, or such as have been imperfectly or carelessly surveyed. It cannot check speculation; but it can and must establish a control over the construction of the lines first, and their management afterwards.

"THE BARON," WINNER OF THE GREAT ST. LEGER.

We here present to our readers a portrait of the winner of "the Doncaster St. Leger," drawn for this journal by Mr. J. F. Herring. "The Baron" is a dark chesnut horse, about 15 hands 3 inches high; his head is strong and bony, the forehead projects; but the nose dips and tapers; his neck is rather short, and light; shoulders fine, and withers high. He is by no means a showy horse, but is what is termed "wiry-looking." He is the property of Mr. Watts, of Jockey Hall, Kildare, by whom he was bred.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Wednesday.

The system which has for some time past prevailed of bodies of men banding together for the purposes of robbery and assassination is now occupying the attention of Government. Trials of the most vivid interest have been heard before the tribunals, which have elicited the most extraordinary facts, and before which the banditti of Spain and Italy, the tales of Le Sage, and the romances of Mrs. Radcliffe, must hide their diminished heads. The band of robbers who have recently been tried before the Cour d'Assizes de la Seine, is denominated as "Bande Lanckpaip," surnamed the "Siceprrs" in thieves' slang. They were known to have about the low public houses in the suburbs of Paris, and to decoy, under various pretexts, the mechanics and labourers, to drink or sport. These victims, thus led into the snare, unhesitatingly partook of the refreshment, into which some drug was put which caused instantaneous sleep. They were then easily pundered. One of the accused, named Mulot, kept a public house of this nature, and is not only a principal agent of the "Siceprrs," but the chief of another gang of noted solely to thefts. Jean Lanckpaip, better known by the name of Lampot, already had suffered several punishments. This ruffian, when questioned for his defence, replied that he had no occasion to give an account of his life up to the period when he commenced the honourable profession of a thief; and added that his father was a blacksmith, and passed his life with the greatest honesty and regularity, which so disgusted him that he ran away to Paris; that he was embarrassed for funds, and used to prowl about the wine houses, where he met with some good fellows, who took him to board at their own table. The next day he tried his hand at stealing meats, fowls, and vegetables, which the respectable hostess cooked, and received in lieu of rent, board, and washing—and thus commenced his honourable career. From the evidence adduced there is no doubt that the various bands amount to many thousands—that they are distributed throughout France—that, in fact, they are regularly organised, and have their various officers, secretaries, &c. And I understand that since the examinations two of the principal leaders have confessed, and that the authorities are now in possession of their plans, and that their destruction is now certain. It appears that they are entered at early as eight years of age, male and female children that each is instructed in a particular branch, and are sent to commit depredations in churches, on steam boats, &c! An Anglo-Jewish has been produced, given to Rose Alexis Chauvegard, for some specially ingenious robbery by him invented, and carried out successfully. This, you will say, is going far a-head of Oliver Twist and the Artful Dodger!

Considering the splendour and immense value of the ornaments which decorate certain religious shrines in this country, and combining this with the abject poverty, and the various gangs of thieves in a state of organisation—it is matter of wonder how very few sacrilegious robberies take place. This was not so extraordinary when the priests had their eyes daily and hourly upon their parishioners; but now, when their power is in partial decadence, it speaks volumes as to the advantages resulting from early moral tuition. However, a singular case of robbery has just taken place The old woman who attends to the parish church of St. Gery, on quitting the church doors at the usual hour, perceived a man, above the ordinary height, fast asleep on one of the stools. Surprised at this, she closed the doors of the church, and charged several persons to keep watch. While she was fetching the police. They entered the church, and arrested the sleeper, whose excuse was that he had fallen asleep the previous night, and the doors were closed. This explanation not being deemed satisfactory, the sleeper was placed in custody, and a search made, when it was discovered that the Virgin—apparelled in her most gorgeous robe and precious stones, for it was her fête day—had been literally stripped; despoiled of her crown: the child she sat upon, set round with valuable emeralds, had been torn from her neck, together with a pair of diamond earrings, and other ornaments and jewels. None of these were, however, discovered on the arrested man; but, in carefully searching the church, they were found concealed, with the exception of the earrings, beneath the stairs leading to the organ loft. The gold ornaments were broken, to take less room, and these were found confined in an iron vase, usually placed at the feet of the Virgin. The gentleman had made his predations by the moonlight shining through the painted windows; and, resting from his pious labours till the opening of the church, slept had overtaken him. Now this would appear, to any sane mind, a common case of sacrilegious robbery; but a miracle has been proclaimed achieved by the Madonna: the church is daily crowded with female zealots, and offerings are hourly placed on the shrine; sermons are preached; the parish of St. Gery has gained considerable honours by the attempted robbery; and, as the good people here search, all owing to the miraculous somnolency of the robber.

A grand manifestation of the medical body is at this moment in preparation. The faculty of Paris have in the imitative for the realisation of an idea, which, I think, will produce very happy results, if, as there is good reason to hope, the medical men in the provinces answer to the call which has been made for their co-operation. On the first of the approaching November there will take place a Medical Congress, which has for its object the centralisation of all the physicians, surgeons, and veterinarians of France, so that the law which is promised to be presented to the Chambers at the next session may offer as few objectionable points as possible. A permanent commission, for the organisation of this Congress, has been named by the delegates of the several medical associations of the Capital. To the treasurer of this commission all adhesions must be addressed. The most eminent men in Paris and in the departments have already given proofs of sympathy with this Congress, and there is every prospect that this grand manifestation will be imposing by its number and by the splendid talents of those who form its brightest portion.

As some stir has been made in England relative to the admission of the public to national buildings without the fees, perhaps the following remarks may cast a glimmering light upon the principle upon which similar affairs are settled here:—There are at Paris four monuments to which the public is admitted without the necessity of any card of entrée—the Pantheon, Arc de Triomphe de l'Etoile, the Obelisk of the Place de Vendôme, and the Column of July. To each of these monuments are attached guardians, ordinarily selected from amongst the old soldiers, named by the Minister of Public Works, and placed under the authority of the préfet de police. These guardians should be dressed in uniform No salary is allowed to these agents—no indemnity is accorded to them. In exchange for the expense which their employment imposes on them, the Administration permits them to receive from visitors any trifle which may be offered, but it is expressly interdicted to solicit or exact from the public the payment of any sum. This prescription is established particularly for the benefit of those soldiers, who not having the means of paying, and who, above all, others, have an interest in viewing them In case of any infraction of this regulation, and also where the guardian commits an act inconvenient to the public, he receives a notice, and after due examination is expelled, more especially if the guardian commits any guilty acts in consequence of intoxication. As regards the Basilique of St. Denis, the organisation is different. The Administration of Public Works have placed a guardian, who, like the others, may receive the offerings of the visitors; but there are, independently of him, other agents who depend, with whom he has to share; and, in short, the receipts are shared between the various dependants of the Basilique. The right of entrance to the interior of the Arc de Triomphe de l'Etoile during the representations of the Hippodrome, has raised direct reclamations on the part of the public and the guardians, and upon the observations presented by the Inspector of Public Monuments, the right will be tried before the Ministre de l'Intérieur, for the organisation of the spectacle pulace sixteen cabin and twenty four steerage passengers. We have not received any intelligence of her.

THE following is from the New York Herald :—"We have no further accounts from the seat of war in Mexico or Texas; nor from New Orleans nor Washington. Everything still remains in doubt, and enshrouded in mystery. Rumours are thickening of every kind and variety, but nothing tangible appears on the face of them. Some of the latest accounts state that the Mexicans have yet made no appearance on the Rio Grande; others fear that General Taylor is in danger."

ARRIVAL OF THE OVERLAND CALCUTTA MAIL.
INDIA AND CHINA.

The Overland Mail from Calcutta has arrived, bringing dates from India of the 5th, Bombay of the 7th, Madras of the 11th and Ceylon of the 13th of June. The early departure of the last mail, in consequence of the monsoon, has occasioned an interval between our present and last advices of nearly a month. The news is, however, not of comparatively little importance. The Punjaub continues in statu quo. A second attempt had been made upon the life of Goolab Singh. Jewahir Singh was still acting on the offensive, and had succeeded to the last accounts (July 30), taken the fort of Attock. The Avitable battal ons had been disbanded, and seemed dispose to resent that measure by fresh disturbances. The visit of Sir Henry Hardinge to the Upper Provinces, and the 50 Hoscahine army relief, were looked forward to with considerable interest, as likely to afford an indication of either war or peace. For the present the north west frontier remains quiet, and is likely to continue so, at least till after the Hindoo festival of the Dusserah, which is to take place in the beginning of October. Part of Sir Henry's establishment had already preceded him. He will not, as was originally proposed, be accompanied by any member of his council. The circumstance of his having ordered up a bridge of boats to Ferozepore has led to the inference that he intends to make a demonstration against Jewahir Singh and the Khalsa troops, should such a course seem expedient. Changes are in progress in other native states, which may possibly lead to important consequences.

A duel attended with fatal results, had taken place at Calcutta, between Lieut. Tulloch, of the 22nd regiment of Native infantry, and a Mr. Nelson of the Indian navy. The affair appears to have been of a most disgraceful character, both as to the origin and the mode in which it was conducted. The parties had had one hostile meeting without injury to either, when Lieut. Tulloch having horsewhipped and posted his antagonist, another meeting took place, which would seem to have been a mere farce. Charges are the second and a third party present at the duel are to be tried by the Supreme Court. The surviving principal had effected his escape from the country.

Two slight earthquakes had been felt at Calcutta. There is nothing new from Scinde. From Cabul, we learn that Akbar Khan had relinquished his idea of a pilgrimage to Mecca. Our intelligence from Beloochistan is comparatively unimportant. The Legislative Council has promulgated an act for abolishing the drawback on cotton exported from that port. The appointment of Major Outram, C.B., to the Lowl Mayor: Wallace, Esq., as a solicitor, who only arrived in India a few months ago. A rumour had been circulated by the Calcutta Englishman of disturbances at Hyderabad, arising out of a local dispute.

Our advices from China bring nothing new or important. The trade was lively, but the exports were almost at a stand still, for want of shipping. The British Admiral on that station (Rear-Admiral Sir Thomas Cochrane) had deemed it necessary to prosecute the editor of the Friend of China, for a libel, imputing to him parsimony in having bestowed only 100 dollars on the commander and crew of the trading schooner Fame, by whom they rendered important services to her Majesty's schooner Wolf, when aground. The proceedings terminated in the acquittal of the defendant.

DEATH OF WILLIAM UPCOTT, ESQ.—The gentleman died on Tuesday morning, after a short illness. The melancholy event took place at his residence at Islington. Mr. Upcott was for many years librarian to the London Institution, for which office he was eminently qualified by his extensive acquaintance with every department of literature.

RADCLIFFE CHURCH, BRISTOL.—We are glad to learn that contracts have been entered into, during the last week, with several tradesmen of Bristol, for commencing the restoration of this once magnificent and unique edifice under the direction of Messrs. Britton and Goodwin. The works will comprise, in the first place, the complete restoration of the large east window and one entire compartment, or savery, of the building, north and south, with its connecting walls, windows, roof, buttresses, parapets, pinnacles, panelling, &c. When completed, this portion will clearly show the effect of restoration; and, by its contrast with the adjoining parts of the church, will at the same time exempify the lamentable operation of time and neglect on the original materials.

THE WEATHER.—For some days past the weather has been improving. The late gales from the south west brought heavy rains, and considerable damage was done, both on sea and land. There is now again a prospect of continued fine weather during the remainder of the autumn. A few days, however, will suffice to bring up the arrears of the harvest. In England "harvest home" has been generally accomplished; in Scotland and Ireland the case is otherwise; but, as we have said, a few dry days more will suffice to conclude the harvest, which, on the whole, has been successfully accomplished.

THE POTATO CROPS ON THE CONTINENT.—In Silesia, and in many of the districts contiguous to the Baltic, it is stated, in an official report, the potato crops will turn out good. The same information is given of the teeming population of Bohemia. In Denmark appearances are most favourable. In Wirtemberg, Hesse, and the Duchy of Baden, the potatoes have scarcely been injured at all. They are not sold at a higher price than during the last year. In East Friesland, and in the upper part of the Kingdom of the Netherlands, the disease has been manifested, and with symptoms similar to those which appear in Belgium. The summer crops were tolerably good, but it is expected, that one fourth of the autumn crops will be lost. In the Rhenish provinces the disease has made its appearance, but under a milder aspect than in Belgium. Nassau and all the mountainous countries have not suffered less. In the Grand Duchy of Baden the potato crops are abundant, and are sold at a low price. The same may be said of Switzerland. In France the crops in general appear healthy. The disease has attacked the potatoes only in the north and a part of the east.

SALE OF RAILWAY SHARES IN COMPANIES NOT COMPLETELY SUBSCRIBED.—We are unacquainted by any legislative enactment, which puts a stop to the practice alluded to in this head last week, the opinion of the Attorney-General and Mr. Ogle, on the 24th question submitted to them, was made directly at variance with what it is in fact, and with what it ought to be in their reply to one of the queries. We now print the 5th question and the answer to it correctly :—

"5th. If the real or true cause of the act do not apply to railway companies, whether the sale of letters of allotment, bankers' receipts, or scrip, be or be not illegal, notwithstanding they are so excluded?" Being of opinion that the restrictive clauses 7th and 8th Vic., c. 110, apply to railway companies formed after the 1st of November last, it remains for us to observe, that as to companies established before the 1st of November, we do not think, independently of the statute, that the sale of letters of allotment, bankers' receipts, or scrip, would be illegal.

SUMMARY OF RAILWAY FACTS.—Constructive operations, on nearly all the new lines granted last Session, have been commenced, and will be in full operation before the close of the year. Many parts of the working population of the kingdom permanent supplies of winter work. According to one calculation that has been made, the total amount of money that will be set in circulation, or expended on the railways authorised by Parliament this year, is £29,000 000 sterling! The total length of new railways to be constructed is 1753 miles, which, added to the 1800 miles at present in operation, shows, that when the new lines of railway are in full employment, the total length, they have about half equalled them in capital the cost of construction. Big the line at present in existence having amounted to £70,000,000. It is estimated that the present profits of the London and Birmingham Railway alone, are something between £2 0 000 and £30,000 annually.—On the 30th the Ouzuz and Prague line (one of the Austrian government railways) was opened to the public for the first time. Its construction is the first step on the part of the Austrian Government to connect that empire with the North of Germany, and the last step towards connecting Vienna with Paris. The length of the line between Olmutz and Prague is 125 miles; it was commenced in Sept., 1842.—The electric telegraph is rapidly advancing over the country. It is already established, or in course of formation, for an extent exceeding 1000 miles, upon the South Eastern, South Western, Great Western, London and Birmingham, London and Croydon, London and Blackwall, Liverpool and Manchester, Grand Junction, South Devon, Yarmouth and Norwich, Maidstone and Ramsgate, Northampton and Peterborough, North Midland, Sheffield and Manchester, Preston and Wyre, Leeds and Manchester, Edinburgh and Glasgow, and Scottish Central railways.—1000 labourers are about to commence operations on the Richmond and West end Railway. The directors have announced that the line will be completed from Wandsworth to Richmond by Christmas next.—Yesterday week the Manchester and Birmingham Company commenced lighting up their third-class carriages, leaving other companies to follow their example.—The works along the whole line of the Ashford and Hastings continue in progress. It is stated that the directors expect to open the line to Canterbury by the end of the year, and to Margate and Ramsgate a few weeks afterwards.—The reduction of fares on the Manchester and Leeds has increased the number of travellers 26 per cent. during the last half year. The charge for a mile excursion from Scotchgarth, through Liverpool, to the Menai straits, upwards of 500 miles, was 13s 14d. Passengers are now carried on the Liverpool and Manchester, between the latter place and Fairfield, the first class at 1d. and the second class at 1½ per mile.—The Journal des Chemins de Fer announces that the North of England Company, almost at the great completion, have to take place in the Scotch and Queen Inns, had resolved the plan of uniting all the Company into one, or perhaps even of bidding for the line.—According to the same journal, the Leeds Company established by Mr. Mackenzie to propose for the Ipswich and Nantes line had pusitively refused to join the other Companies formed for the same purpose. The Paris and Lyons Railroad Companies hitherto known only to have in manner. The various schemes in agitation for a direct railway from London to Manchester, involve an expenditure of upwards of twenty-three millions sterling.

POLICE.

A PLAUSIBLE BEGGAR.—On Tuesday George Stratford, a man of respectable appearance and good address, was brought before the Lord Mayor at the MANSION HOUSE, upon a charge of having obtained money and clothes from the Rev. Michael Gibbs his lordship's son, under fraudulent pretences. Mr. Sturgeon, the principal clerk to the Mendicity Society, attended to prosecute the prisoner. The Rev Mr Gibbs, vicar of Christ Church, Newgate street, stated that on Saturday, the 6th of September, the prisoner called upon him and represented himself to be the Honourable Wm Stratford, declared that he was in a condition of extreme want, in fact next to starving; that he had called upon the Lord Mayor, but not finding his lordship at home, he had come to witness in the hope of receiving the assistance which would enable him to go into the service of Lord & Mr. Edwards, of Poundon, at some powder mills there, whose only ground of hesitation about forming an engagement with him was, that he had not better clothes. Witness gave the prisoner eighteenpence, and told him at what hour he could see and communicate with the Lord Mayor. On the same evening the prisoner returned to witness and stated that he had seen the Lord Mayor, and had exhibited a five shilling piece, which he said he had received from his lordship. Witness then gave him a bundle of clothes, consisting of coat, waistcoat, and trousers. The prisoner said upon receiving the clothes, that he should go at once to Marlow, to enter the service of Mr. Edwards, of Poundon inform witness or the Lord Mayor of the result of his application for the appointment. Some days afterwards the prisoner called at the Mansion house and stated that witness finding he had obtained the situation, and stood in need of six shillings in order to be enabled to remove his wife to Hounslow. Witness accordingly lent him six shillings, which he promised to return at the end of the week, but the promise was not performed, nor could he make his appearance, and it was subsequently ascertained that the statements had no foundation in fact.—William Horsford, an officer of the Mendicity Society, stated that he went to Hounslow to the powder-mills, and found that there was no Mr. Edwards there. He then called upon Mr. Curtis, the proprietor of the powder-mills in that place, to make inquiry, and was told that there was no such person there, and that no such person as Mr. Edwards had been known there for 27 years.—The Lord Mayor desired to be informed whether the prisoner was known to the establishment of the Mendicity Society.—Horsford replied that the man had been known to the Mendicity Society since about the year 1837, and added, that a begging petition had been found upon him, and that witness had known him as an assumed person who lived by that means, and one of whom had been lately tried at the Central Criminal Court.

The Lord Mayor: Now, prisoner, what have you to say in answer to this very serious charge?—The prisoner: My lord, I am the son and the heir of Aldborough, the son and heir of that nobleman, and I have been deserted by my father. I have a wife and family to support, and I have made every effort to support them. I have been down to the docks, and at all sorts of menial employments, and my father, although in the enjoyment of £16,000 a year, has wholly abandoned me. What could I do, my lord? I am in a state of utter destitution.—The Lord Mayor: You have stated that Mr. Sturgeon, the clerk of the Mendicity Society, stated that there was no truth in the assertion of the prisoner as to the legitimacy of his birth.—The prisoner: I am the son and heir of Lord Aldborough, and I have been deserted, together with my two sisters, by my father, who is now at Doncaster, and has £16,000 a year, clear property.—The Lord Mayor: You say nothing in explanation of your statement about the situation at Poundon.—The prisoner: I admit I was wrong there. I am guilty of having misrepresented in that instance; but I can prove that I have worked at the docks, and that I have been willing to undergo the greatest privations.—The officers of the Mendicity Society assured his lordship that the prisoner was an incorrigible beggar, and that he was in the habit of persisting with great apparent candour, in whatever statement he conceived best adapted to his object of working upon the sympathies of the humane and generous people who sbounded in London. As for the idea of labour, it never entered into the man's imagination for a moment, but he had a wonderful capability of varying the circumstances of his fantastic distresses, and so far could he called industrious.—The Lord Mayor: I consider the case a very bad one indeed. You came to me and mentioned, in the most plausible manner, certain circumstances as having occurred which had never taken place. I relieved what I considered to be your immediate necessities, and I told you to let me see you again. Then, as your conscience, let you have a sovereign, which you said you would return in a week; but I told you that the re payment would answer at the end of a month, when your wages at Hounslow would peacetate you to make restitution. In every thing you have acted the impostor. I know all about it, and I know with whom you went into a public-house, when you received the money which the recital of your pretended misfortunes wrung out of me, to that my experience of your conduct affords an additional argument in justification of the decision to which I came upon the evidence before me. We have here a multitude of real objects to exercise our pity upon, and I never like to see a rogue and vagabond, and sentence you to hard labour in Bridewell for three calendar months.—The prisoner: What could I do, my lord? I acknowledge that I deceived you; but what on earth could I do? I am the son and heir to the rank and forune of a nobleman, and I am completely destitute.—The prisoner was then removed from the bar, in bitter terms ascribing to his parent's unnatural conduct the whole train of his calamities.

THE WAR AGAINST THE FRUIT-SELLERS.—A young girl, about 15 years of age, was charge l at BOW-STREET, on Thursday, by police constable 93 F, with selling fruit in Exeter street, Strand, and obstructing the passengers. The constable stated that he had frequently warned the prisoner, who perceived in intringing on the forbidden ground, on which another person had a stand for selling fruit, for which he paid, and which, of course, was not a rogue and vagabond, and sentence you to hard labour in Bridewell for three calendar months.—The prisoner: What could I do, my lord? I acknowledge that I deceived you; but what on earth could I do? I am the son and heir to the rank and forune of a nobleman, and I am completely destitute.—The prisoner was then removed from the bar, in bitter terms ascribing to his parent's unnatural conduct the whole train of his calamities.

THE WAR AGAINST THE FRUIT-SELLERS.—A young girl, about 15 years of age, was charge l at BOW-STREET, on Thursday, by police constable 93 F, with selling fruit in Exeter street, Strand, and obstructing the passengers. The constable stated that he had frequently warned the prisoner, who perceived in intringing on the forbidden ground, on which another person had a stand for selling fruit, for which he paid, and which, of course, was not as one of the privileged classes, to obstruct the thoroughfare. The prisoner said that she had no other means of getting a livelihood, and that she did not obstruct the passengers. Mr. Hall said the public could not be obstructed, and, however painful it might be to the magistrate, the prisoner's obstinacy would force him to send her to prison. The prisoner was fined 2s., and in default of payment was locked up; her basket of fruit being ordered by the magistrate to be detained.

PULMONARY CONSUMPTION.—From the fourth annual report of the Hospital for Consumption and Diseases of the Chest, of which his Grace the Duke of Richmond is president, the following statistical facts may be gathered :—"Of the 60,000 deaths which occur every year in England and Wales from slow and lingering disease, about 36,000 are possibly due to pulmonary consumption; and as the duration of the disease, taking one case with another, is about two years, it follows that about 72,000 persons are constantly suffering from consumption; and of the 15,000 deaths occurring every year in the metropolis, about 5,600 arise from this fatal disease, and upwards of 11,000 persons, being about 1 in 170 of the entire population of the metropolis, are constantly wasting away under the actual pressure of this lingering malady. It may be well to add that many, very many, of these poor sufferers are the acknowledged victims of unventilated workshops, ill-constructed dwellings, long hours of work, and the want of open places for exercise and recreation."

FIRE AT HOXTON.—On Thursday a fire broke out, shortly before one o'clock, upon the premises belonging to Mr. Crafter, cheesemonger, situated at No. 171, High street, Hoxton Old Town. The inmates, consisting of several persons, being in their beds at the time, it was apprehended that some of them would be fatally burnt in the fire. As soon as the alarm had been aroused, the whole of them made their escape out of a window upon the small pent house over the shop, where they were forced to remain for some time, until assistance could be equalled the progress of the flames being at length accomplished, the residents, one and all, effected a safe retreat. The firemen set to work, and soon got the fire out, but not before the whole of the valuable stock in trade was nearly consumed. Mr. Crafter, junior, widow of Charles Al anson, Esq., of Braham Bigin. Mrs. Lawrence was born at Kensington, on the 18th February, 1781, and died at Studley Park, on the 30th July, 1845. By her will, she gives and bequeaths to Rev. Stanley Fountain's, Ripon, Lincoln, Littlethorpe-with Whitcliffe, Aldfield, and places south of the river Ure, to the Earl de Grey, except Kirkby Malzeard, the rooms of Fountain's Earth and Studley, which are given to the Earl of Ripon. To the latter nobleman she gives also her estates in the neighbourhood of Ripon, north of the river Ure, including Hatton Convers, Sharrow, Copt Hewick, &c. &c. To each of these noblemen the property is limited for life, and then to go to Lord Goderich, son of the Earl of Ripon, and, in default of issue here, to the family of the Wailers. Her estates in Leicestershire are given to Sir Cornewall Lewis, her estates at Kirby Hesketh and Clint, to Mr. Waler. Also legacies to the following persons.—The Vice Chancellor of England and fanny, £30,000; Rev. James Charnock, £15,000 to Rev. Stephen Charnock, £5000; Rev. Thomas Charnock, £5000; Rev. Richard Charnock, £6000; to the family of the Robsons, of Helby, £9000; to her steward, Mr. Morton, £1600; to her physician, Dr Tunn, £1000; to the Ripon Diocesan Building Society, £2000; Ripon Dispensary, £1000; York Lunatic Asylum, £1000; Harrogate Hospital, £1000; Leeds infirmary, £1000, Middlesex Hospital, £1000; the Rev. Robert Poole, £1000; Miss Ellis, £1000; Miss Kelly, £1000; Rev. J. Chase, an aunt for his family, £2000; with legacies to the families of Sir Robert Rickett, Sir W. Young, and many others. All the pecuniary legacies are charged upon her funded property, which is understood to be very large. She also gives annuities to her domestic servants, according to their lengths of service, varying from £10 to £70 a year.

A SUCCESSOR TO GENERAL TOM THUMB.—There is now in the Metropolis a dwarfish boy, named Richard Gurney: he is a native of Kittisford, near Taunton, his height is thirty three inches, and his age is stated, by his guardian, to be fifteen years. He has not the gravity of "the General," but, dressed in a superb court-suit of velvet, satin, and gold embroidery, he may serve for the nonce.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

THE EXPERIMENTAL SQUADRON.—The experimental fleet, under the command of Admiral Parker, has arrived at Plymouth from Cork. The St. Vincent, Queen, Canopus, Superb, Vanguard, Albion, and Rodney, accompanied by the steamers Hottler and Stromboli, came in and anchored in the Sound. At eight the flag ship, the St. Vincent, saluted the Port-Admiral, Sir John Went, which was duly acknowledged. The fleet have a very noble and imposing appearance, and, from their magnitude, seem to diminish the area of the Sound, and bring the breakwater much nearer the northern shore. Of the many qualities of these ships the most striking opinions are still promulgated. As a general rule, naval officers dislike the build of the Surveyor's ships, because they roll so much; and for this fault some of them confound the construction of the Vanguard, Queen, and Albion, in no measured terms. Others, who appear disinterested, place the Queen at the head of the fleet for speed in sailing; the Albion second, and give the Canopus and Rodney equal claims to come next to the Albion. The last on the list is, without doubt, the Trafalgar, a ship which, though stiff in a heavy sea, has no pretensions as a fast sailer. The tardiness of the Vanguard is undoubtable, as she formerly beat every thing in the Mediterranean. The sailing of the Superb has improved since her masts were raked a little at Cork. Rear Admiral Hyde Parker, C B., struck his flag on board the St. Vincent, 120, Captain Rowley, on Monday at noon, and left immediately in the Hottler steam sloop, Commander Smith, for Portsmouth. Rear Admiral Sir Samuel Pym's flag was hoisted on board the St. Vincent the same day. Sir Samuel visited Admiral Parker in the forenoon. The flag of the Port-Admiral, Sir John West, was struck on board the Queen, 110, Captain Sir Baldwin Walker, and has been hoisted on board the Caledonia, 120, Captain M. H. Dixon, Sir R. Pym's having been struck on board that ship.

THE AMERICAN SCREW STEAMER "MARMORA."—This vessel, which is daily expected from America, is fitted with Ericsson's propellers, on nearly the same principle as the screws of the Great Britain, and carries a low pressure engine, a new invention, by which the consumption of coal is comparatively small. The entire steam fixtures—boilers, engine, coal bins, and all, do not cover a space of more than sixteen square feet. A more compact and well-arranged engine has never been seen. The main and upper decks have a clear sweep, unencumbered by coal or steam machinery of any kind. The cabins are comfortable and airy, and fitted up with a great deal of taste and neatness, and are capable of accommodating 43 passengers. Her size is registered at 400 tons; she is 24½ feet beam, 10½ feet hold, and 145 feet keel; engine, 185 horse power. She presents a very neat appearance; her rigging is that of a barque—lofty, and exceedingly well trimmed, and capable of carrying her ten knots, with a fair wind. Her destination is to Constantinople, whither she will proceed, after making a stay of a few weeks at Liverpool, having been contracted for by the Turkish Government, to ply between Constantinople and Paris.

GREAT RUSSIAN RAILWAY.—The longest tract of railway ever contemplated in Europe, is that from St. Petersburg to Odessa, extending over an uninterrupted line of 1600 miles. It will connect the Baltic and the Black, and consequently the Caspian Seas, traversing three different zones of temperature; and a person may then leave the Russian capital in the depth of winter, and arrive on the same rail at Odessa, in warm, nay hot weather. It is, moreover, the beginning of what may really be termed an overland route, connecting, in fine, the Russian Metropolis and Ispahan. The Emperor Nicholas takes great interest in this gigantic plan.

MADEIRA.—THE VINTAGE AND THE VOYAGE.

Where rolls the vast Atlantic in his pride,
A gent bow'd afar from Afric's coast,
And lashes free as air his waters wide
Careering crested ...ke some gallant host;
There, on the confluence of the torrid zone,
Yet tempered soft by milder Northern skies,
By many zephyrs visited alone,
The cliffs of an enchanted Isle arise.
The Ocean Flower; by T. M. Hughes. (Just published.)

September and October are two of the most interesting months of the year, to the Madeirese, as well as to the visitors to their beautiful island. In the former month takes place the vintage, and in the latter, a considerable number of invalids resort to the health giving clime, returning in April and May.

The account of the discovery of Madeira, with the romantic history of the two English lovers, and to their descendants who upon the island, is, doubtless, well known to the majority of our readers; still, the latter story is but a pleasing fiction; for, according to Mr. Hughes's historical details prefixed to his poem of "The Ocean Flower," the romantic legend has no foundation on more substantial basis than a very undefined tradition; and all his efforts have been unavailing to discover the slightest vestige of any confirmatory circumstance.

Although Mr. Hughes has thus disturbed an attractive fable, he has supplied us with details of the discovery of equal interest, and upon far better authority. The Portuguese historian, Gaspar Frutuoso, a Funchal, he says, of "bisque impenetrawel," which Madeira presented to the eyes of Zargo and his companions, on their discovery of the island in 1419.

"A vegetation of the most luxuriant and indigenous and infrue'- ferous plants, for the most part unknown in Europe; and raised to a prodigious height the ancient and majestic cedar, the laurel, ti, vinhatico, azevinho, ...nho, teixo, pedernaes, and dragoeiro, intermingled with those beautiful shrubs, the folhado, faya, urze, myrtle, and uveira, and forming thus one continuous and impenetrable forest. The thicket was carpeted by innumerable species of flowering plants, whose variegated flowers literally flowering, the arbutus mingling with the herbarea, the feto, the musgo, and the agarico; in the midst of which rose the silva, the cra, the corrioia, the alegro, and other evergreen shrubs, whose variegated flowers, with their festoons from branch to branch, and gave new shade to a lovely land all clothed with vegetation—here rose to innumerable springs of pure and salubrious water—there was no quadruped or reptile to be found, and scarcely an amphibious animal. But over these silent solitudes soared various birds of prey, and ten different sorts of singing birds warbled their sweet notes in the woods, and made them vocal with their music the huge volcanic rocks which line the shore, and Nature showed her affluence in the variety of the insect tribes."

Madeira is but 38½ miles at its greatest length; 12½ miles at its extreme breadth, and 96 miles in circumference; yet, within this sea-girt paradise are assembled so many of Nature's wonders, as to induce us to believe that

"Armida's garden is no poet's dream."

The grandeur of the coast is not the least remarkable feature about this romantic region. Mr. Hughes speaks of ocean "rolling in its thunder 'gainst its basalt shores;" and its black bold masses give it no every side a peculiar air of awful sublimity. Its highest point, Pico Ruivo, is 6069 feet above the sea-level; and one of its Cabes (Girao) is about 1000 feet above the sea, being considerably the highest cliff in the world.

The population of Madeira has increased some thousands during the last seven years, by emigration to Demerara and Brazil: its present population is estimated by Mr. Hughes (who dates from Funchu, May 3, 1845, to be about 120,000.

Funchal, the capital of the island, lies on a crescent bay of the southern coast, with the Serra stretching far above it. The place was called Funchal (Funcha, the quantity of fennel which grew on the spot. The town consists of a pretty wide street along the sea shore, where there are several good buildings, and numerous small lanes, which extend to a considerable distance up the side of the hill. The whole place is defended by four forts, and has eight churches, and several convents: the principal churches are the cathedral, St. Peter's and the college church of the Jesuits, the latter nearly filling the square, and being the largest building in the capital is a regal building, beautifully situated, and surrounded by charming grounds. In the midst of the town is an open square, planted with splendid exotics. The Peak Castle, the Mount Convent, and the Loo Rock, are, however, the most prominent and picturesque objects in the views of the Funchal. Its situation under the formidable Serra exposes it to fearful accidents from floods in the winter season, the evidences of these disasters are to be seen in the ravines formed by the three rivers upon which Funchal is curiously situated. The floods of 1803 and 1842 are the most disastrous on record.

The capital of Madeira has been unfortunate in "Successive Lisbon Governments," says Mr. Hughes, "have, for many years past, treated this fine island with neglect; and one of the most delusive measures ever practised was that by which the island was made a Colony to the status dignity of a Province of the Kingdom. The consequence is that it has neither colo ial advantages, nor is it treated as an integral part of the realm. The port or Funchal is still exposed to all the blasts of the Atlantic, and the whole island coast has not a single respectable harbour. The first measure of importance for Madeira is the conclusion of the long discussed tariff convention between England and Portugal, by which her wines will be admitted into our ports, at a reduced duty; and the next is the connection of the Loo Rock with the Pontinha, by means of a solid sea wall, which, at a moderate expense, would furnish Funchal with a secure harbour."

The means of access to the island, and of departure from it in the fitting season, are now complete. The first illustration, at page 196, shows a specimen of the accommodation, viz., the sailing packet, named the Dart, built for the Madeira service, and much admired for her symmetrical beauty. This fine packet ship is 242 tons register, and was built at Wivenhoe, in Essex, by Mr. Thomas Harry, according to the peculiar requirements of the eminent practical surveyor, Mr. Thomas Morgan. The Dart has a long reliable body, with fine ends. Sailing qualities have not alone been considered, for the exclusion of these is equally important, that particularly of effic iency in encountering heavy weather. She is easy of motion, and, being always dry on deck in any weather, to the comfort of the passengers, they will be enabled at all times to remain on her long quarter-deck. Her accommodations consist of separate state rooms, with very airy ladies' and dining cabins, the latter twenty four feet long, combining every requisite to make a sea voyage agreeable. A vessel like the Dart is preferable in every respect, for invalids, to a steam-packet, with at its motion, noise, vapour, and often crowded state of the berths

Funchal from Mr. Hughes's capita little work. The town still retains the singular peculiarity of being the only city in existence where no wheeled carriage is to be found. Burthens are conveyed upon sledges, drawn by small mountain oxen; and the genus homo rides on horseback, in palanquins, or in hammocks. This peculiarity arises from the fact of the Serra nearly surrounding the town, and rising precipitously over it. There is no theatre in the place, but private theatricals are occasionally got up; and, not long since, our highly-gifted dramatist, Mr. Sheridan Knowles, delivered here a course of lectures on the drama. There are a Philharmonic Society, and a Portuguese Club; but there is no café in the island. The public walks are invitingly planted with trees; but pony-riding and picnic parties are the favourite amusements.

"The standard of religion," according to Mr. Hughes, "is, unhappily, low. The native clergy are supine and perfunctory in the discharge of their duties. The efforts at proselytism recently made by Dr. Kalley have been defeated by the stringent interference of the Government, but were of great use in applying a stimulus to the lethargic clergy. The present Bishop of Madeira is a pious and active ecclesiastic, who has availed himself of the temporary religious ferment to incite his clergy to regular habits of useful preaching and catechetical instruction, and as well as to inculcate a more rigid observance of the Sabbath."

The Madeirese are an athletic, hardy, and well-formed race, without being handsome. We annex a specimen of the costume of a peasant girl; its most striking peculiarity is the carapuça, or little skull-cap of blue cloth (worn also by the men), which sits on the head very lightly, it is surmounted by a slender peak, rising from the centre of the head, and of the oddest possible appearance. Its aspect is like that of an inverted funnel, though it may serve for dividing the sun's rays, and thus preventing a coup de soleil. But the address with which it is worn in a gale is astonishing, and it is, undoubtedly, set to the wind: the women wear it very coquettishly, and pride themselves much on its make and style. Their petticoats are red, blue, or variously striped, all dyed in the island with indigenous articles. The bust is braced in with a neat red or blue corset, elegantly worked with beads and embroidery. The little capa, or tippet, is red or blue, according to the district; the boots of yellow, soft wash-leather, fit loosely round the leg, but are well made in the foot: and the chemisette is buttoned neatly with two Lisbon gold studs. The entire costume is graceful and picturesque.

The salubrity of the climate of Madeira has long been proverbial. There are only 73 days in the year on which any rain falls: and such is the mildness, that swallows do not migrate from the island. The most remarkable circumstance is the equability of temperature, which gives Madeira an advantage over every other locality; the range from November, 1844, to April, 1845, was from 65½ to 66 41-58 deg. The excellence of the climate as a winter residence for pulmonary and other patients has been attested so far back as 1775; it has been much questioned by Sir James Clark, who, however, never visited the Island, and his remarks, though able, are exaggerated. In confirmed Phthisis, the climate of Madeira can only produce an alleviation of the distressing symptoms, and a comparative but slight prolongation of life: it may, however, be resorted to with great advantage in all cases of incipient pulmonary disease.

The produce of Madeira is too various for us to enumerate. The variety of wines is very great, and it is necessary to visit the Island to estimate their excellence. Thus, we have the Sercial, a strong, dry wine, of great body and flavour, and very fine aroma, drank only in perfection when 16 years old. Next is the Madeira, commonly so called, which is produced from many different qualities of grape; then, the London Particular; Bual, the finest dinner wine in the world; Malmsey, produced in very small quantity; and Tinta, combining the qualities of fine Port and Claret. There are, also, wines of inferior mark. Arrow-root and Sago grow here in abundance: Madeira seems, in short, "the paradise of invalids." The Shaddock and Pine-apple ripen in the open air; Strawberries grow in abundance; and the Guava and Custard-apple may be obtained from private quintas. Tea and tobacco are grown only as curiosities; but the Madeira coffee is a magnificent production, and fully equal to the best Mocha. Turtle is abundant, but not of the finest quality. The Island flowers are truly splendid, and include the Cardinal, the Eternelles, Camellia, China and Japan Roses, &c.

The Vintage takes place in the month of September. The grapes are usually first trodden under foot in a trough, they are then placed in a press, and the juice which is extracted is put into casks the same day to ferment. The vines are grown, mostly, in the valleys, and upon the slopes of the lower hills; trained upon terraces and corridors, or over trellises of cane, placed horizontally, about four feet from the ground, and set in deep trenches. One-seventh of the entire vine-crop is devoured by rats and lizards, who are cunning enough to prefer the finest grape.

MADEIRESE COSTUME.

One of the modes in which the vines are grown, is shown in the large Engraving of a Marine Villa, with arches supporting trellis-work, through which are seen the vessels in the Bay of Funchal. Opposite the town, the steep shingle beach is ill adapted for sea-bathing, for which purpose this villa was originally solely built; it lies about a mile and a quarter from the town, in a snug and beautiful little bay, fronting the south, and backed with cliffs, which have, from time to time, fallen in, and formed this sheltered nook: here the north-east wind is never felt, but it is fanned by the mild southern breezes from the Atlantic.

Here sea-bathing, (in fact, the only place in the island at all within the reach of the invalid,) may be enjoyed with every comfort. The soft volcanic rock (pedra molle) is hollowed out into baths, which, as the rise and fall of the tide is here seven feet, are filled with a fresh supply of water every tide, and the bather is not exposed to the shock of the almost constant surf.

Mr. Hughes, we perceive, anticipates, from the recent removal of certain obstructions, a considerable extension of the popularity of Madeira as a resort for English tourists. He observes:—

"Visitors to Madeira from England will be immediately struck with the singular absence of that excitement which belongs to English society, and will, probably, often repair to the turret or small observatory with which the roofs of most houses are supplied, to catch with their telescopes the first sight of a British sail, with its cheerful flag, to appease the yearning for home. But this very quietude is the invalid's best safeguard. English ships repair more frequently to the island now that the onerous health-dues have been removed, and when the inevitable reduction of tariffs follows, Madeira will be a little England."

The vegetation of the Azores is of luxuriance akin to that of Madeira. We annex a fine specimen—a Garden Scene from St. Michael's.

ELY CATHEDRAL.

The sunshine, through the lofty windows stealing,
Lit up that vast and venerable fane—
Ely's Cathedral—in dark clouds and rain
Wrapped lately, and shut up from joyous feeling,
In its soft progress—all around revealing
Beauty or majesty unmasked before—
It shed its type of heavenly comfort o'er
Three kindred kingdom's sons, together kneeling.

Oh may that Church, episcopal and pure,
One mother of that kneeling company—
In essence one, in name and office three—
'Midst storm and darkness still endure:
Be comforted of Christ in God's good time,
And share the sunshine of a heavenlier clime.

SOUTH-WEST TRANSEPT OF ELY CATHEDRAL, RESTORED

Before we proceed to describe the South-west Transept of this Cathedral, of which we annex an illustration, our readers will not be disinclined to tread a shorter description of the Cathedral generally, of which it forms a part. The recent opening of the railway to Ely and to Norwich has so facilitated the haunt of travellers, both on business or pleasure, to these two ancient cities, that what they contain has become a matter of great curiosity, and is likely to be explored by many thousands.

The Cathedral of Ely partakes of the styles of almost every class or age of the architecture of the middle ages, and forms a complete study of the mode of church-building of our Saxon, Norman, or English ancestors.

The characteristics of the style of the builders previously to the Norman Conquest, are to be traced in various portions of the edifice, but are so obliterated by time or subsequent alterations, that they are difficult to be followed. The Great Western Tower, up to the first battlement, is of the Norman age, and so are the South-west Transept (the North-west Transept no longer exists), the Nave, and its Aisles, except the windows of the second tier, and those of the lower tier, all but three on the south side. The greatest part of the North Transept, and the South Transept, excepting some of the windows, the arches of the Grand Door, on the south side, the remains of the Chapter-house, are all of Norman architecture. The early English style, generally called the "Gothic," embracing the reigns of Kings John, Henry III., and Edward I.; or, about a hundred years from A.D. 1200, to A.D. 1300, are to be seen in the Portico of the Western Entrance, anciently called the "Galilee;" in three windows on the east side of the South Transept; in the six eastern arches with their aisles; in the remains of the Monuments of Bishop Northwold, Bishop Kilkenny, and Bishop De Ludâ; and in some portion of the ruins of the Cloister.

The Ornamental English Style, which extended from the commencement of the fourteenth century to the middle of the fifteenth, including some part of the reign of Edward I., and the reigns of Edward II., Edward III., Richard II., Henry IV., Henry V., and Henry VI., is to be seen in the octagonal building and turrets on the Great Tower, on the stone casing of the arches and columns of the Tower, on the Octagon and Lantern, on the three arches to the east of them, on the stalls, on the windows of the lower and second tier of the six eastern arches, and in the monument of Bishop Hotham

The Florid English style is visible in the Monuments of Bishop Redman, and in that of Tiptoft, each of Worcester; in the Chapel of Bishop Alcock, and in the Chapel of Bishop West.

This discrepancy of styles, which in a modern edifice would be unpleasing, is in such buildings as this Cathedral almost always to be met with. To the perhaps incongruous introduction of a variety of styles in architecture, of the ages from the 10th to the 16th century, the severity of criticism is not, however applicable; the mixture of styles denotes the progress of taste and science, and is not only ornamental but useful, as an illustration of the national advance in art.

A modern writer has very judiciously explained wherefore this discrepancy exists, and made a satisfactory apology for its existence.

"It is well known, that those who conducted the reparations, improvements, and enlargements of our cathedral churches had no notion of assimilating the restored, or added, parts to the style of the original structure. Everything is in the taste of the age in which it was executed. The result is, that most of those churches exhibit an incongruous mixture of discordant styles. Different churches have departed in different degrees from original uniformity; some but inconsiderably, others much and variously. There were sundry causes for this diversity. A cathedral church was many years in being built. What was begun in the time of one Bishop, was continued in that of a second and third, and finished under a fourth or fifth. By that time, a change of style might have taken place. Most of them have at different times suffered great damage by fires or violent storms. Many have been greatly injured, or even laid waste, in those furious contests which sometimes arose between the monks and the townsmen. To these necessary occasions of repair or restoration, may be added, the numerous voluntary additions and improvements made by the zeal of the Convents or the munificence of Prelates. As each of these several styles superseded, or rather, grew out of the preceding gradually, it is not easy to fix for the termination of any one of them, and the commencement of the next, a certain and definite date which shall not be liable to exception."

The date of the oldest building at Ely may be the year 673, and of the latest, 1584; an it may be as well to say that these dates, or as near to them as possible, are all ascertained by authentic history or original records still in existence, and not merely by conjecture or comparison.

The Cathedral may be divided into the following parts, which will facilitate our readers, and those who may visit it, in their comprehension of shape and peculiarities:—The West Front; the Galilee, or Portico; the interior of the West, or Great Tower; the South-west Transept, which extends from one side of the lower part of this Tower, and of which we have given an illustration; the Nave; the Aisles of the Nave; the great Transepts; the Octagon; and Lantern. The original Lantern, or Octagon Tower, fell in, in the year 1322; the present one was then rebuilt. The Choir was formerly beneath this Lantern, and continued there until 1769, when it was removed to its present place—the extreme eastern end of the Cathedral. The Ante-Choir, the Choir, the aisles of the Choir, the Chapels or shrines, the various monuments, &c. &c., all which are deserving of the attention of every person to whom monastic architecture is a matter of pleasure or profession.

The South-west Transept is entered by a door, which has been lately opened in a grand arch of the same form and dimensions as that in the nave. The variety and magnificence of its decorations show that it was destined to a noble purpose in the religion of those by whose munificence it was constructed. Perhaps, it was here that the monks assembled for solemn procession to the high altar, and, probably, there was a further reason. Not many years ago, there was a communication between this Transept and the North-east wing of the Bishop's Palace, over the road—which road is still called, from that circumstance, the "Gallery." It was found to be a very inconvenient obstruction, and was taken away. That building was, indeed, of an age far later than that of the church; but it is likely that, from the earliest time, there had been something of the sort. This transept, after having been, for many years, suffered to go into decay, and used as a lumber-house for rubbish, and after having been long blocked up, has been restored, by the public spirit of the Dean and Chapter, called into active operation by the zeal of the Rev. Edward Boyer Sparke, one of the Canons; at this moment, it presents the appearance given in the accompanying view of its interior. The same rev. gentleman has recently presented a window of painted glass for the south-east angle of the Lantern, forty feet in height, and is about to present another for the decoration of this Transept. It will be seen from the illustration, that the Eastern side of the Transept contains five tier of arches, the upper tier and that below it resembling the "Triforia" or "Nunneries," of several of our cathedrals, in their external form. These tiers of arches partake of different styles of architecture—the Norman, the pointed, and the trefoil arch. At the end of the Transept are rows of arches in the manner of pilasters, whose mouldings of different styles, and two tiers of Triforia. On the western side are three tiers of arches, all of the Norman form. The roof is flat, divided into square compartments; the door, which is very fine, is at the extremity, in the western corner. Taking this Cathedral as a whole, it is one of the grandest, and in appearance, at a short distance from it, one of the most imposing in the kingdom. It stands on an eminence, rising nobly from a level country, and commanding from the top of the Western Tower a view of many miles on all sides. It is surrounded with venerable forest trees and buildings as ancient as itself; and when it is considered that the greater part of it was completed before the Cathedral of Salisbury was commenced, it has claims to respect from the antiquary and the historian which few other similar structures can boast.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS, RECENTLY DECEASED.

THE BISHOP OF BATH AND WELLS.

The Right Rev. George Henry Law, Bishop of Bath and Wells, was the seventh son of Dr. Edmund Law, Bishop of Carlisle, by his wife Mary, daughter of John Christian Esq., of Unerigg in the county of Cumberland. The Bishop of Carlisle was also father of Dr. John Law, Bishop of Elphin, and of Edward Law, Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench, and first Lord Ellenborough; consequently the Bishop of Bath and Wells, whose death we now record, was uncle to the present Lord Ellenborough, and to the Hon. Mr. Law, the Recorder of London.

George Henry Law, the subject of this notice, was born on the 12th of September, 1761. At the usual age he went to the University, obtained a fellowship at Catherd hall, Cambridge, and, as is considered that the greater part of it was completed before the Cathedral of Salisbury was commenced, it has claims to respect from the antiquary and the historian which few other similar structures can boast.

He was successively Archdeacon of Bath, Dean of Gloucester, and Bishop of Chester, from which he was translated to the see of Bath and Wells in 1824. As a Bishop, Dr. Law discharged his duties with earnest assiduity, and as a spiritual peer, he was, until prevented by the infirmities of age, a close attendant in the House of Lords, and he took an active part in parliamentary debate. Though a Whig in regard to State affairs, the Right Rev. Prelate ever showed himself a Tory in Church matters. He strenuously opposed Catholic Emancipation and all alteration in the law of Tithes. During the latter years of his life the venerable Bishop became, through age, unequal to discharge the functions of his episcopal office, and they were deputed to the Bishop of Salisbury.

The Bishop of Bath and Wells died at his cottage residence at Banwell, on the 22nd inst. By his wife Jane, eldest daughter of General Adeane, he leaves issue, beside four daughters, three sons, who are all clergymen and dignitaries of the Established Church.

THOMAS OSBORNE DAVIS, ESQ.

Thomas Osborne Davis was a gentleman of old and honourable descent, both on the maternal and the paternal side. His mother's family was a branch of the Atkins of Firville, in the county of Cork. His great-great-grandfather, Sir Jonathan Atkins, Knt., of Girvesdale, in the county of York, was Governor of Guernsey; he died in 1702, aged ninety-nine, and left, by his first wife, Mary, second daughter of Sir William Howard, of Naworth Castle, Cumberland, and sister of the first Earl of Carlisle, three sons, the second of whom, Richard Atkins, settled in Ireland, at Faunderg, in the county of Cork. This Richard's grandson, Richard Atkins, Esq., of Ballyandrew, near Donerraile, had, with other issue, a daughter, Mary, who was married, on the 8th July, 1802, to James Thomas Davis, Esq., a surgeon in the Royal Artillery, and Acting Deputy-Inspector of Ordnance Hospitals in the Peninsula. This gentleman, who was the representative of an ancient Buckinghamshire family, originally from Wales, died at Exeter, the 27th Sept., 1814, and left three sons and one daughter. The eldest son is John Atkins Davis, Esq., an officer of rank in the medical department of the Royal Artillery; and the third son, Thomas Osborne Davis, is the lamented subject of this notice.

Thomas Osborne Davis was born at Mallow, in the county of Cork. From the early days of his boyhood, he felt, and gave expression to those impassioned feelings of nationality which formed that great characteristic of his future life—his earnest attachment to what he deemed the principles of Irish liberty. After passing through Trinity College, Dublin, he devoted his whole time to the acquisition of political knowledge. He was called to the Irish Bar in Michaelmas Term, 1838, but was too immersed in politics to engage much in legal pursuits. His name was the Nation newspaper—that singular offspring of the recent agitation in Ireland, and the Repealers' most daring advocate, which puts forth its arguments and its aspirations in sounding tones; a journal, in prose, fiercely energetic, and sometimes eloquent; in verse, often too high flown—now and then poetic. Of the Nation, Mr. Davis was the principal writer, and to it he contributed some of its most remarkable prose and verse compositions. He was, also, the animating soul of that more youthful, and wildly enthusiastic portion of the Repealers, which has assumed the name of "Young Ireland."

In the National Association, Mr. Davis's strength of character gave him an independent position. Though ever ready to express great respect and veneration of O'Connell, he often ventured to boldly differ from the all-potent Liberator. Of this the celebrated discussion on the New Colleges Bill presented a memorable example. In fact, though many among the actors on the troubled scene in Ireland filled a larger space in the public eye, none, we believe, with the single exception of O'Connell himself, wielded a more puissant influence.

The death of Mr. Davis, though it has come on the public by surprise, was scarcely of a sudden character. For some time in a delicate state of health, he was taken seriously ill about a fortnight prior to his demise, but his struggle with the disease was so far successful that he went out for a few hours the Thursday before his death. This brought on a relapse, yet still was he so hopeful of recovery that the following day, writing to a friend, he spoke of his anticipated restoration to health, and said that he very soon would be "once more at work for Ireland." But fate willed that the ardent spirit of this Irish genius was to speedily seek a more peaceful abode; and for Davis expired on the 16th inst., in his thirty-second year, amid the unfeigned sorrow of his countrymen of all shades of political party.

The Freeman's Journal, the paper most struggling opposed to the Repealers and their measures, pays the following tribute to his memory:—"Both employed," says that journal, "in a cause which our pages must ever abhor, we have seldom met Mr Davis's talents were of a quality which necessarily enforced the admiration of all parties. Great vigour of intellect, great clearness of thought and purity of language, intense sincerity, and a sublime honesty characterised his political writings, and, if there was something to be forgiven on the score of tendency, still the learning, the science, the accomplishments, nay, the very enthusiasm, of the gifted individual disarmed the severity of censure, and disposed the mind to wish that talents so admirable were arrayed in a better cause, and to hope that time and experience might rectify his views."

The remains of Mr. Davis were interred on the 18th inst. at the Mount Jerome Cemetery, Dublin, the funeral, a public one, was attended by the Lord Mayor, the members of the Bar club, and by an immense concourse of the personal friends of the deceased. Tories, Whigs and Repealers, who seemed to have laid aside all party feeling in the general grief displayed on the occasion. We were, of course, opposed to the violent opinions of Mr. Davis, but we cannot but feel that Ireland had, that day, cause to mourn, when she saw this, her son of much promise, so amiable in disposition, so capacious in soul, dead before his prime, and, scarcely yet tried as orator or statesman, laid in an untimely grave.

PETER GREENALL, ESQ.

This gentleman was an eminent glass-manufacturer in Lancashire. He represented in Parliament the borough of Wigan. His death, which occurred on the 18th instant, was fearfully sudden: on the morning of that day, he was apparently in perfect health, and was taking lunch at his house at St. Helen's, with his daughter and a friend, their guest. After drinking a glass of wine, he complained of a violent pain in his head; his countenance became flushed; in a few seconds he turned deadly pale; his servants removed him to a sofa, and before medical aid could be procured he was a corpse.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 27, 1845.

A STRIKING example of the erroneous policy of sacrificing one branch of commercial industry to enrich another, is furnished by the last accounts of the very different circumstances of the Wine-growers and the Iron-masters of France. The last are flourishing in all the luxuriance of high prices; the former are declining rapidly into insolvency and decay. The Iron-masters cannot supply the quantity of metal required for the construction of the many railways in progress or in contemplation; importation of the material from England or Belgium is restricted by enormous duties—not for the benefit of the revenues of the State, but the protection of the proprietors of mines and forges. The consequence has been, that these countries do not receive one of the natural productions of France—her wines, as they would otherwise certainly do. The exportation of wine from the South of France has for some years been decreasing; the vine-growing estates are loaded with mortgage debts, and the proprietors are struggling with heavy liabilities and diminished returns. They are sacrificed to the iron interest, and are beginning to be aware of it. At the first meeting of the "Congres Vinicole," for the present year, held on the 16th at Bordeaux, the proprietors stated their deplorable case to the Duke de Nemours, who was present, concluding by denouncing the policy of the Legislature and Government of France in the following terms:—

Whilst foreign nations refuse our products because their own are excluded at our frontiers by unreasonable protecting tariffs, the internal legislation of our country is guilty of the double injustice of levying enormous duties and restricting the consumption of our products, which could alone enable us to pay them.

While this is the case, with so large a portion of what may be called the Landed Interest of France, it is made quite evident that the artificial prosperity of the Mining Interest is by no means a national or general good; here is the proof in an extract from a daily paper:—

Several of the Paris journals notice, in connexion with the railway question, the high price of iron. The Siècle, in particular, states that, not only is the price of iron for us in a great obstacle to enterprise, but that it will be utterly impossible to obtain the quantity of it which will be required for the next four years without the erection of additional ironworks, demand no enormous capital, and which probably could not be raised by individuals. Our contemporary sees no other remedy than permission to introduce rails from England and Belgium.

This war of hostile duties, which nations keep up against each other, is almost as fatal to their true prosperity as the war of weapons. They have, happily, outgrown something of that disposition to engage in the work of mutual destruction by physical means; it is to be hoped, they may in time cease so use legislation as the instrument of reciprocal mischief. There is a difficulty as to which country should take the first step; England might, with less risk, remove some of the restrictions on the importation of French wines, and trust to the common sense of the trading community of France and the natural course of things for the rest. It is understood that the iron interest is, in France, a very strong one, in the political sense of the word, but the imperative necessities of the "railroad" age, which must and will be supplied, will, probably, force on it some measure which will admit others to a competition with them in their present virtual monopoly, especially as the execution of so many of these undertakings in France depends on English capital. These companies are, also, now political powers, and they will not pay double the natural price for so essential an article to the French producers; they will get it at the cheapest rate by importation, or the French forges must bring their supply up to the demand. Thus, even the process of constructing a railroad does something towards breaking down the barriers between the commerce of nations; and the increased intercourse it will create will complete the beneficial process.

THE only sustaining power of the Government of Spain seems to be the Army; fully aware of its importance, Narvaez has put it in a state of efficiency remarkably contrasting with its condition under former Ministries. Though every other department of the State should go unpaid, funds are found for the Army; it is besides well clothed and armed; by it Narvaez rules, and will continue to do so as long as he can secure the fidelity of the troops. And as it is in Madrid, so is it in the provinces. Barcelona is under martial law, and by it, and through it, the Commandant has undertaken an extensive commercial reform.

Catalonia is supposed to manufacture all the cloth consumed in Spain. It does not make a tenth of it, but imports largely from England and France; the Spanish marks are placed on the goods, and they are then sent into the interior of Spain as native manufactures. This system of contraband supports a great number of persons, and it is impossible but it must be known to the Government authorities, whose duty it is to suppress it. They have not been able to do so. Though against the laws, the practice has become almost legalised by long continuance; now, however, the Commandant is about to suppress it with the strong hand: a bando just issued inflicts the punishment of eight years' military service in a Spanish colony, on any manufacturer conniving or engaging in this contraband business; if too old for service, he is to have eight years in the galleys. To any Government officer detected in a participation in it, the punishment is death. Courts-martial have, also, superseded the ordinary criminal tribunals; and, strange to say, the people prefer the former, for the greater certainty, dispatch, and fairness they ensure! This may furnish a notion of the state of Spain; anarchy and the decay and corruption of old institutions have rendered even the rule of the sword desirable: it is power of some sort, and, perhaps, in the present condition of Spain, the best attainable.

POSTSCRIPT

Return of the Duchess of Kent.—Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent and suite arrived from Calais yesterday (Friday) morning, and left Dover immediately by a special train on the South Eastern Railway. The train reached London in two hours and a half. The Right Hon. Vesey Torrington, one of the Directors of the South Eastern Railway Company, received her Royal Highness at Dover and accompanied her to London.

Privy Council.—It is expected that a Privy Council will be held by her Majesty at Windsor Castle in the course of a few days, but at present no summonses have been issued.—[When the Council takes place, it will be seen whether there was any foundation for the report of an intention to suppress the registration of new railway schemes.]

Illness of Earl Spencer.—Earl Spencer, we regret to state, is labouring under a severe and dangerous illness at his seat, Wiseton Hall, near Bawtry, Yorkshire. J. E. Morey, Esq., the Mayor of Doncaster, has been in constant attendance upon his lordship during the last few days; and, with the skilful assistance of Dr. Overend, of Sheffield, performed an operation, which, we are glad to learn, has relieved his lordship from immediate danger.

Railway Collision.—Yesterday morning, in consequence of an accidental collision of trains on the London and Birmingham Railway, the letters by post were delivered by an extra deliver.

Explosion at a Firework Manufactory, and Loss on Two Lives.—Between eleven and twelve on Thursday an explosion took place at a manufactory of fireworks, carried on in a house situated in a row of buildings known as the "Back-row," Harlow West Marsh. On arriving at the spot alluded to the spectators were horrified at perceiving the scorched and mutilated remains of a man lying in the yard of the house where the explosion had occurred. The upper part of the house itself was on fire, but the flames shortly afterwards subsided, and the lower part of the house, the entire of which consisted of two shells, remained uninjured. From an examination of the premises it was ascertained that the explosion had taken place in a room on the second story, carrying away the greater portion of the roof, and demolishing the wall separating the two rooms of which the floor consisted. The two rooms presented a scene of complete destruction, the furniture and other fittings being shattered into innumerable fragments. Doubled up in a corner of the room lay the body of a youth, dreadfully crushed, and quite dead. It appears that the entire house was rented by a man named Jackson, who, we regret to say, was discovered on the outside of the premises, and who, assisted by his son (the youth whose body was found in the room), carried on the business of a firework manufacturer. The workshop was on the upper story of the house; but in what manner the explosion occurred, cannot yet be ascertained. It is a fortunate circumstance that the explosion was confined to the upper part of the house, as there was a large quantity of rockets and other combustible material stowed away on the first floor of the building. But little damage was sustained by the adjoining houses, in consequence of the explosion having evidently taken a perpendicular direction.

Fire at Wandsworth.—Between the hours of four and five o'clock yesterday morning a fire was discovered in the shop of Mr. Wright, boot and shoemaker, Wandsworth road, known as the Railway Mart. The utmost promptitude was evinced by the neighbours and police to save the house in which they succeeded, and in five minutes an engine was in full operation on the burning mass. Every exertion was for a time useless, and the house from top to bottom was all on fire. By half-past four the fire was extinguished, but all the property of Mr. Wright was consumed, and serious damage was also the consequence to the adjoining houses. Mr. Wright is insured in the Sun and Phœnix Fire offices.

The Murder at Rock Ferry, Liverpool.—On Wednesday morning the three men, Lynch, Nowlan, and Tullent, and the informer Burns, who had been, as has been before detailed, taken into custody at the instigation of the latter, on suspicion of the murder of Mr. Peacop, some months back, were brought up to the Court house, Chester, in order that the charge might undergo further investigation. The prisoners had been removed from Rock ferry, near Birkenhead, Liverpool, and to prevent an attempt at rescue, which was feared from the previous violence of the mob, under a strong military guard, to Chester (to which city they have since been confined. The magistrates on the bench were the Rev. Mr. Feilden, W. Jackson, Esq., Thomas Potter, Esq., John Case, Esq., and — Shaw, Esq. The prisoners, as before, were defended by Mr. Crowe, Q.C., on behalf of a deputation from the mess. were examined, but not a single part cle of evidence was elicited which could, in any way, serve as a corroboration nece ary to prove the truth of the story of Burns. Several witnesses were likewise called for the defence, to prove an alibi in the case of Lynch, and that the two weapons found in his possession were such as are used in the stamping mill as workmen at the Birkenhead Gas and Water Works. At about five o'clock the magistrates, Mr. Chew having addressed a few remarks to them, and maintained that there was not the slightest case against the prisoners, retired for consultation. In a quarter of an hour they returned, and intimated to the prisoners that they considered it necessary to make inquiries into the evidence called in their behalf, and, that to is migh effectually be done, they agreed to remand the case.

Tahiti.—By Valparaiso papers, received at Rio, by an American sloop of war, it is stated that fresh disputes had broken out at Tahiti between the French Commander, M. Bruat, and the captain of our sloop of war Talbot. The Frenchman, it is said, insisted on our vessels saluting their flag on shore, which the English Captain refused to do, unless the English flag was hoisted at our Consul's (Mr. Miles's) house, having previously struck it. The Talbot sailed from Tahiti. The French Admiral, Hamelin on be ng informed of these unpleasant occurrences, had arrived at Valparaiso on search of our Commander, but he had previously taken his departure for Callao.

Return of Her Majesty and Prince Albert to Windsor.—Her Majesty, Prince Albert, and several high officers of the household, arrived at the Farnborough station of the South Western Railroad, from Gosport, by a special train, on Thursday, shortly before one o'clock, and immediately proceeded to Windsor Castle, escorted by a detachment of the Life Guards. The Royal carriages were in waiting at the Farnborough station to convey her Majesty and the Court to Windsor as early as eleven o'clock.

Windsor, Thursday Evening.—Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, after an absence from Windsor of upwards of three months, returned to the Castle from Osborne House this afternoon, at ten minutes past two o'clock. Her Majesty was escorted into Windsor by a detachment of the 2nd Regiment of Life Guards, commanded by Lieutenant J. B. Hesketh, which received a detachment of the 4th Light Dragoon Guards, at Back rest gate. In the carriage with the Queen and the Prince Consort, were their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince Alfred and Princess Alice, and the Countess of Gainsborough, the Marquis of Ormonde, and the remainder of the Royal suite, followed in three other of the Royal carriages and four. The stay of the Court at Windsor is expected to be prolonged until the month of February next.

Birth of a Hanoverian Prince.—On the 21st instant, at half-past three in the morning, Her Royal Highness the Crown Princess of Hanover gave birth to a Prince, a fine healthy child. The event create l the greatest enthusiasm. The burghers assembled before the Palace of the King, sang the cantique of praise, "Nun danket alle Gott," and gave most enthusiastic cheers for the welfare of the King and of the Royal House. In the evening the whole town of Hanover was illumi ated.

The Duke of Cambridge.—The Duke of Cambridge has arrived at Colorno with his suite and servants, travelling under the name of Earl of Culloden. His Royal Highness goes from that city in the first instance to Rammenham, where the Duchess of Cambridge has been for some time, with her family.

Death of Lady Coventry.—A private letter from Naples announces the death of Lady Coventry, in that capital, on the 11th instant. Her lady-ship died suddenly, of apoplexy.

Illness of Earl Granville.—The Earl of Granville is suffering from severe indigestion, and the bronchi which his late alarming illness has made on his constitution render it extremely doubtful if he can ever regain his former state of health. The noble earl is at Rochampton, his lordship and countess having had Lady Dover's residence there at their disposal.

The Westminster Improvements.—These long-talked-of improvements will be commenced next week. It is expected that all the notices will be served in the course of the week. Hitherto, great unwillingness has been felt by persons who own property, or are tenants in the course of the line, as to what would be actually taken, and, consequently, they were in difficulty how to proceed. The line will commence in Flood street, pass through the Almonry, Orchard-street, and Duck lane, by the chapel in the Broadway, pass Mr. Carter Wood's brewery, Palmer village, to Shaftesbury-terrace, Pimlico. It is believed the works will commence at the Pimlico end first, but nothing positive is known.

Mortality in the Metropolis.—The number of deaths during the week ending September 6, was 1,078, showing a decrease of 56, as compared with the preceding week, and less than the average of five summers, by 130. Deaths caused by diseases of the lungs and other organs of respiration are principally concerned. The low will encompass in Flood street, pass through however, as an exception, the deaths being 22, average 7. The violent deaths amount to 2;

New Shells and Grenades.—Capt Bliette, of the French navy, has recently invented new shells and grenades, which are said to have greater destructive powars than any hitherto known. These projectiles, when fired at a ship, do not pass through her side, making a simple hole, but explode in the act of striking, and cause a large rent, and spread a combustible matter in every direction, which it is impossible to extinguish, and the ship struck cannot escape from being burnt. Capt Bellette has been appointed to the command of the Météore, in which he is to go into all the ports of France to form depôts of his shells and grenades, and give instructions as to the mode of using them to the marine artillerymen.

CHRIST'S HOSPITAL.—ST. MATTHEW'S DAY.

On Monday the senior scholars delivered their usual annual orations. The day was very fine, and, at the hour of admittance, an immense number of respectable persons (chiefly ladies) congregated at the entrance. After waiting very patiently for some time, those assembled rose to receive the usual procession of the Lord Mayor and Aldermen. As soon as they had taken their seats at the upper end of the great hall, the orations were delivered in the following order:—

Greek Oration on the same subject, William Frederick Greenfield, fourth Grecian, and mathematical medallist, 1843, who is proceeding to Pembroke College, Cambridge.

French Oration on the same subject, George Voigt, third Grecian, and classical medallist, 1845, who is proceeding to Clare Hall, Cambridge.

Meeting of East India House Proprietors—Another Scene.—On Wednesday a General Quarterly Court of the Proprietors of East India Stock was held in Leadenhal. street. The regular hour of the Court of Proprietors' meeting at the East India House is 12 o'clock, but long before that time Mr Peter Gordon placed himself in the room and refused to leave it. The hon proprietor assumed all the dignity of chairman, and refused to listen to any advice. Exactly at 12 o,clock Sir Henry Willock, chairman, Mr. Hogg, M.P., Deputy chairman, Mr. Gordon, the secretary, and several of the directors, and principal officers of the Company, entered the court, Mr. Gordon still retaining his seat in the chair The Chairman (Sir Henry Willock), on his entering the room, respectfully requested Gordon to vacate the seat which he had improperly assumed, which that gentleman refused to do. Sir Henry Willock, in an animated tone, then demanded that Mr. Gordon should leave the chair, which he positively refused to do. A series of "Turn out!" "Put him out!" "Out with him," Mr. Gordon, however, persisted in keeping his seat. Sir Henry Willock, finding persuasion in vain, directed Nicholson, one of the officers of the Company, to remove him, which order he refused to obey more than oneyed, for the officer laid hold of the would be Chairman, and forcibly ejected him beyond the circle solely appropriated to the Directors Mr. Peter Gordon placed himself in the centre of the room, which order the Directors in issuing an order for the exclusion of strangers from the gallery on the present occasion (hear). The Chairman said, there was no desire or wish on the part of himself or brother Directors to exclude the public; they had no desire for the discussions to go on with closed doors (hear, hear, and cheers). But it should be known that the hon proprietor who had given notices of motion for to day had caused numbers of bills and placards to be distributed, telling the public that they had a right to attend the Court of Proprietors whenever that court met. Now that being the case it had been considered necessary, to insure regularity and respectability in their proceedings, to issue the order.—Mr. G. Thompson in a long speech moved for a select committe to inquire into the conduct of Lieut. Col. Charles Orans during the time he filled the office of Resident (or representative of the British Government) at the court of Sattara." After a discussion, the motion was put, and negatived by a considerable majority—only three hands being held up in favour of it

The Royal Exchange.—The frequenters of this noble ornament of the City have been much interested lately by the proceedings of the workmen in the process of putting gates in the north entrance, facing Bartholomew lane. It will be recollected that at the time of the opening of the new Royal Exchange by her Majesty the Queen, last year, all the gates were temporary and of wood, it being found impossible by the architect to get them up in time for the ceremonial and the state of the Queen, sculptured by Lough, in the Merchants' area, and that as the merchants complain that the asphalte in the open part is found to be cold, from its non-absorbent character, they have resolved to lay down the old Turkey stone pavement, which has been preserved, adopting some ornamental devices in stone of a richer colour.

Balloon Ascent and Steeple Chase at Vauxhall Gardens.—A grand day and night for the proprietors of Vauxhall Gardens, Vauxhall, on the occasion of the ascent of the Great Nassau Balloon. It was intended that a steeple-chase should also be run, but from magisterial interference this was properly abandoned, and some pedestrian feats substituted in their stead. The balloon, which was under the direction of the Messrs. Green, and three other gentlemen, who express-ed themselves highly delighted with their aerial trip. One of the pedestrians who started from the gardens as the balloon ascended, arrived at the spot at which the balloon descended in about half an hour after the party had landed, and then, after receiving a certificate to that effect, started for the "royal property," where he arrived at least twenty minutes in advance of the aeronauts. One of the other pedestrians was within five yards of the balloon, when his companion was proclaimed the winner of the first prize by Mr. Green.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

The Late Suicide at Sea from a Hull Steamer.—The Elizabeth schooner, which arrived on Tuesday in the river, off Horsleydown, from Harwich, reports that the body of a gentleman was washed ashore, on Friday week, near Walton on the Naze, on the Essex coast, which, from a card found in his clothes, is supposed to be the person who threw himself overboard from the William Darley Hull steamer, while on a recent passage to London, as already mentioned. His name is believed to be Mr. N. Cole, of Leeds. A watch and a purse, containing between £5 and £6 were found in the pockets. An inquest has been held on the body, and adjourned for the attendance of the relatives.

Fatal Accident.—On Tuesday an inquest was held before Mr. Carter, the Coroner for Surrey, at the Duke of York, Swan lane, Rotherhithe, on the body of Mr. Charles Devines, aged 56, a timber measurer. It appeared that on Friday week the deceased was employed in measuring the cargo of one of the Baltic vessels, and was in excellent health and spirits: suddenly he was observed to stagger and fall, and, upon one of his assistants going to his aid, he appeared wholly insensible. A surgeon was sent for, who immediately attended, but pronounced the deceased quite dead, probably from the rupture of a blood-vessel. The jury returned a verdict in accordance with the medical evidence.

Fatal Accident to a Gentleman.—Mr Baker, on Monday, concluded an inquiry at the Earl Grey, Mile end-road, touching the death of Mr. James Smith, aged 54 years, who lost his life under the following extraordinary circumstances. John Elliott, police-constable 344 K, deposed that deceased was a gentleman of independent fortune, and had formerly been a captain in the army. He had a house in Maunder-place, in the Mile end road, which he occupied as offices, but he slept in a dwelling house in the rear. On Friday night (last week) soon after twelve o'clock, witness was on duty near deceased's house, when he heard a noise as of a person snoring; he went down Maunder-passage, in which a side-door of deceased's house opened, but could see no one; he then knocked at the door. A faint answer of "Yes," was returned, when witness thinking it was some one sleeping on the premises, left. About twenty minutes to six o'clock on the following morning, a workman coming to work on the premises, witness asked him if any one had been there, and was informed that it was not occupied as a house to sleep in, witness went to the door, which he found open, and some person was found lying against it on the inside. The door was taken down, and deceased was discovered with his head at the stairs and his feet against the door. He was in state of great exhaustion, and nearly paralysed. Mr. Llewellyn, surgeon, deposed that he was called to deceased. He was partially insensible, but subsequently rallied, and reaction took place. He said he had fallen down stairs on Friday night, between ten and eleven o'clock. Deceased so far recovered as to make his will. He had evidently received a fracture of the vertebræ of the neck, causing paralysis of the extremities. Witness attributed his death (which occurred at four o'clock on Sunday morning) to that cause. It is supposed that deceased, who was an eccentric character, had gone to the house at that late hour to arrange some of his papers, and that thinking he had heard some person at the door had descended to open it, and had fallen down the stairs. The Jury returned a verdict of "Accidental death." It was stated that deceased had left nearly £20,000 amongst his relations.

Attempted Suicide by a French Colonel.—On Tuesday evening, about half past six o'clock, a waterman and lighterman, named David William Miller, of Jacob-street, Rotherhithe, was standing on the upper side of the pier head, at the entrance of the St. Katharine's Dock, when a tall portly gentleman passed him in a hurried manner, walked to the edge of the jetty, and after striking himself violently on the breast plunged into the river. A long staff was immediately lowered, and the gentleman, who had twice sunk, was hooked by his clothes, and kept afloat until Miller reached him in a ship's boat, when he attempted to drag him into it. In doing so Miller discovered something projecting from his left side, and called out "he has a knife in his body," at the same time pulling from it a dagger with which he had stabbed himself before he precipitated himself into the water. The blood which oozed from the wound, and Miller called for more aid, which was immediately rendered, and the gentleman was safely laid in the bottom of the boat. He had no sooner recovered himself than he attempted to seize the dagger, which Miller had thrown aside. The waterman defeated his intentions by placing his foot on the weapon, and called upon the other men in the boat to keep the gentleman down, and prevent him doing any further mischief. He was properly secured, and the boat rowed to St. Katharine's Stairs, where Mr. James Evans, the superintendent of Thames, and the hospital crew, were also about to embark in a police galley. They took charge of the wounded man, and conveyed him to the Duke of Marlborough public-house, and after his wound had been dressed he was conveyed to the Thames police station in Wapping, where he was divested of his wet clothing, and a dry suit procured for him. While he was dressing Mr. Evans searched his pockets, and found in one of them his passport, and in another a handsome silver-mounted pocket-case, with the initial G engraved upon a silver plate. The wounded gentleman on recovering temporarily from the effect of the loss of blood made several attempts to possess himself of the dagger, and was with difficulty prevented from stabbing himself again. The unfortunate gentleman, whose name is Francois Gavoisier, and who is a colonel in the French army, is sixty-two years of age. He is said to have served with distinction during the wars of the Empire. He would have been taken before Mr. Bailantine, but was too ill to be moved. The wife and daughter of the unfortunate gentleman soon afterwards arrived at the police office, and were in a state of deep grief when informed that he was in the London Hospital, they proceeded to that place, and were permitted to see him. The interview was of a most affecting description. A strict watch is kept upon Colonel Gavoisier, to prevent his repeating the attempt on his life.

Railway Robberies on a Large Scale.—The late apprehension of a person named Maynard, who had been negotiating for the restitution of stolen property, and more recently that of Garratt as his accomplice, has been the means of bringing to light a wholesale system of plunder. There is not a railway terminus in or about London which has not been plundered to a very large extent, and the detection of the robbers until lately has defied the most skilful ingenuity of the several railway officers. On the capture, however, of Maynard, suspicion fell on Garratt, as being a principal party in the extensive and wholesale depredations. He was accordingly strictly watched for near five weeks, during which time he had as many residences at different parts of the town, never staying at one place more than four days. On his being apprehended, in North-street, Lisson-grove, after much resistance, an immense quantity of property, principally wearing apparel, was discovered in portmanteaus, carpet bags, boxes, &c., with various railway labels pasted upon them, and the inference was that the property formed the remains of various robberies on the numerous metropolitan lines. The whole of the railways running into London have the interior lists of the everyday, their officers were promptly ordered to communicate with Mr. Nash and Mr. Collard, of the Great Western Railway Company, and up to Wednesday no fewer than eight distinct and large robberies on various lines were satisfactorily established. They comprise the stolen luggage of Price Lewis, Esq., on the London and Birmingham Railway; of Mr. Jones, on the same line; of Mr. Winter, on the same line; a large quantity of valuable papers belonging to a gentleman, and on this line also; and a quantity of luggage, the property of a Mr. Keep. On the Great Western, the property of Mr. Prance, and the luggage of another passenger on the same line, at present is not known. The luggage of Mr. Babington stolen on the South Eastern Railway, and that of another passenger on the South Western. The above are the only robberies which have been brought home for the full protection of mentioned Railway Companies, it is supposed, for the total protection of the property, however, has not been identified. Since Garratt has been apprehended he has been identified as a party in the robbery of Mr. Jones's portmanteau, come forward to prosecute. whole having been properly distributed and arranged, the Museum was opened for study and public inspection, Jan. 15, 1759.

The New Museum will occupy a site further north than its predecessor; and its large quadrangle will comprise the extent of the old garden. By this judicious plan, the building has proceeded, without obstruction to the purposes of the Museum; the collection being removed from the old edifice to the new one, as the latter has been finished.

An Engraving of the facade of the New Museum, from the Architect's own drawing, appeared in No. 89 of our Journal. The present Illustration shows the not unpicturesque Central Lodge, with its octangular apartment and cupola; together with the centre of the principal Front; whilst, in the distance, is shown a portion of the new building; the whole, as seen from Great Russell-street.

CORK AND BANDON RAILWAY.

Thursday, the 16th inst., was a most interesting day, not only to those connected by personal interest with this first-commenced and extreme southern line of railway in Ireland, but to many hundreds of the labouring classes, to whom the ceremony of raising the first turf, was but the prelude to the independence and comfort of excellent and continuous employment. The centre of attraction was a large field on the lands of Kilpatrick, just above the picturesque ruin of Donndaniel Castle, whose ivy-clad walls are washed by the bright waters of the Bandon river. On a gentle elevation, commanding a fine view of the winding river, and wide-spreading woods, rich in autumnal tints, was erected a large and handsome pavilion, 100 feet in length, and 40 feet in width. Not far from the pavilion was a space marked out by strong barriers, from the centre of which the first sod, or turf, was to be raised by the Earl of Bandon, who very kindly undertook the pleasing task. From an early hour, the old and new roads leading to Innishannon, were crowded with carriages of all kinds, from the dashing coach-and-four to the humble jingle, all wending their way to the great attraction.

At about two o'clock, the field in which the ceremony was to take place was covered with thousands of country people, and more than one hundred vehicles. The crowd was very dense; and as the carriage and four of Lord Bandon entered the ground the curiosity became still greater. Mr. Henry Enright, one of the principal contractors, had in his custody a handsome wheelbarrow of mahogany, with a spade of bright steel, the handle covered with red morocco leather, gilt-lettered; and a crowbar of the same costly materials. The sight of these state-and-span implements called forth a hearty laugh from many an [illegible], who never saw a coat of arms on a wheelbarrow, or a nobleman handling a spade.

Lord Bandon soon arrived, accompanied by the Countess of Bandon, Lord and Lady Bernard, the Hon. Mr. Bernard, Lady Harriet Bernard, and a number of the leading gentry of the neighbourhood; and attended by the directors, engineer, secretary, and other officers of the Company. The turf had previously been loosened by a labourer, and a plank laid down, upon which the wheelbarrow was to be driven. His Lordship took the spade and drove it into the yielding earth, amidst a mighty shout from the people; he then flung some spadesful into the barrow, and rolled it along the plank, amidst renewed shouts and increased pressure from the crowd; and thus was the Cork and Bandon Railway commenced! For a moment, the peer and the peasant were jostled together in strange confusion; silks and velvets mingling with blue cloaks and frieze jackets. By some difficulty, a path was opened for the egress of the principal personages, who then adjourned to the pavilion, to partake of an elegant déjeûner, which had been laid out in first-rate style by Mr. Lloyd, of Cork.

Among the speeches which followed, that of the Mayor of Cork, R. Dowden, Esq., in returning thanks to Mr Sergeant Murphy, M.P. for Cork, congratulated the Earl of Bandon on his being the third descendant of a race of noblemen who lived at home amongst their tenantry, doing all the good in their power. The Mayor then remarked, that he recollected a Bandonian saying, very many years since, that he should not die until he had seen a three-legged stool mounted on a tea-kettle, travelling to Cork; adding that though the Bandonian did not live to see the prophecy fulfilled, yet they (the Company) had.

We have to express our thanks to Mr. Director Shaw, and Mr. Secretary Macdonnell, for their courtesy to our artist, in affording him facilities to make the annexed sketch

CENTENARY OF THE BATTLE OF PRESTONPANS.

On the 20th of September, 1745, a band of about 2400 ill clad, worse armed, and half civilised Highlanders moved from Duddingstone, near Edinburgh, under the command of Prince Charles Edward Stuart, to meet about the same number of "regulars," horse and foot, commanded (if such a term may be used concerning a general who, as the sequel proved, could not control his men from running away) by Sir John Cope. Having marched about eight miles in a south-easterly direction, they halted between the villages of Tranent and Prestonpans, on the shores of the Frith of Forth. At daybreak, they charged the well-appointed troops of his Majesty George the Second with claymores, scythes stuck upon poles, wooden clubs, and other primitive weapons, with such vehemence that the regulars ran away, leaving the Prince and his adherents masters of the field, after about four minutes very hard fighting. The scene of the onslaught, as it now appears, is represented above, from a sketch taken on the spot by our Edinburgh artist. The house belonged to Colonel Gardiner, who led the troops of horse that were the first to fly. Finding himself thus deserted he placed himself at the head of a band of infantry and was killed by a fierce scythe cut, dealt by a Highlander, not beside his own garden wall.

HOUSE AT DUDDINGSTONE, WHERE THE PRETENDER SLEPT ON THE NIGHT BEFORE THE BATTLE OF PRESTONPANS.

This trifling, and, to the English, disgraceful encounter, would, in all probability, have been forgotten, or, at most, absorbed in general recollections of Charles Edward's short and chivalrous invasion, had not the genius of Sir Walter Scott given to it a vivid prominence in the never-dying "Waverley." Since the publication of that novel, rather than since the battle itself, Prestonpans has become a place for the curious to see, and for the annalist to revere. Besides the event, however, some interesting facts are connected with the village. Even the origin of its name may impart some useful information to the general reader.

The parish itself, which, being only two and a half miles long and one broad, is, perhaps, the smallest in Great Britain, is, properly, Preston, a name contracted from Priest's-town; because the early superiors of the soil were the monks of Holyrood and Newbottle. From the circumstance of these monks having erected on the sea-shore pans for the manufacture of salt, the present name arises. This mode of producing one of the essentials of food is still practised exactly in the same manner as it was in the middle ages. A quantity of water is introduced from the sea, by means of a pipe and reservoir, into a large shallow pan, under which is a fire. By means of the heat, the fluid evaporates and leaves a residuum of salt, which, being collected, the pan is re-filled, the whole process taking about twenty-four hours. Besides the very necessary article, salt, Prestonpans produces a real luxury, especially to connoisseurs of malt liquor. This is a thin, sparkling, exquisitely bitter beverage known in England as "pale ale," which is justly celebrated all over Scotland. Though cheap, and by no means potent, it is extremely palatable, and, out of all question, the best of dinner drinks.

The reader would, we are sure, forgive us for this digressive eulogium were he only to taste the beverage; though, we admit, from the Scotch rebellion to tipple—from a Prince to small beer—is a "heavy declension." On the other hand, if we only contrast the habits and manners of the past with those of the present, the two subjects are not altogether incongruous. A hundred years ago war and bloodshed, which went by the name of "glory," occupied the energies and thoughts of the people; now, useful arts and peaceful enterprises are as vigorously carried on. A century ago Prestonpans was the scene of a sanguinary onslaught; now it is the residence of a contented and hard-working population, who, engaged in manufactures, are useful to their fellow-creatures, live quietly and die in their beds. Happily what is true of Prestonpans is also true of the entire island of which it forms so very small a part.

wrought! The ignorance of the Highlanders who fought at the battle showed them little short of savages, as a few anecdotes will prove. After the rout, plunder began, and many of the commonest articles, of which the slain and wounded were despoiled, the plunderers had never seen before. One, who got a watch which had stopped while in his possession, for want of being wound up, sold it for a trifle, delighted with the bargain, because he thought that "the creature died last night." Another deemed a horse-pistol better worth having than a horse; and a third, having obtained a military saddle, imagined he had secured a competency for life. Highlanders are not so ignorant now. Thanks to the admirable parochial school system of Scotland, it would be difficult to find one who is unable to read. As to not knowing the use and value of the ordinary luxuries of life, there is not a Highland gentleman, of moderate circumstances, whose house is not filled with them. But the most striking change has occurred in the condition of the salters, along the shores of the Frith of Forth, and the colliers. It is not generally known that up to about sixty years ago, these men were slaves, or vassals, and were legally bought and sold, with the works at which they wrought.

A hundred years has wiped away from the upper classes the party feeling which the Pretender's enterprise left behind it, long after James's failure. His "adherents" have gradually been absorbed into the general mass of staunch supporters to the House of Hanover. Such a character as a Scotch Jacobite no longer exists; unless, indeed, a few, who cherish a romantic and poetical admiration for Prince Charles, as a historic hero, as a matter of romance, claim the designation. The last relic of real Jacobitism has recently passed away. An old gentlemanlike man, handsomely attired in the fashion of the last century, used to show a harmless dislike of the present succession at one of the Edinburgh churches, where he was a seldom-failing attendant. When the prayer for the Royal Family was offered up, he either gravely rose, and turned his back to the clergyman, or made a scuffling with his feet, giving, at the same time, a sort of ironical cough. This amiable weakness was the last practical piece of Jacobitism existing in North Britain.

Last Sunday (21st September) was the Centenary of the Battle of Prestonpans. No public notice has been taken of the circumstance in Scotland.

We have appended a few of the relics of Prince Charles, which are treasured up in different parts of Scotland. First are the autographs of Charles and of his amanuensis, Sir John Cope; next, a Silver Drinking-cup, which belonged to the Prince; then, one of his swords; a Dirk; and his Signet-ring. A Dragoon shows the military costume of the period. Lastly, is the Bonnet worn by the Pretender at the ball given at Holyrood just before the battle of Prestonpans; of which his biographer says: "the fatigues of the journey, the cares, and the anxiety that could not but be felt with respect to the coming battle, were alike unable to depress the buoyant spirits of Charles, and to impair his natural vivacity and power of pleasing. The enthusiasm of the ladies was unbounded, and many a fair weaver was, parhaps, confined in her devotion to the House of Stuart, by the graceful dancing of so handsome a representative of Scotland's rightful King."—Memoirs of Prince Charles Stuart, by Charles Louis Klose, Esq.; a well-timed publication, just issued, which we shall notice on another occasion.

SLAVE SHACKLES RAISED FROM THE "MISSOURI," UNITED STATES STEAMER

In a former numb r we gave a sketch of the destruction of the United States steamer, the Missouri, by fire at Gibraltar. The event has been brought under the notice of the public again by a remarkable circumstance, which furnishes the subject of a powerfully written leader in the Times of Saturday last. Among the materials which were brought up from the wreck by the exertions of the divers, are a quantity of shackles and fetters of the same kind as those used in the slave-trade; but the fact is best stated in the words of the Times itself:—

SLAVE SHACKLES.

"Dead men tell no tales, at least they did not before the days of Herapath, but fractured vessels are not so sad. The wreck and cargo of the Missouri are in the hands of the divers Day after day they are bringing up, doubtless, much that a British sailor will easily divine, by the analogy of civil and naval navigation and warfare. But what he is long in the dark about they are bringing up in great quantities, day by day, and carrying off in carts and to their store? Slave shackles, of every size gth and size, for men and women, children and young. A correspondent of undoubted authority has sent us three specimens—a family group, for father, mother, and child They are such as are used in the slave trade, and are own brothers, as we can swear, to those found on board vesse engaged in the traffic"

By the courtesy of the Editor of the Times, we have been enabled to sketch these shackles, and we now present an engraving of them to our readers What could they be wanted for among the stores of a war steamer, is the question? A Correspondent of the Times, who signs himself "American," suggests that "if there were really any more 'shackles,' or irons, in the Missouri than her complement, or than is ordinarily taken in the armed vessels of all nations, for the purpose of securing mutineers, or pirates, they were undoubtedly placed there without the knowledge or consent of the American Government." Now, as the fetters are made to fit women and children as well as men, they could not be intended for "mutineers or pirates;" that they were shipped without the knowledge of the American Government we are willing to believe; but, then, what a case does it not make for inquiry? Had the Missouri sailed safely from Gibraltar, would any more have been heard of them—and, if not, how would they have been disposed of?

"Th t the question" says the Times, "is answered from Washington we can only conjecture somewhat wildly. We feel as if we had broken into what we supposed an old wine-cellar, and had found rings in the walls to hang up and chains. It is impossible not to pursue the discovery. Chains and instruments of torture were found in the wreck of the Armada. Hundreds of thousands of fetters were got up from the Atlantic. Who knows but Xerxes was neither a Philip nor a Xerxes. What could he be doing with these ugly inventions?" "Our correspondent says the shackles are presumed to be intended for a depôt which the Americans are said to have formed in Liberated slaves on the African coast beyond Mogador, and with which American merchantmen trade. This supposition only gives locality to the enigma What occasion for fetters are made for a shipload of fetters? The world will expect with impatience some account of so suspicious a bal ast."

THE COLOSSEUM.—Among the distinguished visitors to this unique exhibition, during the last few days, were the following.—The Earl of Denbigh and family, the Earl and Countess of Shrewsbury, Princess Czartoffsky and family Lord Lane le and family, Bishop of Jamaica and family, Lady Elizabeth Lowther and family, Lord and Lady Montague, Lords Beaumont, Rokeby, Wilton, Dudley Stuart, Fielding; Lady Kenmure; the Russian, Brazilian, and Sicilian Ministers, &c.

IS WILL FORGIVEN.—A letter has been lately received from Barber, in which he states that his health is bad, and that his ration and labour are but sparingly allowed. He devotes the time to gathering geographical and historic information on the island, and is writing the biography of extraordinary criminals, although his leisure time is small, as he has to work every morning at six four o'clock. He is employed giving instruction to the sons of a clergyman, and is also engaged to conduct the defence of some prisoners who attempted to escape from the boats of the ship Agincourt, by sealed by setting the guard and throwing them overboard. Speaking of his fellow-convict, Pletcher, he says—"He is executed by all, save the few extreme wretches who welcome all as friends who are like themselves, and are in not one of the five inhabitants by whom he is connected with abhorrence." Barber still perseveres in his declaration of innocence, and has again forwarded a memorial for a remission of punishment.

A TOBACCO TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.—A tobacco temperance society has, it is announced by the Spanish journals, been formed at Soria, the object of which is to put an end to smoking Persons of all classes, who prove that they have been convicted of smoking, or who have used deceptions to become members, are admitted, and receive a ticket, on which is written, "Does shall smoke no more;" and every infraction of this injunction is subject to a penalty of 12 maravedis (about 1½ centimes). To insure the object of the society, each member is bound to accuse another, if he break the rule. Every meeting commences with a mutual inspection of hands, pockets, and clothes, and an olfactory test of the breath, to be practised by each member upon his neighbour. The produce of the fines is to be laid out on subscriptions for journals; but as there are yet only fourteen members, and the taste of the Spaniards for cigars and cigarettes is so deeply rooted, it can never be expected that this number will be greatly increased.

A RAMBLE IN THE REALMS OF CHAT.

The personal and political topics of the week are remarkably miscellaneous, and quite the reverse of abstract—there is not tangible occupation for any particular "Nine days'-wonder," but a scattering of chance and changing subjects, with which we shall at once proceed to deal.

Now why will the Commissioners of Paving so continually block up the streets? We have heard of gentlemen in difficulties having to perambulate the whole City without once getting into a man thoroughfare, and it must be admitted that to do so required considerable ingenuity. Why force a similar display or contrivance upon the sober citizen who pays his way? Both sections of the community are evidently discomfitted The "indefatigable seeker" who feared a letter in Piccadilly, a draper in Fleet street—a glove maker in Holborn, and a hatter in the Strand—no longer threads the byways with his former impunity—he meets his hatter in a bus—his tailor in a gig—his draper in a "Hansom," and his glove maker on horseback—all forced upon him into the back slums, by the Commissioners of Paving to the British Metropolis. The Times is right in declaring that they ought to mend their ways. Meanwhile, how are the respected and respectable trades men injured also. No public traffic—no chance custom—no familiar noise of wheels, jarves, and collision—only the hollow consumption-like grunt of the pavior, as he mallets away with systematic energy. Really this street blocking is—with or without badinage—a "confounded nuisance." Fancy your dialogue with the conveyance gentry of the metropolis. You enter a cab, and give your instructions—

"Drive me to Holborn—I'm all in a haste
Work your whip! hurry! be quick now! levant!
What are you staring it at, eh! can't you say,"
"Holborn's repaving and please Sir I can't!"

"Into the STRAND"—"Sir the Strand is in hand Sir,
By them 'ere Commissioners and —willy nilly—
We're forced to go round"—"To the ALBANY—Zounds!
You don't mean to say they've block'd up PICCADILLY!"

"To the Bank—to the Bank—I've a check and I fear I'm too late—to his sorrow if you don't pay good up"
"I'm willing to whop him to please you . . . . Oh dear'
But now I remember they've stopped the NEW ROAD UP."

"Then what way can you go?"—"Whether fast Sir or slow
It's uncommonly clear that we cannot go straight Sir,
But we can I dare say—such a round-a bout way
That a man in a hurry is sure to be late Sir."

So much for street versification, and the mallet melody of blocking up. Our next subject is "fruit selling." We have a summer touch of the raspberry blending with the autumn flavour of the apple, that is still upon our palate. We love fruit! But, henceforth, be our thirst never so exquisite, our desire never so supreme, we may not (in our leisureful travel through the metropolis, even by the round-about ways, "greet out the sweet indulgence to our taste" from any fruit basket that may "spread its tempting presence in our way." The die is cast! The Duke of Bedford is to have it all we must purchase only at Covent Garden! Two poor boys have been taken up for selling plums and apples in the street; nay, they have been taken down also, and sent each of them to do a five days' penance in a gaol! This is a strange purgatory whereby to cleanse the soul from fruit-selling! May the poor earn their living on no path that does not lead them to the workhouse or the gaol? Cannot a man buy an apple in the street without sentencing his young costermonger to the treadmill? Is British freedom resolved into a charter for the Paving Commissioners? "To this complexion has it come at last? Well, hurrah for our police magistrates! While Mr. Combe was sentencing the two poor boys to gaol for trying to earn their living with the Duke of Bedford's plums and apples, which the said Mr. Combe was horrified to hear were sold by the noble duke on Sunday morning (we trust the magistrate does not get his dessert on the Sabbath day), Mr. Twyford was informing two rich boys who were accused and convicted before him of wrenching off and stealing a knocker, that it was in his power to commit them to prison, but that he did not like to send gentlemen of their condition to a place of the kind: He therefore fined them, and, after thanking his worship they were discharged. We have not ascerta ned the name of the prison in which the poor boys are being at once punished and demoralized, who tried to get their living by the basket of fruit

A boy may steal a knocker,
He pays and alls "mum;"
But if he earn his living
By the selling of a plum,
They straight way thrust him into gaol,
And keep him locked up "glum."
While justice rather puzzled cries
To what a pass we've come!

We glean from various paragraphical intimations some droll news about the Press in China, Denmark, and Spain In Spain, the Captain General of Catalonia informed the Editor of El Fomento that on certain conditions "he would hang him from the flagstaff at Montjuich as a warning to all other journalists." We suppose if the said Editor writes a work against the said Captain General, the said Captain-General will keep his word. It reminds us of Picton, who, in the Peninsular war, once threatened to hang a Commissary if he did not produce a certain provision within a certain time. The Commissary went to Wellington, and, as an officer, preferred his indignant complaint. "Did Picton really say so?" emphatically enquired the Commander.

"He did."

"Then you'd better make your provisions sure; for if Picton said he'd hang you, he'll do it, by Jove!"

In Denmark, the authorities prosecuted a Copenhagen journal, called the Father land, and seized the library of the Editor for sale under fine At the sale, the first book put up fetched from a spirited merchant of the place, £300, the whole amount of the levy. So the Press in Denmark beat the Bar!

In China, Admiral Cochrane brought an action against the Editor of the Friend of China, and the verdict was given for the defendant.

So, now for the sequitur; although they would hang the Press in Spain, it gets more protection in Denmark and China, which one would think were inversing the order of civilization.

A SONG OF THE RECESS.

Old St. Stephen's Temple sleepeth
Mute and lone, with fasted gate,
And an hour of solemn pause!
Are the springs of ease and pleasure
Sparkling while our rulers drink?
Or, aspiring joyful leisure,
Have they only paused to THINK?

Do they skim the breezy mountain,
Kiss'd by the caressing wind,
With the game at speed before them,
And the nation's want behind?
Or with but a fleet-snatch'd pastime,
For the spirit's fair rebound—
Do they, for the watching people,
Think of more than gun and hound?

Are they back among the millions,
Who once gave them ruling trust
Proudly then they took their mission,
Prove they now their stewardship
Just?
—Or, if even the past be gloomy—
Little gladness gi ds its wing—
Will they set up in the Future,
That the Nation's heart may sing?

Will they let a Christian spirit
Open vice the Workhouse door,
That the destitute without
May prefer a gaol no more;
Feed their hunger's human craving;
Give some comforts if but few
And for the soul's thirst, distil them
Charity, most blessed dew?

Will it ever seek the mine and quarry,
Moving conscience in high place—
Where the Spanish heart and weapon
Crow'd and crawling still are found.
Will they his where children labor
Pale and stunted—lean and weak,
And with pure health's ruddy finger
Touch the wan and wasted cheek?

Will they go to the bare garret,
See the starving sempstress pine,
Will her weary fingers weaving
All the web of Life's decline,
And, with grieved and sicken'd feeling,
Pray—arouse with resolving strong?
"We will shake the nation's Senate
With the shame of all this wrong!"

In the fields where watch'd their fathers,
Oft the lands they joy to own,
Will they grasp the plough, and thunder,
"This shall never be overthrown?"
Will they, proud and never fearing,
Listen to the "heart amen"
Of the manly peasant-cheering,
Shaking hill and sounding glen?

Will they care for "Loom" and "Sail" too,
Watch them as their want befalls,
And for all our Commerce's glory
Keep in trim our WOODEN WALLS?
Then forgiving past transgression
Pain we'd grant them farther scope,
And unto a better Session
Look with stronger trust and hope.

Then will tell! St. Stephen's Temple,
Mute no more with fasted gate!
Whether hours of solemn pausing
Join to rest the wheels of State!
Or, aspiring joy of ease and pleasure
Sparkle while our rulers drink,
Or, aspiring joyful leisure,
They have truly paused to THINK!

THE THEATRES.

HAYMARKET.

A very entertaining interlude, called "The Cabinet Question," was produced at this house on Tuesday evening, being an adaptation of "Babicle et Jobin," a piece in which Achard has acquired much celebrity by his performances. The French vaudeville is, if we mistake not, in two acts; these have been compressed into one, cleverly into one, and seasoned with some smart comic dialogue, by Mr Planché. The plot hinges upon the dilemmas of Polish (Mr. Buckstone), an upholsterer's foreman, who, when out upon a holiday at Greenwich, stops a carriage in which the horses have run away, and falls desperately in love with a lady it contains, to whom he gives the name of Alfonso Montmorenci as his own patronymic. From this time his troubles begin. He runs in debt with his landlord for clothes, to enable him to appear before the gentleman with the romantic name; he spends all his eight-and-sixpences in opera tickets, to get a male of recognition; and, at last, being sent, to his horror, to put up some curtains in the house of this very lady, positively refuses to go, and is, in consequence, discharged by his master. All this time, his master's daughter is in love with him; but his mind is so taken up with his passion for his aristocratic acquaintance, that he treats all her attempts with the most provoking coldness. The lady herself is engaged to a young officer (Mr. Howe), who is about to go off to China, because his comparative poverty is a bar to his union. She comes to the upholsterer's, and there recognizes Polish, who, finding his dream of ambition lost, sets to work and befriends the lovers, by telling the officer that a will in his favour exists in the secret drawer of a particular cabinet, he (Polish) having made the drawer and seen the paper deposited therein. The cabinet, which is about to be put in a public sale, is rescued, and the money found; whereupon Polish forgets all his old attachment, and starts a new one, of which his master's daughter is the object.

This slight outline gives rise to some most comic situations, which kept the house continually in roars of laughter. The piece was capitally performed. Buckstone's Polish was the chief part: and to say that he was irresistibly funny, is only to repeat what we have so often said before. His account of his romantic adventure was inimitable; and when, whilst covering a sofa in the shop, he hears some new that astonishes him, the upward air with which he rushed forward, exclaiming "I've swallowed my tacks!" nearly threw the audience into convulsions. His advice, to the officer, of "Woman's a riddle, and one the sooner gives up the better," got a round of applause. Miss Celia Bennett played the upholsterer's daughter, Miss Rosewood, as she does everything else, pleasantly and sensibly; and Mr. Howe, Mr Tilbury, and Miss Telbyn contributed to the success of the piece. We must not omit to mention the capital manner in which Mr. Brindal was "made up" in a trifling part, to represent a well-known connoisseur in theatrical matters. The curtain fell amidst loud and general plaudits, and Mr. Buckstone being called for as soon as he could be heard, announced "The Cabinet Question" for discussion every evening until further notice.

Much activity at present prevails in the coulisses of the various theatres, although there has lately been no very great novelty in their public departments. The company at the PRINCESS' have assembled, preparatory to opening: Mr. Charles Mathews and Madame Vestris are not in the corps. A new farce, called "Seeing Wright," which we conceive to be of fast class coming under the new-fashioned name of apropos bagatelles, is announced for Monday at the ADELPHI; and the LYCEUM, two or three weeks hence, will be forthwith produced, the first being a translation of a French vaudeville, "La Vie en Partie Double." The subjects for the Christmas burlesques will be taken, we understand, at the former house, from the tale of "Peter Wilkins," adapted by Messrs. Lemon and Albeckett; and, at the latter, from the story of "Prince Firous Schah and the Enchanted Horse," in the "Arabian Nights' Entertainments," by the authors of "Cinderella," "Valentine and Orson," &c.

By a private letter, we learn that the General Tom Thumb is creating a great excitement at Toulouse; so that he appears to have been recovered from the brigands who carried him off, if, indeed, the adventure was not one of the marvels of the continental journals. The theatrical performances of the General are very much praised; and he betrays a keen intelligence and sense of humour which folks had scarcely given him credit for. From Toulouse he will go to Marseilles, and return to London about the end of January, when he will appear at one of the theatres in a fairy burlesque, written expressly for him by Mr. Albert Smith.

MUSIC.

DRURY-LANE THEATRE

This establishment opens to-night (Saturday), with Balfe's opera of "The Enchantress," Miss Romer enacting the part of Stella, in place of Madame Anna Thillon. Since the close of last season, Miss Romer has been in Dublin and the provinces, and has been most successful as the Enchantress Of her reception here, we shall be unable to report progress before our next number. In respect to the new ballet of "The Merry Maids," composed by M. St. George, and M. Albert, with the sparkling music of M. Adolphe Adam, who has come to this country expressly to conduct at the rehearsals, although we cannot record the result of Monsieur's performance, we can supply, elsewhere, the principal details of this splendid spectacle. In the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS of last week, our dramatic critic drew attention to the prospectus of the lessee, and with much truth and force pointed out the absurdity of attempting to compel the Drury-lane Director to pursue a certain policy in respect to the production of the legitimate drama, dictated by "clever literary men, with free admissions, who can command heavy-sounding words." We have now a different duty to perform, as the critic of "matters musical," and a glance at the lessee's programme, certainly affords us grounds of high gratification. Without being optimists, we cannot withhold from the plan of action announced by Mr. Bunn. Here is an extract full of purpose, the importance of which has been overlooked by our contemporaries.—"A new opera by Mr. W. V. Wallace, whose compositions have already excited the greatest curiosity."

We trust that the lessee (as in the case of Mr. Balfe) has the courage to produce a new work from an unknown name. Only on the ground of "experience" from British musician is candidate to come before the world, and is not left to pine in obscurity. Is not this the highest encouragement for native talent? Is not this course paving the way for a national opera? And, be it recollected, Mr. Bunn has received from an establishment supported by a subvention, or a grant from Government, but the act of a private individual, who incurs all the risk and responsibility.

The concluding paragraph of the prospectus we read as follows:—"Arrangements are moreover on the point of completion, and treaties pending for a Grand Opera, the music by Donizetti, the libretto by Scribe." This is another bold undertaking. We approve of the Drury-lane lessee's daring innovation. We wish our native artists to be supported; but talent is of no country, and we should glory in the names of Mendelssohn, Spohr, Meyerbeer, Don zetti, Verdi, &c., occupying a place in our musical annals. As regards Meyerbeer, we perceive that his "Camp of Silesia" is also to be brought out, and that the celebrated Jenny Lind is also engaged. Doubts have been thrown upon this announcement of Mr Bunn, but we feel the pleasure of being acquainted with the great prima donna of Germany very recently at Frankfort, and we understood from her, that the only obstacle to her début here was the study of the English language. Our conviction is that Jenny Lind will certainly be with us during the present season at Drury-lane Theatre, as she has signed and sealed with the lessee. Of the transcendant talent of this young and highly-gifted vocalist, we propose to write in a future number; but if we state confidently that her great qualities, both as an artiste and a woman, have been in no degree exaggerated. Since Malibran, there has been no débutante so likely to take the place of that wonderful singer To the lovers of the legitimate drama, the announcement will rejoice that we are to have another opera from Julius Benedict, the pupil of Weber. Benedict was most unfortunate in his libretto of "The Brides of Venice;" but this time he has enlisted the services of the prolific Scribe to supply the drama. Two points have also struck us, and these are, the reference to improvements in the orchestra and chorus. After the example of the Philharmonic Company, the lessee has set the ball rolling in a number of changes in the organisation of these departments Mr Tully is a clever and indefatigable chorus master, and will, no doubt, drill his forces well; but we would especially invite his attention to the beating of the time of the orchestra with the conductor's baton, which is much more reprehensible, designedly indifferent to their duties after a few representations Jullanssens, the venerable German conductor, finding one of the choristers badly at Drury Lane, in the "Huguenots," made a "call" the next day, and forced the singers to repeat the chorus six times over, although they had sung the opera hundreds of nights. The disposition for practical jokes of our chorus singers, instead of attending to their duties, should be effectually checked

The Drury Lane band requires decided amelioration There is a want of quality and of tone in the leading instruments. The violins are much too weak for the bass strength. We have no great confidence in the abilities of Signor Sanderini as musical director. We will not, however, interfere with the arrangements in the present advanced state of musical knowledge, of making a good orchestral improvement, and let us no longer be under the reproach that the Drury Lane band is inferior to a second-rate Parisian one We wish under the impressions of last and previous seasons. We are unaware that there has been any alterations of note, but if we find them we shall be most happy to sign its praises.

Of the singers forming the company we have nothing to remark, save the welcome return of Mr Henry Phillips, Mr. Allen, and two débûts. The remaining names are those of Mr. Weiss, who has been singing with success in the halls of last season, as the best the native market can supply. We believe, however, that in the course of two years, Italy will return to us two or three English prime donne and a couple of tenors and bass, for whom a brilliant career is in prospect.

THE NORWICH MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

We brought up our report of this great Meeting, in last week's publication, to Thursday. The first Concert was on Tuesday, and for the enthusiasm displayed by the company in favour of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream," combining the overture and sportive scherzo; the chorus, "Flu.nsad with Melody;" the nocturne and Bridal March; and the chorus, "Through the house" Beethoven's Symphony in C Minor, with its marvellous March of Giants; Weber's wild and romantic Preischütz overture; a duet for pianoforte and violin, played by Benedict and Master Dayr; and a bassoon solo, executed by the celebrated Baumann, were the instrumental items of attraction. Herr Staudigl was in great, or course, in Schubert's "Wanderer," Marie, in "Adelaide, and the "Don Pasquale" Serenade; and Grisi, in "Qui la voce," from Bellini's "Puritani." Caradori sang Mozart's "Deh per questo" charmingly. The lady characters distinguished themselves in Benedict's beautiful ritornello, "Strew, strew, joyously," from his opera of "The Brides of Venice" Miss Dolby, Miss Poole, Messrs Hobbs, Machin, and Hart. Mr Lockey did great service as Don José.

Friday concluded the Festival, with Handel's "Messiah," and, alt ough we find no fault with the praiseworthy exertions of Caradori, Miss Dolby, Miss Poole, Messrs. Hobbs, Machin, and Herr Scaniglí, we must again repeat our regret that the greatest singers of sacred music in this age—Miss Hawes and Mr. Henry Phillips—were not included in the scheme.

The Ball, on Friday night, was well attended.

The musical results of the Festival may be stated to have been first, the complete failure of Spohr's "Calvary," and the great success given to Mendelssohn's music. Mozart's glorious "Requiem" and Beethoven's Choral Symphony, composed in honour of St. Cecilia's Day, 1692; Weber's "Hymn;" Haydn's "Seasons;" Handel's "Alexander's Feast," and "Messiah"—were great triumphs. The Symphonies of Mozart and Beethoven's Mount Sinai created delight. The singers who created the greatest sensation were Grisi, Staudigl, and Mario. We join cordially in the vote of thanks to Benedict, as conductor, and to the Rev. Mr. Elwin, for their services. The general result exhibits a sale of 10,3 guinea tickets and 6724 half-guines. The largest attendance, as usual (1839 persons), was at the "Messiah"—the smallest at Spohr's "Calvary," (1021.)

The Festival was attended by the Bishop of Norwich, the Marquis of Lansdowne, Lord Glenelg, Viscount Ranelagh, the High Sheriff of he County, Buckseworth, Esq., the Mayor of Norwich (Sir W. Foster, Bart.), Viscount and Viscountess Jocelyn, Lord and Lady Sandys, Lord and Lady Bayning, Lord Stanley, and Lady Colburne, Lord Rothbam, the Sheriffs of London, Mr. Hume, M.P., the Dean of Westminster, &c. &c.

THE BEETHOVEN MONUMENT.

The Festival, given on the occasion of the Inauguration of Beethoven's Monument, so fully described and illustrated in our Numbers of August 16 and 22, has provoked much discussion. Petty jealousies and artistical intrigues have sought to render a solemn ceremonial ignoble, because, in the throng of celebrities gathered on the occasion, some petty personages with enormous pretensions did not receive the homage they had anticipated. We are sorry that some English writers have been exempt from the display of bad feeling; but our present purpose is with that portion of the French press which has asked what England has done for the Beethoven Monument? We are fortunately enabled to reply to this question by the publication of some letters in documents, namely, the correspondence between Schlegel and the Earl of Westmoreland in 1837, and the invitation given to Sir George Smart, by the Bonn Committee. Without further commentary we subjoin these letters:—

Correspondence between Herr Von Schlegel, President of the Bonn Committee for the Beethoven Monument, and Lord Burgherst, now the Earl of Westmoreland.

LONDON, July 23, 1837.

My dear M de Schlegel,—I have delayed answering your letter of the 21st of May till I should be able to give you some account of the result of the appeal which, in conformity to your wishes, I made to the great musical societies established in this country, and to the profession at large, in favour of the cause you advocated; and I have the sincerest pleasure in announcing to you, that it has been responded to by these with an unanimity and zeal, which, while it brings honour to themselves, has added a tribute to the genius of that great master of the art, L. Von Beethoven, which must be gratifying to his admirers, and most over refunded to the honour of his name, and best testimony to the just appreciation of his transcendant talents by the musical profession of this country. As the best demonstration of these feelings, I beg to enclose you the copies of the answers which I received to the communication which I made of your wishes, from the noble directors of the Ancient Concerts, from the directors and members of the Philharmonic Concerts, from the professors belonging to the Ancient Concerts and to the Italian Opera House, and from the committee of management, the professors, and students of the Royal Academy of Music. I must also mention the honourable way in which the lessee and professors of the Theatre Royal, Drury Lane contributed towards the general object, and I beg to point out to you the names of the eminent vocal performers who contributed their aid upon the occasion. The result has been that a Concert, supported by the gratuitous assistance of considerably more than two hundred of the first Professors of this Kingdom (whose names you will find in the book of the Concert, which I herewith inclose), was given at Drury Lane Theatre, on the 19th instant, in which the compositions of Beethoven alone were performed, and with a power and effect which certainly have never been surpassed. I am sorry to say, that the lamented death of our late lamented King, after the Concert had been announced, the consequent mourning, and the dissolution of Parliament only two days before the Concert took place, prevented the public in general from paying that homage to the name of the great master which is universally felt in England, and which, under more favourable circumstances, they, undoubtedly, would have given proof of. I fear, therefore, that the contribution I shall be enabled to transmit to you will not materially exceed the sum which I expended in order to invite you will not materially exceed the sum which I expended in order to invite you will not materially exceed the sum which I expended in order to invite quay and jetty frontage; with three entrances from the Thames, of the following widths, viz., Hermitage and Wapping, 49 feet; Shadwell, 45 feet, where the depth of water, at spring tides, is 27 feet. The Western Dock comprises 20 acres; the Eastern 7 acres; and the Wapping Basin, 3 acres.

THE KILN, LONDON DOCKS.

We have recently glanced at the commercial statistics of the River Thames and the Port of London and its Docks, in the Key to our large View of the Metropolis, published in January last. We shall, therefore, on the present occasion, only advert to the leading features of our illustrations. One fact, however, is not referred to in the account just alluded to—that although London has been, for centuries, styled "the Great Emporium of Nations," its Docks have been the construction of the present century. Thus, the West India Docks were opened in 1802; the London in 1805; East India, 1806; Commercial, 1807; St. Katharine, 1828.

The London Docks are separated from St. Katharine's by Nightingale-lane. In round numbers, the former affords water room for 302 sail of vessels, exclusive of lighters; warehouse-room for 220,000 tons of goods; and vault room for 80,000 pipes of wine and spirits. The superficial area of the vault-room is 309,543 feet; of the warehouse-room, 1,402,115 feet. The total number of vessels which entered the Docks in 1844 was 1911; 362,294 tonnage. The business of the Docks is managed by a Company, whose capital is £4,000,000, and there have been as many as 3200 labourers employed in the Docks in one day.

The Tobacco Warehouses, covering five acres, are very attractive to visitors: they will contain about 24,000 hogsheads. Passages, and alleys, each several hundred feet long, are bordered on both sides by close and compact ranges of these hogsheads, generally two in height, or eight feet, with here and there a small space for the counting house of the officers of Customs, under whose inspection all the arrangements are conducted. There is a small dock of one acre, exclusively devoted to ships laden with tobacco.

Near the north-east corner of the Warehouses is a door inscribed "To the Kiln," where damaged tobacco is burnt; the long pipe which carries off the smoke being jocularly termed "the Queen's Pipe." In this Kiln are burnt all such goods as do not fetch the amount of their duty and Customs charges; and herein have been consumed tobacco, silks, satins, tea, beef, pork, and 45,000 pairs of gloves—the latter at one burning! The wine and spirits, under the above circumstances, are emptied into the water-room.

Still more bewildering for their extent and the value of property which they contain, are the Wine and Spirit Vaults, one of which has an area of seven acres. Our artist has depicted this subterranean storehouse of Bacchus.

We may sum up with the following table, obligingly furnished from official sources, of the

THE GREAT WINE VAULT, LONDON DOCKS.

OTELLO.

A TALE OF THE OPERA.

He entered the Princess' apartment. The splendid room, with its gorgeous carpets and gilded cornices, the rich drapery of the curtains, and the varied colours of the Turkish ottomans, pained him, for the pomp of luxury and wealth contrasts sadly with the weak and wasted frame that lies the prey of anguish or disease. And how startling was that contrast here between the brilliant style of the apartment, and the poor pale girl, who, wrapped in a simple white dress, reclined on a large sofa.

The impression that her features and figure made on him the first time he saw her in a far different scene, recurred again to the Major's mind. It was her simple, unadorned beauty, her calm dignity, tempered by the magic of an almost childish good-humour, that then enchanted him. A blight had fallen on the flower now, and it was drooping weak and faded to the earth. But the transparent paleness of her cheek, the deep sorrow that dwelt in the eye that sparkled no more, invested her with a kind of beauty even more affecting. The Major stopped at some distance from the couch, and looked upon her with an expression of the deepest sympathy. She pointed to a seat; she spoke to him; her voice had lost that light clear tone that suits so well with the gladsome words which leave behind a smile upon the lips that utter them. It was weaker, softer; and oh! how sad for those to hear who had listened to her laugh and song!

"It would be foolish of me, Major, were I long to leave you in ignorance why I have sent for you. I know that the Count has informed you, as his best friend, of an attachment that should never have been formed. Do you recollect the evening of 'Othello?' I told you of a note I had received: I remember you implored me to give it you unread? Why was it you did so?"

"Because, your Highness, I feared I knew what it contained."

"You knew it, then, also!" said the Princess, bitterly, and her eyes filled with tears. "Put not your trust in princes, it is said; alas! in whom can princes trust? I thought you, from the hour I first saw you, a man of honour. If you knew the connections of the Count, oh! why did you not bid him sooner begone from hence? why did you not tell me? why did you not spare me the pang I feel in being compelled to—to—despise him?"

"By all that I hold sacred, your Highness—by that honour to which you have appealed—I can swear that I knew it only one hour before you received that note, and then I knew it only from a letter that was placed in my hands by some one who mistook me for the Count. I was hastening to him to demand an explanation of the mystery, when I was told he had fled from the city. I guessed, from an allusion in my note, that you would not be spared, and I tried, in vain, to get possession of the paper which had already reached you."

"And do you believe the story?" said the Princess, weeping; "Oh, it is but a device of certain persons who are resolved to part us! Read this note; it is the one I received; judge yourself if it is not a forgery!"

The Major read it:

"Count Z. is married; his wife lives at Avignon; three young children are left forsaken by a cruel father; can a high-born lady have so little honour, and so little feeling, as to entice him any longer from these sacred obligations?"

It was in the same writing with the same seal, as the note he had received himself. He looked at the lines steadily; he knew not what to answer. His strong sense of truth would not permit him to say anything against his convictions; his sympathy for the Princess' sufferings withheld him from rudely shattering her last earthly hope.

"When I opened that note," she continued, "carelessly and without suspicion, the words 'wife' and 'father' stunned me, like the voice of judgment! All my senses forsook me—what happened I know not; I awoke here—oh! to what wretchedness. But if I am calm for a single hour my hopes revive; I think that Zronovieski cannot be so vilely base—that he cannot have so shamefully deceived me! Oh, smile, Major; look as if you thought so too! Nay, you may laugh for me for being so crushed in heart and soul, by a wretched scrawl, containing a lie forged by I know not whom! You think yourself it is a falsehood, a calumny do you not, Major? Oh! speak!"

The Major almost lost his self-possession; what could he say? She hung so expectingly upon his lips, it seemed as if one word from him could save or slay her! Her eyes gleamed again with something of their former light, and a faint smile played for a moment on her countenance—she listened as if for the voice of her guardian angel!

He answered her not; he looked down in silence—and the silence was understood. Every trace of hope vanished from her features; her eyes drooped, her lips were pressed together as by one sharp pang, the light flush that had gathered on her cheek forsook it; she sank her head into her hands, and clasped them tightly over her eyes—but her tears flowed no more!

"I see it all!" she said; "you are too upright to flatter me with hopes which in a few days must be destroyed! I thank you—thank you even for this dreadful certainty. It is better than the hovering between hope and fear; and now, my friend, take that casket, try and return it to him—it contains many things that were dear to me—yet, no! leave it with me a few days; I will send it to you when all earthly things will be alike to me!" After a pause of a few moments, she continued; "I feel that I have not long to live; I am not superstitious—and yet how is it I was struck down directly after that fatal play?"

"I could not have thought such an idea could give your Highness a moment's uneasiness," said the Major.

"You are right, it is folly; but the very night I was brought home ill from the theatre, I dreamed I was dying. I thought a tall, dark woman, in a white dress, was standing over me with a red silk pillow in her hand, and she pressed it down upon my mouth and face, stronger and stronger, till I was nearly suffocated. Then all at once I thought my great uncle, Duke Nepomuk came, exactly as he is painted in the picture in the long gallery, and freed me from her; and the strangest thing is"——

"What!" said the Major. "What did the painted Duke do with Desdemona?"

The Princess started. "How know you that the lady was Desdemona? Tell me, I beseech of you, tell me how you knew that?"

The Major reflected for a moment. "What is more natural," he then said, "than that you should dream of Desdemona? You had seen her that evening lying on a crimson couch."

"It is strange that you should have thought of her too!" said the Princess; "but the strangest thing of all is, that I woke as the Duke liberated me; woke actually, and I saw the tall, dark woman with the silken pillow, disappearing slowly through the door. Since that night I have several times had the same dream; with every night she presses me down more tightly—every night the Duke comes later to my rescue; and I always wake, and see her gliding out at the door! Last evening I called for my harp, and I touched a few notes of my favourite air Desdemona's song—and, smile if you will—the door opened, and there stood the same figure within the room, looking steadfastly at me!" She added, in an earnest voice, "You will remember me, Major, when I am no more, will you not? The recollection of an upright man is worth having."

"Your Highness," said the Major, struggling in vain with his emotion, "banish these thoughts from your mind; they will retard your recovery."

The attendant appeared at the door, and gave a signal that the interview must terminate. Sophia pressed her hand for him to kiss, and he took leave of her with the deepest compassion and respect. He raised his eyes once more to her countenance: it was calm and fearless—fixed in the quietude of one who had ceased to hope; some its expression would have deceived, but the Major saw too well that all was over: her heart was broken, and the outward composure of her features was but the marble rigidity of despair!

X.

The city was engrossed for a few days by the accounts of the illness of the Princess: now it was rumoured that she was dying; now that there was still some prospect of her recovery; an uncertainty which, for those who knew her, was terrible. Very early one morning a servant brought to the Major a casket, a glance at the mourning suit of the retainer told him, without inquiry, that the Princess was no more. He had last many who were dear to him, but had never felt so deep a sorrow as for this gentle girl, whom he had known but for so short a time, but with whose destiny he had become so strangely implicated. It seemed as if he had but one duty left him to perform to fulfil her last wish, and to deliver his charge with her dying breath it was intended for. He hurried to the city immediately, but for the invitation he had received to attend the funeral. On his day appointed, when he heard the tolling of the bells, the tramp of horsemen, and saw the flash of the sun upon which lighted on the casque the first of one of Royal birth, he quitted his house for the first time, and joined the procession. He heard not the whispers of those around him, who were talking of her beauty, her wealth, her virtues, the sudden decease, and the early death: he thought only of the last interview; as she then looked and spoke, she stood before him again. They took the symbols of her birth and rank from the coffin, and lowered it slowly into the vault of her ancestors. The crowd dispersed, the attendants quenched their torches and departed. The Major threw a last look at the spot where the tomb had closed over her. "So perishes the beautiful on earth!" he thought—and then turned, and slowly moved away.

Before him walked, with tottering, shuffling step, an old man, who was shedding tears, and seemed deeply affected As the Major passed by his side, he looked round—it was the Manager of the Theatre. The old man drew nearer to him, gazed earnestly at him, as if he wished to say something, but could not speak. At last he said—

"Do you not wish, Major, that I had only dreamed, and that that fair girl, whom they have laid in the grave, was still alive?"

"Yes, by Heaven!" said the Major; "your dream is verified; she is buried, and we are walking side by side, from her tomb!"

"Therefore may man never sport with Destiny," said the old man, in a solemn voice "It is eleven days since we played "Otello," but she died on the Fourth!"

"Accident! Accident!" said the Major. Would you even now insist on your delusions? Do not I know too well of what she died? A dagger pierced her soul, keener than that which reached Desdemona's breast, a wretch far blacker than Othello broke her heart; but it is folly and superstition to find any connection between her death and your opera!"

"Our dispute will not bring her back to life," said the old man, mournfully. "Believe what you will—I shall record what I know in my chronicle. It could not have been, otherwise"

"It could?" exclaimed the Major, passionately. "It need not have been so: one word from me might, perhaps, have saved her. In Heaven's name, bring not your "Otello" into the question. I tell you, it is all accident—accident, and nothing else!"

"Pardon me, Sir," said the old man; "on earth nothing is ACCIDENT—and all is PROVIDENCE! And where CRIME has been, there will come RETRIBUTION. But here is my dwelling; I must take my leave. Think what you please," he continued, while he pressed the cold hand of the Major in his own; "the fact is so—she died—and died—eight days after 'Otello!'"

ROYAL HANSARD.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The operations in the English Market have been of the most limited character during the week, and although at the commencement a slight improvement of prices occurred, this has not been maintained to any considerable fatness prevailed in the market on Thursday, Consols receding ⅛ per cent upon the prices of the preceding day. This fatness continues, and at closing, Consols for money are 89¾, for account, 89⅞. Exchequer Bills continue about 48 to 49 prem. India Bonds are 66; India Stock, 267 to 269. Long Annuities, 18⅞.

In only circumstances worthy of record in the Foreign House, have been the fall in Portuguese and Dutch Stock. The cause of these fluctuations cannot be clearly ascertained, and, by many, are attributed to the continued absence of business in the Spanish market, owing to the non payment of the dividend, which was expected to have created an active demand for the Spanish 5 per cent. The latter causes may have a general effect upon foreign securities, little doubt can be entertained. A strong reason, however, exists for the fall in the Dutch 2½ per cent, which is the conversion, four per cent. is the limit of the dividend payable. Until the period that this took place (and, although, a voluntary conversion, it was generally adopted) the dividend was the relevant gradations as per cent. The holders having agreed to the conversion, finding the price continue good, are now beginning to realise, while the speculators having nothing of a prospective benefit to look forward to, the quotations are dead. This, we think, may be regarded as a reason for the depreciation. With regard to Dutch Stock, another reason may be assigned. Dutch Stock is largely held by the Dutch people, who are notoriously wary, and active in taking advantage of any coming change in the Money Markets of this country, and Europe generally. That a material change will occur here, ere long, has been a growing opinion on the Dutch Exchange, and, thus fai, may be, in a measure, regarded as its result. The closing price of the Two-and-a Half per Cents is 59⅞ to 60¾, which is a point better than the previous day's quotation. Portugese close at 39. The Spanish 5 per cents, 16 little better than nominal: the Three per Cents are 38½; Deferred, 16; Equador Bonds are rather worse, closing at 4⅜; Grenada Bonds, 22; and Brazilian, 69

The Railway Market continues animated, and prices, with some exceptions, are well maintained. Cambridge and Lincoln have suddenly been in demand, and Eastern Counties, which have been dull for some days, have fallen; Birmingham Railway Directors have agreed to an amalgamation with the London and Birmingham line, the basis of which is, an undertaking, on the part of the latter, to pay a dividend equal to that of the Grand Junction for the second, and whatever dividend may be declared on London and Birmingham Stock afterwards. The arrangement is subject to the approval of the proprietors, at a special meeting. The Great Valley contracts have been taken at £12,000 per mile, exclusive of rails, chairs, &c. This, although favourable, has not influenced the price of the shares. Scrips in the new lines continue to appear in the market daily. The rule against selling for the "coming on," prevents any authorised quotation; but we may remark that the new issue of shares in the Essex and Suffolk Railway have been allotted, and the Scrip is already at a premium of ¼ per cent in the market. At closing, prices are maintained with considerable business doing. The following are the last quotations of shares most dealt in — Birmingham and Oxford Junction, 6; Boston, Stamford, and Birmingham, 14; Bristol and Exeter, New, 10¾; Caledonian, 13¾; Ditto Extension, 4¾; Cambridge and Lincoln, 42; Ditto New, 8½; Chester and Holyhead, 20¾; Chester and Manchester, 2½; Chesterham and Oxford, 3¾; Cork and Waterford, 2½; Coventry, Nuneaton, Birmingham, and Leicester, 4¼. SATURDAY, MORNING.—Although the business in shares yesterday was not so brisk as it had been on other opening days, the market was tolerably firm. There was an improvement in Cambridge and Lincoln, and Eastern Counties, owing to an arrangement between the two, and in Brighton. The old lines, including Great North of England, Great Western, Birmingham, Newcastle and Darlington, and Croydon, and London and York, Manchester and Thirsten, and several of the other scrips were cheaper. The Money Market was flat. Consols receded to 89¾ for the account, and for money to 90¼. Very little was doing in the Foreign funds. The only fresh prices were: for Danish, 90; for Spanish Three per Cents., 38; for Dutch Two-and Half per Cents., 60; and for Equador, 5.

LOSS OF THE YACHT "VECTIS," OFF BOGNOR.

WRECK OF THE YACHT "VECTIS."

About ten days since, the yacht Vectis, the property of R. A. Mangin, Esq., during a heavy breeze from the south-east, struck on a reef of rocks off Bognor, and immediately foundered; so that the persons on board, Mr. Mangin and a passenger friend of his, Mr. C. Crew Read, with difficulty reached the shore, after being a considerable time up to their waists in water. The Vectis was bound from Portsmouth eastward. The yacht became a total wreck; and Messrs. R. and P. Isemonger, of Littlehampton, the deputy vice-admirals, &c., were instructed to dispose of the materials.

CHURCH OF THE HOLY TRINITY, BISHOP'S ROAD, PADDINGTON.

This elegant and spacious Church is now in the course of erection, in Bishop's Road, Paddington, to accommodate the residents of a neighbourhood which has lately sprung into existence with surprising rapidity, and which, for extent and respectability, surpasses that of any other suburb round London. The neighbourhood owes its origin chiefly to the Terminus of the Great Western Railway being situated here; as well as to the fashion of wealth and rank to progress, in this Great Metropolis, westward.

The distance of this locality from any church was seriously felt, and the parish of Paddington has promptly and liberally supplied the deficiency by building the above church. The design is in the perpendicular or best style of English architecture. It is built of Kentish rag-stone, with dressings of Bath stone.

The body of the Church is a parallelogram, containing a Nave and two side Aisles, the length of which, from the Vestibule to the Chancel, is one hundred feet; the width is sixty feet; the Chancel is in addition twenty-four feet six inches in length, and twenty-five feet six inches in width: the latter will be adorned with a magnificent window of stained glass, the estimated cost of which will be £500.

The Tower, beneath which is the western entrance, is ornamented with pinnacles; and the spire will be octangular and crocketed at the angles. the height will be, to the apex of the spire, two hundred and nineteen feet. As the basement, or crypt of the Church, is on a level with the tops of the houses in Belgrave and Eaton-squares, some idea of the elevation may be imagined.

The interior will present a very beautiful appearance: the side Aisles will be separated from the Nave by Gothic pillars, supporting a groined roof, richly ornamented with bosses, &c. The height of the Clere-story, from the floor to the roof, will be nearly seventy feet. Each Side Aisle will contain a Gallery, supported by massive iron girders; the faces of which, with the pews and seats in the centre of the Nave, will be of a dark wood, polished. There will be sittings sufficient to accommodate between sixteen and seventeen hundred persons.

The Pulpit and Reading Desk will also be of dark wood, handsomely carved. A fine Organ, the cost of which will be a thousand pounds, will be placed at the Western end, above the children's gallery: it is building by Mr. Bishop, of the New Road.

Within the Tower, a provision is made for a Peal of Bells: indeed, nothing seems to be forgotten which will make it worthy of the rich parish erecting it.

The Vestry, which is situated at the North-eastern angle of the building, and which is shown in the engraving, is octangular, and in keeping in all its ornaments and style to the rest of the building. There is one very similar to the above at York Minster.

The architect is Mr. Thomas Cundy; and the design will add to his already established reputation in church-building. Messrs. Higgs and Son are the builders; and, from the style in which they have already executed a large portion of the work, there is every reason to believe that full justice will be done to the design.

The Rev. Mr. Miles, who has received the presentation of the living, has contributed a handsome sum towards the expense of the erection of the church; the entire cost of which is estimated at fourteen thousand pounds.

CHURCH OF THE HOLY TRINITY, BISHOP'S-ROAD, PADDINGTON.

MONUMENT TO THE LATE REAR-ADMIRAL MAITLAND.

A beautiful white marble monument has just been placed in the chapel of the Dockyard at Portsmouth, to the memory of Sir Frederick Lewis Maitland, who presided, in the office of Admiral-Superintendent, in the Arsenal at Portsmouth, from 1832 to 1837, and left behind him a high reputation for benevolence, goodness of heart, and humanity towards all those placed under him.

With other circumstances which have attached fame and honour to the name of the gallant deceased is associated one which must hand down his name to posterity, as connected with the most remarkable events of modern times; we allude to the fact of Napoleon having surrendered to him, on board the Bellerophon, 78, after the disastrous affair of Waterloo, when off Rochfort, on the 15th of July, 1815, as inscribed at the foot of the memorial.

The work does infinite credit to the abilities and taste of the artist (Mr. T. Campbell, of Great Marlborough street, London), and represents, in alto relievo, the bust of the Admiral, in his uniform, beneath the folds of a cloak. The likeness is very correct, exhibiting the staid and determined character of the officer, yet blended with that expression of kindness for which the man was so well known and beloved.

The following inscription is chiselled on the base:—

To the Memory of Rear-Admiral Sir Frederick Lewis Maitland, K.C.B., S.F., R.M., and R.G.

This gallant and distinguished officer was most actively employed during the whole period of his career, and served in every clime. He entered the naval service early in life, was a midshipman on board the Southampton in the action of the 1st of June, 1794, commanded a division of gun-boats in Egypt in 1801; and when in command of the Bellerophon, off Rochfort, Napoleon Bonaparte, after his defeat at Waterloo, surrendered to him on the 15th of July, 1815. He was Admiral-Superintendent of Portsmouth Dockyard from the year 1832 to 1837, and Commander-in-Chief in India from that date to the period of his decease.

He died at sea, off Bombay, on the 30th of November, 1839, aged 62.

In testimony of their deep sorrow, and to record their admiration of his talents, his firmness, his gallantry, and his worth, this memorial was placed here by his brother officers, followers, and friends.

ROSAS AND BUENOS AYRES.

From the mingling of the Spanish and Indian race there has arisen on the wide Plains and Pampas of the Rio de Plata, a nomad and half savage people, possessing "much cattle," and being, as horseman and herdsman, without their match in the world—the Guachos. They are proud of their wild freedom and rude equality; bold to rashness; cunning, as most savages are, used to hardship and endurance; and, never sparing themselves, they are as destitute of the "quality of mercy" to others. To this race belongs Don Juan Manuel de Rosas, the almost absolute Master of the Argentine Republic. His reign has continued now for some years.

Among the races of Spanish blood, Constitutional Government seems an impossibility; all is either the violence of one strong hand and will, or the confusion of anarchy. Buenos Ayres under Rosas is an example of the former; to the latter, the Republic of Mexico seems to be rapidly declining. At the present moment more than usual interest attaches to Rosas and his policy since his blockade of Monte Video has brought him into collision with England and France, who, uniting, have seized on the blockading force by which Rosas attempted to stop the navigation of the Rio Plata, and impede the commerce of the vast regions on its banks. The trade of Monte Video is a growing one, and civilised nations have an interest in not permitting it to be crushed in its infancy by the savage despot. Rosas is now at open variance with England and France. As there must be something in the man who thus ventures to "pluck lions by the beard," some notice of his career may not be uninteresting at the present juncture. It will show the sort of ruler with whom we have to deal.

Rosas exhibits in his conduct, all the peculiarities of the race from which he has sprung; they have made him popular among the Guachos, and to his untiring energy and courage, he owes his position as ruler. Among a nation of horsemen, the boldest rider is sure to be honoured, and in this accomplishment Rosas was without a peer. By surpassing the rest in strength and activity, he first gained an ascendancy over his people; he kept it by the force of a strong mind that knew how to flatter their feeling of equality, and yet enforce regulations checking their disorders, particularly the crime of assassination; he prohibited the carrying the knife in the girdle on the Sabbath—the day of festivity, and consequent broils—under the penalty of severe corporal punishment. It is said that once, in forgetfulness, he violated his own order, and insisted on undergoing the punishment for the violation, to the intense delight of the Guachos. But his exertions in repressing assassination did not proceed from any aversion to bloodshed; when engaged in war, or inflicting political vengeance, he is a perfect demon—cold, cruel, and atrocious, massacreing in mass with the utmost indifference. He is enormously wealthy, possessing an estate covering about seventy-four square miles, and feeding three thousand head of cattle. This territory he ruled like a Prince, commanding a kind of army of his own, raised from among his admiring Guachos, and trained by himself, to serve as a force against the Indian tribes of the Pampas, who made frequent incursions on the grazing grounds of the settled districts, and were as skilful reivers and cattle stealers as ever were our Scotch borderers; but the Rob Roys of the Pampas found in Rosas an enemy as cunning as themselves, stronger by discipline, bold in the conflict, and, in the victory, cruel and unsparing; all prisoners were massacred. On one occasion, after a skirmish, eighty were shot at once, and their bodies flung into a pit together. This was the school in which were developed those military talents he has since exhibited in a wider sphere. In conversation, he is said to be grave and earnest; in his dealings, cunning, showing himself as great a master of dissimulation and as treacherous as Ferdinand the Seventh; as of that most legitimate Monarch, his smile is reported to be of evil omen, and he on whom it falls most blandly, frequently finds himself in a dungeon, or has to be sought in a grave.

In a country where the Governments are as often convulsed by revolutions as the soil by earthquakes, there were opportunities enough for such a man to rise, and he was not slow in taking advantage of them. At the close of the war in the Banda Oriental between Buenos Ayres and Brazil, General Lavalle, the commander of the Buenos Ayrean troops, made an attempt to seize the principal authority in these republics—always the prize of the most successful soldier. Dorrego, the President, applied to Rosas, then master of a considerable force, and celebrated by his wild warfare with the Indians, for assistance. It was given, but as yet Lavalle was too strong; Rosas was defeated in an engagement, and Dorrego, having been taken prisoner, was shot, according to the invariable Spanish practice in such cases. But one defeat was not destruction to a man with such talents for a guerilla warfare as Rosas; he retreated to the interior, strengthened his forces among his devoted Guachos, attacked Lavalle, defeated him, and compelled him to retire to Monte Video. From this time, for twelve years, this civil war continued almost uninterruptedly. Lavalle was an enemy quite worthy of Rosas; bold, untiring, and often successful in the field, but inferior to him as a diplomatist and intriguer. Rosas is the chief of the Federalist party, or the Apostolicos, as opposed to the Unitarios or Schismatics, and in his support all the influence of the Jesuits and the Catholic Church, which may account for the length of time he has maintained his position. After the retreat of Lavalle, Rosas, on the 9th of December, 1829, was elected Governor-General or President of Buenos Ayres, and invested with unusual and almost unlimited powers. The Federalists, being thus in the ascendant, immediately overturned everything that had been done by the Unionists, their predecessors in authority. In 1832, Rosas' presidency ended; and he would have been re-elected, but, at his own desire, a dependent of his, General Balacré, was nominated, Rosas thinking he would be a mere puppet in his hands. Balacré must have deceived or betrayed him, for he managed to create disunion in the ranks of the Federalists, the consequence of which was a revolt. Much anxiety was felt as to which party in the outbreak Rosas would join; he was at the time on the Rio Colorado, at the head of the troops sent against Patagonia, but he returned with the utmost speed to Buenos Ayres; and, with his usual promptitude, drove Balacré into exile, and struck his name from the list of Presidents. In every step Rosas had the support of the Congress, who named him "Protector of the Confederation," presented him with a sabre of honour, set with diamonds, and increased his already enormous estate by a gift of a large tract of land. Having thus secured the chief power, he proceeded to consolidate it, and so far succeeded that he has since that time ruled Buenos Ayres almost as a Dictator. He has endeavoured to re-establish trade and commerce, but his energies are ill directed, and he has acted from impulse rather than knowledge, so that his exertions have but raised the country from its deplorable state of financial and commercial embarrassment. His hatred of the Monte Videans, his neighbours, and the Unionists, is so intense that it amounts to madness, and leads him to carry on a constant war without his State, and a persecution of all foreigners within it: under such a system no country can prosper. He classes all strangers among his enemies. "Death to the savage Unionists" is his maxim, and the ruthless sentence appears as the motto of the Federalist journals under his influence. He manifests his hatred even in the most absurd and trifling things; Blue, the colour of the Unionists, is everywhere proscribed, and he has forbidden the wearing the beard on the chin in the fashion of Young France, for the most exquisite reason, that, combined with the whiskers, it describes something in shape like the detested letter U! As long as he exists in power, and the unhappy country is governed by an ignorant and half-savage race; but it is difficult to reconcile such madness as this, with anything that can win the reputation Rosas has acquired in some quarters, of being a statesman. Foreigners, who alone possess the capital and commercial enterprise that can give such a country prosperity, he persecutes and harasses in every possible way—especially Frenchmen. In defiance of a Convention of a former Government with France, he issued an order that every foreigner settled in Beunos Ayres for three years, should be liable to serve in the militia; the French Cabinet protested, negotiated, and at last in 1838 blockaded the Argentine Harbours. The war with Monte Video has continued down to the present time; except the city itself, Rosas is master of the whole country, which is held by a force under General Oribe. His object is to subdue all the States of the River Plate to his authority; but the Monte Videans are independent and resist; and as it is the chief seat of the English and French merchants, these two powerful Governments have interfered to save their subjects from the spoliation and destruction would surely follow the success of the despot Rosas. The blockading fleet is already seized; the withdrawal of the Buenos Ayrean troops from the Banda Oriental must be next insisted on; as to negotiation, it is time wasted. Rosas can comprehend but one argument—the logic of force, and the determination to resort to it. We cannot abandon our countrymen, settled in an independent state, to the chance of an indiscriminate massacre, which, in all probability, would follow the capture of Monte Video. We have delayed our interference almost culpably, till the last and desperate crisis, but even now rescue may be possible. There is also a great advantage in having the co-operation of France. If the two great arival powers of Europe have a common cause in which to act together, it will do more to destroy national jealousies than a hundred dissertations on the folly of considering ourselves "national enemies." We are acting together for our mutual interest in Madagascar, and on the river Plate; if the two great civilised States continue their league against these half-savage and wholly-destructive Powers, mankind at large will be as much the gainers by their friendship, as they would be losers by their enmity.

THE MUSEUM OF THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF SURGEONS.

The magnificent Museum of preparations attached to the Royal College of Surgeons in Lincoln's-inn-fields—the first of its kind in the world—owes its foundation to the untiring industry and talents of John Hunter, the great anatomist and physiologist, who devoted his life to collecting the most important specimens in those great branches of knowledge—Natural History, Comparative Anatomy, Physiology, and Pathology. The Museum was originally arranged by him, in a building contiguous to his house, in Leicester-square, and was completed in 1787, when it was opened for inspection during the month of October to the medical profession, and in May to non-professional patrons, and cultivators or lovers of physiology or natural history.

Upon his death, in 1793, from disease of the heart—the immediate cause being a dispute in the Board-room of St. George's Hospital, and its excitement and attendant thereupon—directions were left in his will that his Museum should be offered in the first instance to Government, on such terms as might be considered reasonable; and in case of refusal should be sold in one lot, as the executors might think proper. Nothing was, however, done with it for six years, when Parliament voted £15,000 for the Museum; and an offer of it being made to the Corporation of Surgeons, it was accepted on the terms proposed by Government. Further grants having been made, a building was completed in Lincoln's-inn-fields, and the Museum opened for the inspection of visitors in 1813; but this proving too small, in consequence of the numerous additions, for the proper display and arrangement of the specimens, the present noble building was erected, and opened in 1835, at the expense of the College, and at a cost of about £40,000.

At present, the total number of Specimens already amounts to twenty-three thousand! Of these, upwards of ten thousand belonged to John Hunter's original Museum; the remainder have since been added. Hunter's main object was "to illustrate, as far as possible, the whole subject of life, by preparations of the bodies in which its phenomena are presented;" and, besides this, in the Pathological division of the Museum, there were about 2500 specimens to illustrate, further, the processes of common disease, and the actions of restoration; the effects of specific diseases: and the effects of various diseases, arranged according to their locality in the body.

It would be impossible to give even a synopsis of these specimens in the present place; indeed, the majority of them would be of little interest to the general reader. We will, therefore, merely mention those likely to prove objects of the greatest curiosity to the non-professional visitor; referring others, who may be desirous of becoming more intimately acquainted with the preparations, to the elaborate catalogues of the Museum.

Our view is that which first strikes the sight of the spectator, on entering at the chief door from the hall of the College. The disposition of the specimens and cases on the floor, and the situation of the galleries, are correctly delineated. The first large object seen, on the right, is the fossil shell of a gigantic extinct Armadillo, from Buenos Ayres. A shell of the common Armadillo is placed on this enormous specimen, to show by comparison its vast size, which was also its protection, as it has no joints to roll itself up with, like the animal of the present day. On the left is the fossil skeleton of the Mylodon, a large extinct quadruped of the Sloth family, also found at Buenos Ayres. It is disposed as if climbing up a tree, to feed on the branches, &c., such being its manner in which, it is conjectured, it contrived to exist. Beyond this, to the left, is the skeleton of the Hippopotamus, the head of which is just seen in the engraving; and on the extreme right, over the shell of the Armadillo, are the bones of the pelvis, tail, and left hind leg of the mighty Megatherium, whose name indicates recollections of recent geological disputes. The cabinets on either side the centre avenue contain various anatomical preparations of parts of the human subject, fishes, and reptiles. The large skeleton to the right of the centre, is that of Charles O'Brian, the Irish giant, and is eight feet in height. He was only 22 at the time of his death, which was precipitated by excessive drinking. Two ordinary skeletons, male and female, are placed on his left side, and on his right is that of Caroline Crachami, the Sicilian dwarf, who died in London, in 1824, at the age of ten years. The skeleton, which is under a glass case, is only twenty inches in height. There are two plaster casts of hands on the pedestal—one of M. Louis, the French giant, who measured seven feet four inches; the other of Patrick Cotter, another Irish giant, who was eight feet seven inches high. In an adjoining glass case is the glove of O'Brian. The shoes of this extraordinary individual are at present, we believe, in the possession of Mr. Thomas Addiscott, of Addiscott, Surrey, in Surrey. Their enormous size is almost incredible, looking more like the large models displayed by tradesmen over their shops, as signs, than the ordinary coverings of any human foot.

Proceeding along the Museum on the left are casts, in plaster, of the bones of an extinct and huge bird, the Dinornis gigantea, which must have stood at least ten feet high, and was a native of New Zealand. It is placed, by way of comparison, by the side of a full-sized Ostrich. Still further, is the skeleton of the American Elk, and under it that of the Great Penguin, from the extreme southern point that Rose touched at. This is the only specimen of the kind in England. Behind this, is a skeleton of the Giraffe; and, on the right, the skeleton of the gigantic Irish Elk, the span of the antlers of which measures eight feet. The specimen was exhumed from a peat bog near Limerick. The large skeleton in the centre will be looked at with interest; it is that of the Elephant Chunee, who, after being exhibited on the stage at Covent-garden Theatre, was purchased by Mr. Cross for Exeter 'Change, where, it was said in 1826, during an aggravated annual paroxysm, but not until it had received more than a hundred bullets. There is a full account of the occurrence in Moore's "Every Day Book." In front of this is the plaster cast of the young Negro, and a bust of John Hunter by Flaxman.

Passing through a doorway on the left hand, we enter the Small Museum, which contains many objects of popular interest. Immediately before us is the skeleton of a man who died at the age of twenty-five from chronic Hydrocephalus, or water on the brain. The skull is enormous, measuring forty-eight inches in circumference: and the entire skeleton displays many peculiarities highly interesting to the anatomist. It was presented by Mr. Liston, the eminent surgeon. In the next case are the two skulls of a double-headed child, born in Bengal, who lived to be four years old, when it was killed by the bite of a Cobra de Capello. The skulls are united by their crowns; the upper head is therefore inverted. It had four eyes, which moved in different directions at the same time, and the superior eyelids never thoroughly closed even when the child was asleep. In the same case is a portion of the intestines of Napoleon Buonaparte, preserved in spirits, and showing the progress of the disease which carried him off. Adjoining is a very remarkable skeleton, the joints of which are anchylosed, or rendered immoveable, by unnatural splints of bone growing out in all directions. But perhaps the object of the greatest interest is the preparation known as "the shaft case," between the wall cabinets on the left hand. On the 13th of June, 1812, Mr. Thomas Ripple was impaled by the shaft of a chaise, near Stratford, by a stray stump. The shaft entered his chest under the left arm, and came out under the right arm, being thrust through by the violence of an unruly horse, as far as the first tug-hook, which also penetrated the chestand wounded the left lung. The unfortunate man received his first attention from those who were passing at the time, drew out the shaft; and, wonderful to relate, the patient recovered. He was attended by Mr. Maiden and Sir William Blizard, and survived the injury thirty-seven years. The preparation consists of the shaft itself, are side by side. As a companion to this is the iron pivot of a try-sail mast, which was driven right through the body of a seaman, John Toyler, a Prussian by birth, of the brig Janet, of Scarborough, Captain John Good, Master. The accident occurred in the London Docks, Feb. 25, 1831. Whilst guiding the pivot of the try-sail mast into the mainboom, the tackle gave way, and the pivot passed obliquely through Toyler's body, between the heart and left lung, and rested him to the deck. The try-sail mast was thirty-nine feet long, and weighed about 500lbs. He was carried to the London Hospital, where, under the care of Mr. J. G. Smith, he recovered entirely in five months, as to be enabled to walk from the hospital to the college and back again. He at the same time sustained various other injuries. His scalp was laid open; his lower jaw and four ribs fractured; but he ultimately returned to his duties as a seaman, and is now alive

There are several mummies in this room. Amongst them we observe the first wife of the late eccentric Dr. Hunter; and a female who died of consumption in 1775. The plan pursued was that of injecting all the vessels and viscera with camphor and turpentine. A mummy, in a sitting position, with its cheeks resting on its hands, and elbows supported on the knees, is supposed to be that of a Peruvian nobleman, who immolated himself with his wife and child some centuries ago. The expression of the figure is painful.

The Museum is open to fellows and members of the College, and to visitors introduced by them, or by written orders (not transferable), on Mondays, Tuesdays, Wednesdays, and Thursdays, from twelve to four o'clock; on Fridays, it is open only for the purposes of study. The arrangements for the admission of learned and scien tific foreigners, state officers, church and law dignitaries, and members of scientific bodies, are liberal and judicious. We cannot do better than recommend our readers to visit the Museum, and see the principal preparations, likely, as we have before said, to interest the non-professional world; and which we have thus superficially described.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Wednesday.

The more I see of Paris the more convinced am I of the superior ingenuity of the French in all that relates to small or large swindling, and as to everything that relates to the perfection of the delicate transmission of chains, and the removal of watches, purses, &c. &c., the individuals constituting the swell mob of England are mere awkward apprentices, or untaught thieves, to the high artistes en escroquerie of Parisian society, in a finished artiste—refined, polished, dressed in capital style, and perfect from bearer to boots; gloved like a D'Orsay, and shirted like a Brummel. An acquaintance of mine, who was a great friend of the Prince de Joinville, was cured only during the last week. A handsome fellow, wearing a cross in his button hole, and stating himself to be the nephew of a banker, who is also a member of the Chamber of Deputies—Rose and Rothschild—he has been fleecing the badauds most brilliantly and successfully; and more than one of the leading houses for furniture has been duped to a heavy amount. He assumed that he was the intimate friend of the Prince de Joinville, and with whom he had made the campaign of St. Jean d' Ulloa, and that he had accompanied his highness to St. Helena for the purpose of bearing to France the honourable remains of Napoleon. Every drawer in Joinville willingly swallowed the bait, book and all; from the jeweler to the draper, from the perfumer to the tailor. But the scheme der proved fatal to Eugene de M. A few days since, Eugene de M. called upon Prince Joinville in apparent haste, and said "It is absolutely necessary, my dear friend, that I have, in two days, a naval lieutenant's uniform, of the most splendid materials; for the Prince de Joinville, who was the bearer of the despatches announcing the new mode of propulsion invented by M. Siguer at the Académie des Sciences, finding it impossible to attend, has requested that I would take his place in this interesting ceremony. You will perceive that I am obliged to be in company with Admirals, and the highest persons of the kingdom, that I should worthily appear as the representative of my friend the Prince; there, fore, let me have another fitting, but not too much lace, merely the simple embroidery necessary to my grade." The uniform was put into train, and the best snips at work, when one of the most celebrated painters of Paris happened to call upon Eugene de M., and, to his astonishment, the favourite of Prince Joinville left slowly, recommending the victim to be sure not to disappoint. "Do you know that young fellow?" asked the painter "Oh, perfectly," was the reply. "He is the nephew of the banker Ganneau, and the intimate friend of Prince Joinville." "You are robbed, my dear sir; the fellow is no more the nephew of the banker G——, than I am, and can only know the Prince from seeing him occasionally when her comes on board the Belle Poule. That he is a swindler I have the best means of knowing, as he once introduced himself at my lodgings, and robbed me of a splendid gold watch." The same scene is then said to have passed by the schneider, and, of course, placed in durance until his trial for this, and innumerable other cases of swindling. I merely cite this as one case out of thousands that daily take place. You will perceive that assurance, education, and dramatic feeling are necessary for the proper carrying out these kinds of small comedies of real life. I do not wonder at the contempt expressed by the Parisian swell for native Professionals, when anything exceedingly gauche is done in their peculiar line, it is stigmatised as being as much an as English thief, and as coarse as a London burglary. So much for French refinement!

The Polish refugees residing at Paris, met at Passy, to pay their tributes of regret and affection to Madame Hoffman-Tanski, whose death took place, prematurely, a few days since. You are aware that she was the banker Ganneau's

Rosas by the British and French Ministers, demanding a categorical answer in seventy two hours. This was confirmed to the British merchants on the afternoon of the 10th, by the British Chargé, Mr. Turner, who read to the Chairman of their Committee, a despatch from Mr. Ouseley, dated the 9th of July, to the effect that "the Baron Diffaudis and Mr. Ouseley had finally demanded the withdrawal of the Argentine troops, and the retirement of the Argentine squadron, from before Monte Video;" and that they had also offered their mediation to the Monte Videan Government for the purpose of arranging a definitive peace between the two republics. The Chargé subsequently stated to the Chairman of the Committee, that he was directed to inform him, in reply to a representation from the merchants, stating their apprehensions as to their situation, that "they, the British and French Ministers, had demanded a cessation of hostilities, and had taken measures which did not admit of delay."

CANADA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

We have received some private correspondence, and the most recent journals from Canada, and, although the news which they collectively contain is not of paramount European importance, yet there is matter of general interest to the public, and intelligence upon which our readers will not fail to set a due value, receiving it, as they will, at first hand.

First, and of most vital consequence to our commercial relations, are the confirmatory notices which have reached our colony of the threatening state of affairs in South America. Almost at the same moment when Liverpool was remonstrating against the piratical despotism of the French and English governments towards Rosas, accounts reached us from Buenos Ayres of a massacre by Oribe, scarcely less horrible than that of Pelissier in Algiers (the bayonetting of eleven hundred prisoners in cold blood), and the almost simultaneous demand of the British and French Consuls of such terms for the merchants of both countries, as might preclude the necessity for a blockade in the first instance, with the after alternative of a declaration of war. A mercantile correspondent of a Boston paper thus writes his advice to the Canada commercialists, from the River Plate —

"Affairs are in a bad state. It would not surprise me to see all the ports blockaded. I recommend that no shipments should be made to these ports.

"At the present moment we are in an unsettled state as regards the city of Montevideo, all the rest of the Oriental State being under the command of Oribe. Now come the English and French at the eleventh hour, to make a foreign intervention, which will be resisted to the last. A fortnight more, and we shall know if we are to be blockaded or not. I say yes, consequently, I recommend no shipments to be made."

It will be interesting at the present crisis to learn the exact condition of the British, French, and American forces in the river.

The naval forces assembled in the river were, English, ten vessels, 138 guns, 1310 men; French, nine vessels, 362 guns, 2230 men; Brazilian, eight vessels, 146 guns, 1150 men; United States, one sloop-of-war, the Boston; Sardinian, two sloops of war.

There were sixty four merchant vessels at Buenos Ayres, June 27th, of which twenty-five were British, seven American, six French, &c.

At Kingston an affray and collision between the military and civilians had arisen out of the races; and the blue jacket-jockeys with our own swell officers could scarcely have got up a more keen encounter at any modern Doncaster or Derby. The consequences, however, may be more serious in Kingston than they would have been upon the second Epsom.

The following is from the Kingston Chronicle:—

THE RACES AND A RIOT.

"The disgraceful scenes enacted on Canadian Race Grounds, of late years, are fast bringing this kind of 'sport' into disrepute amongst all peace loving people. The first day of the Kingston Races was appointed for Thursday last, and, although no good running was expected the best horses having left town on the evening previous—a great number of persons assembled on the race ground, and, we regret to say, did not return to their homes in a serious riot occurred, in which many persons were dangerously wounded—and in two or three cases, it is feared, mortally.

"It is almost impossible to ascertain in what way the row commenced, but, from all the information we have been able to obtain, it appears that a soldier of the 71st Regiment and a sailor quarrelled and came to blows, that parties interfered on both sides till the riot became general between the soldiers of the 71st and the civilians. A sergeant's picket, who had been sent out in the early part of the afternoon, to look after those of the regiment who had obtained leave to attend the races, endeavoured to separate the combatants, but failed in doing so, and got themselves mixed up in the melée—several of them drawing their bayonets, and, in some instances, making use of them.

"The riot had now assumed a serious aspect, and a gentleman rode into town and gave information to Major Dennis, who immediately proceeded to the scene of action with two companies of the 71st, to bring off the rioters. In doing this, the mob followed the troops some distance along the Macadamized Road, hurling stones and sticks at their heads, and on nearing the Toll Gate the rabble turned upon the men and pursued them through the adjoining fields, capturing several persons, whom they brought into town as prisoners—these were handed over to his Worship the Mayor and taken to the Station House, from which they were shortly afterwards liberated on their own recognizances to appear yesterday morning to answer any charge which might be preferred against them. They accordingly appeared yesterday morning before Henry Smith, junr., Esq., as their Counsel. Mr. Smith expressed his regret that the parties whom he represented should have been illegally detained on the evening previous, and that his advice to release them had been acted upon—he was now prepared to meet any charge that might be preferred against them, or demand their dismissal. Major Dennie said that it was not his intention to prefer any charge against the parties—that he was disposed to consider the affray as a mere race-course row—that his own men were now undergoing a rigid examination, and those of them who had voluntarily taken part in it should be severely punished, and if necessary handed over to the civil authorities —Major D. expressed an earnest wish that nothing should arise to create ill feeling between the soldiers and civilians. His object in going out to the race-course was solely for the purpose of bringing away his own men, and to assist in quelling the riot; when he arrived on the ground there were neither magistrates nor police officers with whom he could advise, and his only motive in acting as he had done was to save life and allay excitement. The parties under arrest were then discharged, Mr. Smith intimating that he should reserve to himself the right of bringing actions against Major D. on behalf of his clients, for losses and injuries which they had sustained by their illegal arrest.

"Many of our townspeople and a number of the soldiers are seriously injured, but we trust there will be no loss of life There can be no doubt whatever that there were faults on both sides, and, under all the circumstances of the case, we hope Mr. Smith will see the propriety of advising his clients to let the matter drop Should a different course be advised it will only have the effect of perpetuating excitement and keeping up a jealousy between the military and civilians, subversive of that universal good feeling which has ever existed in Kingston."

This account does not speak well for the exertions of the colonial magistracy, nor do we think it was (however conciliatory, either wise or decisive on the part of Major Dennie, to have foregone his charges against the civilians who assailed the military on march, at the same time that he left himself and his soldiers open to civil prosecution. All such unpleasant contretemps should be controlled and guided by a severe and disciplined sense of justice.

Railways appear to be exciting in Canada the same furor which is pervading the Mother Country, and the very appointments of directors are made the subject of leading articles in the journals.

With reference to the recent fire at Quebec, the public will be glad to learn that the Lords of the Admiralty transmitted to the poorer class of sufferers fifty blankets, 13000 pairs of shoes, and 2000 jackets; and that the newspapers already acknowledge the receipt of £16,000, in private contributions, from England, devoted to repair the awful calamity.

At the first of a series of musical and dramatic entertainments introduced at Montreal, the celebrated De Begnis—so long an absentee from our English musical circles, where he was once prime favourite—made his appearance, and had become the fashionable lion of the hour.

It is rumoured that Sir Allan M'Nab—whose name was so prominent at the time of the rebellion—will succeed to the Presidency of the Legislative Council. He is at present Speaker of the Assembly, and has, we believe, arrived in England, on matters connected with the Great Western Railroad.

Society in Canada is considerably agitated upon subjects connected with militia appointments and promotions, some of which, it is believed, have reference to electioneering influences.

THE OVERLAND MAIL.

INDIA AND CHINA.

The overland Bombay mail has arrived, with papers and letters from Bombay, Aug. 27; Calcutta, Aug. 16; Madras, Aug. 29; and China, June 25.

The news contained in them, although not promising aught of momentous consequence, is certainly more than ordinarily interesting. The expedition from Hyderabad, under Major Corsellis, to Kasmore on the Sciah frontier, appears to have been most lucky by the Governor of Bombay, with the view of protecting our territories in that direction from possible inroad —the Sciahs having pursued some Scindian robbers across the border, and thereby given obvious proof of their pugnacious disposition. Some lives were lost on ascending the river, owing to the intense heat. The troops arrived at Kasmore, and encamped on the only dry spot they could find, the country being flooded by the Indus; and there they have remained ever since. Cholera was raging at Hyderabad as well as Sukkur, but the mortality amongst the troops has been smaller than might have been expected.

The accounts from the Punjaub relate chiefly to the rebellion of Prince Peshora Singh, which has now assumed a very formidable shape, and, if not checked, will, in all probability, be attended with very serious results to the impotent Government at Lahore, and it is obvious that nothing but foreign intervention can save the country from irretrievable ruin. It appears that the Governor-General has presented a treaty for the acceptance of the Seikhs, in virtue of which a British subsidiary force will be established. The Lahore Government is understood to have accepted this treaty, but it is doubtful whether the troops will allow it to be carried into effect. Sir Henry Hardinge was to go up to the north-west provinces about the latter end of September

There were three questions of interest under discussion at Bombay at the time of the departure of the mails, viz.—1. The establishment of the Great Indian Peninsular Railway, of which a Committee of the leading personages of that Presidency had been formed, in order to co-operate with the Committee in London, for the purpose of carrying this great improvement into effect. The second improvement was the formation of a Steam Navigation Company, with the object of having steam boats to ply from Guzerat and Scinde to Bombay, and from Bombay to Ceylon, touching at the intermediate ports. The third point of interest arose from an attempt to stop the public working on the roads on Sundays.

The money market at Calcutta on the 16th of August was nearly in the same position represented by the last advices of the 7th ult. At Bombay, though the business transacted in imports since the departure of the mail of the 19th of July had been less extensive than in previous years, the prospects were not unfavourable.

The news from China comes down to the 27th of June. The Government of Hong Kong had published a proclamation for the sale of certain lands, &c., which it was maintained was calculated to prove injurious to the colony, as tending to prevent parties from settling there. There is an interesting discussion going forward in India relative to the Island of Cheusan, which now, when the time for its restoration to the Chinese is approaching, becomes of more value than ever to the British. A great unwillingness is exhibited to restore it, on the ground that the whole of the provisions of the treaties with the Chinese had not been complied with. It was said that the French and Americans cast covetous eyes on this island, against which no many prejudices had existed, which were found by experience to be unfounded, and that they having each made stipulations for an island, expect to get Chusan.

IRELAND.

REPEAL DEMONSTRATION IN TIPPERARY.

The long-announced Repeal Demonstration of the County Tipperary took place at Thurles, on Thursday (last week).

The procession in the morning, preparatory, near Thurles, we are assured by the Repeal historians of the day, extended at least five miles, and "the meeting, with the exception of Tara, was certainly the most magnificent and significant of the monster meetings. There could not have been less than between four and five hundred thousand human beings taking part in the business: the number of equestrians amounted, we have no doubt, to fifteen thousand." The Correspondent of an Anti-Repeal journal says:—

"The meeting was exceedingly numerous, equalling the most celebrated of the monster meetings of 1843. It was held at a place called Knockroe, about two miles from Thurles. The numbers might have been from ninety to one hundred thousand. Fully ten or twelve thousand farmers, well clad and appointed, rode in cavalry fashion, four abreast; and not only with them, but among their gentleman companions, was the greatest order and decorum observed."

A Voice —"Certainly we will."

It was previously arranged that the main body of the trades from Thurles, and the northern parts of the country, should meet their brethren from Cashel and the towns in the south, at the large Fair-green in the village of Tipperary.

The scene at this moment (says one account) was magnificent. One hundred thousand human beings—men, women, and children—surrounded the triumphal car of the "Liberator" as it came down along amidst their warmest benedictions. The procession extended at this period upwards of two miles, for while the banners that headed it were entering Thurles, the Liberator's carriage had just left Knockroe. Here and there the enthusiasm was along the entire route—warm-hearted and sincere as were the acclamations of the mighty mass who congregated—they were surpassed, far surpassed, when the procession passed through Thurles. At the entrance was erected a triumphal arch, on which was a large flag, and on it inscribed—

"England has given us ignorance and bigotry, starvation and rags, wretched cabins, without beds and without clothing—there is no employment, no trade, no commerce. If this be good Government, the people should be grateful for those blessings." The streets were crowded to suffocation, the windows filled with ladies, and every house which could command a view was occupied; and although the distance from Cashel to Thurles is but twelve or fourteen miles, the cavalcade did not reach the latter place until nearly four o'clock.

Mr. Nicholas Maher, M P, presided at the open air meeting. A series of resolutions were proposed and addressed, and also a petition to Parliament in favour of Repeal.

Mr. O'Connell then came forward and was received with deafening cheers. He said, I come here to know whether you had learned your Catechism? (Cries of "We did, we did.") Well, then, if you did, you can answer me two questions—are you not for Repeal? (Cheers.) Are you not determined more than ever to obtain it? (Cries of "We are, we are.") Are you not every day more anxious for the Repeal? (Cheers.) Then you do know your Catechism? (Laughter.) I have ready pupils in you. Well, well, you look for it accordingly, by peaceable, legal, and constitutional—by and by without violence, without force, without intimidation! (Loud cheers.) Will you join me in that pan, and no other? (Cries of "Yes, yes.") Well, then, there never was an old fellow with a better boy than I have. (Cheers.) I have hundreds of thousands of the brave and gallant people of Tipperary. Keep within the law. Don't give your enemies power over you. Stand by my side, and victory is certain, and Ireland's liberty shall be restored. (Cheers.) I have 500,000 witnesses that the Union is unendurable, and shall I want to have the Repeal of the Union to have six millions yearly spent in Ireland, that is £600,000 a month, £200,000 every forth night, £25,000 every working day of six weeks. (Cheers.) I want to have it circulated—I want to have it spent in Ireland, where it has been earned by the sweat and toil of that brave, patient, and enduring people. The money now in Ireland is spent in England, in France, in Belgium, in Italy, in every place except Ireland. (Hear, hear.) This must not be. I would have every shilling of Irish money spent in Ireland; and if Irish gentlemen choose to go elsewhere, I would have a law passed charging them 25 per cent. as a tax, and I would have that spent in the improvement of the country. (Hear, hear.) I would have it expended in the making of bridges and roads, instead of having the people taxed by grand jury cess. (Hear, hear.) The Repeal of the Union would cause an immense improvement in the wages of the people. Do you think that I would call you to day from your harvest work, if I had not an object—if I had not something to obtain for you? (Cheers.) Oh, yes, I know you would follow me anywhere. (Cries of "Yes, yes, to death.") Oh, you are safe in doing it. I have never led you astray; but I will lead you to the temple of the constitution, to the sure harbour of nation security and national prosperity. (Cheers.) Ireland for the Irish is my motto. (Cheers.) You have a right to an Irish Parliament, and you will succeed in obtaining it if you place confidence in me. (Cries of "We do.") I am sure I can do. You may believe in me, I have put down Protestant ascendancy already, when I was born an Catholic could have a horse worth more than five pounds; if it was worth £500, a Protestant could come and offer him £5, and he should sell it—such was the law; and if a Catholic coaxed him to join together in seeking for it. ("Hear, hear," and loud cheering.) Well, I determined on carrying the Repeal; I held legal meetings, as had been afterwards proved by the evidence of the highest legal authority. The Government conspired against me; they accused me of conspiracy, and most unjustly sent me to gaol. (Groans.) Yes, thank Heaven that I was in gaol —(Loud cheers)—and am ready to go there again, and to the scaffold, if I could purchase your liberty and prosperity—(Loud cheers)—and will, as I have said, I was sent unjustly to gaol. The Government tried an indictment—a monstrous one of thirty six yards in length; they tried to pack a jury, with a one-sided Judge; but, after all, the law was in my favour. (Cheers.) I knew the law better than they did. The cause was ruled in my favour, and I came out of prison, and no thanks to them. (Cheering.) Oh, Erin of the streams—Erin of the green fields—Erin of the beautiful valleys! of the sublime mountains, of the thousand bays and harbours, of the excellent roadsteads, of a water power calculated to turn the nations of the world, oh! he would tell them she shall not, must not be in slavery. They would struggle for her constitutionally, but successfully. Hurra for Repeal! The Honourable and Learned Gentleman then concluded amid the most enthusiastic cheering, and was then handed to the Liberator, after which the mighty assemblage separated quietly, and proceeded peaceably to their respective homes.

THE DINNER.

This event came off in a capacious pavilion. It was decorated in the interior with evergreens and flowers. It was supported by sixteen pillars inside, which were also hung with evergreens. The building, which is about 70 yards long, by 30 wide, had a raised dais for the cross table at the head of the room, at which the Chairman and guests sat, and at the opposite end was a commodious gallery for ladies. Covers were laid for between 600 and 900 persons, but there were not less than 1200 or 1300 persons present at the dinner in the course of the night, exclusive of the ladies in the galleries, which, together with all parts of the extensive edifice, were completely filled.

About half-past seven Mr. O'Connell, attired in the uniform of the '82 Club, entered the building, and was, of course, received with loud cheering. The chair was taken by Nicholas Maher, Esq., M.P.

Mr. O'Connell, on his health being drunk, commenced his speech with a glowing encomium on the glorious sight he had witnessed in the morning—the people so many, so orderly, so determined, &c. Then he gave them a history of his agitation from the very commencement. At length he came to the impediments which the Government was throwing in his way, and said—They cannot corrupt or intimidate us, and yet they will endeavour to corrupt. Where are the slaves who will sell themselves to any Government to the prejudice of their country?—they are nowhere to be found; and, oh, how mistaken are those who imagine that the Catholic clergy can be bribed by an increase to the income of Maynooth (Cheers). We even help the Government who think so. (Hear, hear.) Have they got an additional vote or a voice, by reason of the Maynooth grant, of a single Catholic clergyman? (Cheers.) Has one curate deserted the colours of his country? Oh, no; and if they save the wealth of Trinity College to Maynooth, they will not add one to the nearer to the suppression of the cry for Repeal. (Cheers.) They have had no other friends but the priests; they are beloved by those who know their worth; and, if the Treasury opened its portals, it would not be to any one who forsook them from that moment. (Loud cheers.) We have achieved this much, recollect, in a time of peace. ("Hear," and cheers.) Let us give no opening to our enemies—let us persevere in the course we have pointed out; and I defy any man to say, looking to the past experience, that we shall not succeed; and that what we have achieved in part, shall not be achieved in the whole. (Hear, hear.) But does the case stand thus now? Is there in England less of prosperity—or has the crop

SKETCHES IN SPAIN.

PRIESTS, AT MADRID.

BALCONY SCENE, AT ANDALUSIA.

SKETCHES IN SPAIN.

We resume our artistical notes with a glance at the Andaluzas, than whom, says the "Handbook of Spain," "few women talk better or more; practice makes perfect." But, more to the purpose is the following lively page from Mr. Hughes's admirable work, "Revelations on Spain in 1845":—

"How the fair Andalucians contrive to pass their time, without once peeping into a book from month's end to month's end, with no pastime but church, no excitement but devotion and an occasional dash of love, it is not easy to conjecture. The balcony and the paving stones in the streets beneath, when surveyed in perpetuity, become a little fatiguing; the coarse rezs and mats hung over the window-fronts to subdue the glare of a torrid sun, make street-gazing less pleasurable than in other cities. The passing of a vehicle is a rare occurrence, love is for the twilight or the midnight hour, and the most determined church going cannot kill more than a couple of hours per day. How fill up the immense vacuum?—how complete the "dies solidus" without ever darting those bright eyes into any book more interesting than the Rosario de la Virgen, or the Horas Castellanas?

The accomplishment of reading is by no means universally diffused; beads are, still, more in use than prayer-books, and when my landlady once—a lady of respectable station, whose titles were as formal as those of her sovereign, being always, by a courtesy extended to every milliner, styled "La Senora Dona Isabel Maria"—was requested to sign a receipt for my quarter's rent, she couldn't; and her son, a youth of twenty, could not write it without black lines to guide him."

The Moorish eyes, the pride of the Spanish female face, are stated to be confined to certain localities. The finest are "raised" in Andalucia; "they are very full, and repose on a liquid somewhat yellow bed, of an almond shape; they are compared to dormant lightnings," &c. Mr. Hughes, too, tells us the eyes of the Andalucian beauty are like burning glasses—black, lustrous, and terrible in wrath; almond-cut, and in repose hiding liquid fires. The Andaluza is absorbing, merciless.

From gay to grave: a specimen of the Spanish clergy, who never appear in public without the capa, which, as it has no cape, is, in fact, a long black gown. Raphael has painted St. Paul in the cartoon, when preaching at Athens, wearing his cloak exactly as the Spanish people do at this moment. Whatever may be said of the capa, nothing can be more grotesque than the long projecting hat worn by the priesthood.

The Royal Palace at Madrid is enormous, and, as in that of Aladdin in the East, and in some others in this cognate land, there is more than one window left unfinished; thus, it is the fit residence of the Sovereign of a people of prouder conception than performance. It occupies the site of the original Alcazar of the Moors, which Enrique IV. made his residence. This was burnt down on Christmas Eve, and rebuilt by Philip V. The entire Palace, and its appurtenances, cover a vast space; the principal entrance is through a noble arch in the Armeria, on the south side, next to the court yard or parade; opposite is the Palace itself, and to the right the gardens and promenade; and a circular enclosure, in the midst of which is a fine equestrian statue. The elevation of the Palace has little beyond its vastness to attract; the basement is rusticated, and the superstructure is of white stone, which glitters in the sun like marble. It is crowned with a heavy balustrade, and mounted with vases, a large dome, &c.

THE ROYAL PALACE, MADRID.

about to detail, was such that we are unable to fix accurately the time at which it took place, but we are enabled to state that the Lord Mayor was in the cabin, seated in his chair of state—the mace was on the table before him—the table also contained the usual means of refreshment, and was surrounded by some of the Aldermen, the late Sheriffs, and the Sheriffs elect, when, almost simultaneously, with a cry of 'A-head, there!' the City barque came in violent collision with one of the piers of Westminster-bridge. The Lord Mayor, and, we believe, nearly all those present, were thrown from their seats by the violence of the shock. The mace, the decanters, the glasses, and the wine rolled from the table, and the members of the Corporation were prostrate in one common wreck on the floor of their barge. Happily, the alarm subsided with the shock, and, with the exception of a few bruises, we have the satisfaction to state that the worthy members of the Corporation escaped unhurt."

INAUGURATION OF THE STATUE OF JEAN BART, AT DUNKERQUE.

(From a Correspondent.)

A fête, upon a grand and extensive scale, took place last month, at Dunkerque, on the inauguration of the Statue of Jean Bart, a town-born naval hero of the place. For a month previous, the town had been under great excitement; and no expense was spared to have the ceremony conducted with an éclat and splendour worthy of the occasion. Invitations were sent to twelve of the principal towns of the department, including Calais and St. Omer, to have the attendance of the musical bands of their respective National Guards, which were readily accepted; and from eight to eleven o'clock on the day of the Inauguration, were seen marching into the town, the different bands playing national airs, at the head of from 50 to 100 men of their respective corps. These formed a circle around the veiled Statue, and composed a musical force, united with the military bands of the town, of nearly 600 instruments. Precisely at twelve, the veil from the Statue drops, and discovered the hero, in the costume of the time of Louis XIV., brandishing a sword in his right hand, a pistol in his left, and wearing another in his belt. He is supposed to be engaged in boarding a ship, as this was his usual and favourite mode of carrying on the fight, and which ensured to him so much success he succeeded in capturing and carrying into Dunkerque upwards of two hundred Dutch merchant vessels, during the war with the Dutch States. The Statue is of bronze, 16 feet high, and executed in the first style of the celebrated David (d'Angers),—the Thorwaldsen of France.

The unveiling of the Statue was hailed by the acclamations of 40,000 voices, and followed by a crash of 600 instruments. Orations were then delivered by the Sous-Préfet, the Mayor, and others, enumerating the numerous exploits at sea performed by this heroic sailor, and holding him up as an example for others to emulate. In the afternoon, all sorts of amusements, both on water and land, were provided for the populace, and the evening concluded with balls, concerts, &c. (gratis). A general illumination followed; fireworks and balloon-flying finished the day.

The following day the pastimes of the people continued, though diversified; but the most interesting sight was a dinner party of 1800 persons. Four tables were laid out in the grand avenue of the park, and at one o'clock marched in the bands of music and corps of the different towns of the department, and regularly took their seats assigned to them: this was known by a tally-flag affixed to each bottle of wine, and every man found by the side of his plate a bottle of claret. The dinner consisted of cold joints, ham, meat pies, &c. The wine was excellent, and toasts were drunk of such a patriotic character, and of so much enthusiasm, that every man seemed to consider himself a second Jean Bart. Fireworks, the ascent of a balloon in the Grand Place, and a general illumination, closed the celebration of the Inauguration of the Statue of their valiant townsman.

STATUE OF JEAN BART, AT DUNKERQUE.

The decorations of the houses and streets were unique and tasteful. Festoons of drapery of different colours were stretched from house to house; while from the windows floated tri-coloured flags, banners, bearing insignia or inscriptions of the exploits of Jean Bart. Triumphal arches spanned all the streets, while each side of them was lined by rows of trees, or large branches, resembling young elms, of four years' growth. The transformation of these streets into groves, with triumphal arches, covered with garlands and trophies, and which terminated the "vista," had a most singular and beautiful appearance.

THE FLEET-STREET SEWER.

The works in progress for deepening the Sewer of Fleet-street have attracted considerable attention, partially from the obstruction which they have presented to the public traffic. They are, however, of intrinsic interest; although the Sewer of Fleet-street cannot compete, in antiquity, with the ancient water-course known as the Fleet Ditch,—

> The king of dykes, than whom no sluice of mud
> With deeper sable blots the silver flood.

It appears that although Sewers have been constructed in London for upwards of four centuries, it is only within the last ten or fifteen years that the drainage of the City has been satisfactorily accomplished. Hitherto, it was very defective and imperfect; some of the smaller streets having a Sewer, while the larger thoroughfares, as Cheapside, Ludgate Hill, &c., had none. From time to time, however, this evil has been remedied; and the Sewerage is now nearly completed.

The Sewer of Fleet-street, the subject of our Engraving, having been found insufficient to carry off the water, for which it was intended, it became necessary to cut deeper, and construct a new sewer: the greatest requisite depth is 25 feet, which decreases to about 17 feet near Temple Bar; hence the Sewer runs easterly to Water Lane, where it is joined by another Sewer, which runs into Whitefriars Dock.

One of our Engravings conveys an idea of the extraordinary labour requisite for excavating the ground to the requisite depth, and the numerous provisions against accidents in the dangerous operation. Such is the underground labour; whilst the difficulty of keeping open the traffic, so as not to extinguish the "very animated appearance" of Fleet-street, is a work of much difficulty. The cost of the present undertaking, contracted for by Messrs. Ward and Son, of Aldersgate-street, is £2000.

There do not appear to be published data from which the total extent of the metropolitan Sewers can be ascertained. The Holborn and Finsbury divisions contain eighty-three miles. In addition to these, there are sixteen miles of smaller Sewers, to carry off the surface-water from the streets and roads, and two hundred and fifty-four miles of drains leading from houses to the main Sewers.

FLEET-STREET.—DEEPENING THE SEWER.

THE NEW SHERIFFS.—The new Sheriffs of London and Middlesex, Mr. William James Chaplin and Mr. John Laurie, were sworn into office on Saturday last, at Guildhall. Mr. David W. Wire is appointed Under-Sheriff to Mr. Sheriff Laurie; and Mr. C. Burcham, of Red-lion-square, Under-Sheriff to Mr. Sheriff Chaplin. A vote of thanks was unanimously passed to the late Sheriffs, Alderman Hunter and Alderman Sidney.

NARROW ESCAPE OF THE MAYOR AND CORPORATION OF LONDON.—The Times has the following pathetic account of the narrow escape of the Mayor and Corporation of London:—"The worthy citizens of London who are peacefully following their various avocations, have, we fear, only a faint idea of the labours and perils which the members of the Corporation are constantly exposed to in the execution of their arduous duties. The passage of the river from London-bridge to Chelsea is now so well known to the inhabitants of London; the 'move her a-head,' and 'turn her a-starn,' are phrases so common in our ears, and convey such a perfect idea of the control and safety which pervade throughout the navigation of the river, that few will believe that the lives of the whole Corporation were, on Tuesday, nearly sacrificed through the perils of transit by the City barge, from Blackfriars to Westminster. We will not venture to say to whose pilotage this catastrophe is to be ascribed, but we apprehend that the attention of the Aldermen has been recently so much devoted to the management of railways, that they have lost sight of those ancient land-marks by which their official and swan-hopping excursions have been heretofore guided. The consternation which prevailed after the alarming accident which we are

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 4, 1845.

Another political name of the Reform Era has departed from among us; Earl Spencer died on the 1st instant, at his seat, Wiseton, Nottingham; he was much better known as Lord Althorp, one of the main supports, in the House of Commons, of the Whig Ministry. His personal character, rank, and fortune, secured the respect of many who had little confidence in the political opinions of the party, and these were backed by sound and practical talent, often called into action by the exigencies of debate. He was one of the chiefs of the Ministry, so much so, that the death of his father and his consequent elevation to the Upper House, was seized by William the Fourth, as an opportunity for dismissing his Whig advisers; but the movement was premature, they retained place, if not power, for some years afterwards. As Earl Spencer, however, the Noble Lord never mingled very actively in political discussions; even when in office, he devoted himself almost exclusively to the business of his department, the Exchequer, and the business-like turn of his mind indisposed him to the excitement of political controversy. He withdrew almost entirely into private life, occupying himself with those pursuits connected with agriculture, to which he had always been strongly attached. He was an extensive landowner, an advocate of improved cultivation by the farmer, as a better security than Parliamentary protection, and an opponent of the Corn Laws. The last occasion on which he addressed the House was, we believe, on the third reading of the Maynooth College Bill, which he supported.

The cruel rigidity of the Quarantine Laws, in all nations—a subject which is at this moment attracting the attention of the French press—has never been so fearfully exemplified as by a case on our own coast, close to our own doors. The Eclair steamer, returning from the coast of Africa, with fever of a violent character—of that there is unfortunately no question—raging on board, has been placed in quarantine off the Motherbank, isolated by a constant guard from all communication with the shore; in the state of things existing on board this unhappy vessel the regulations are atrocious. It is known that there is no medical officer on board, but none are permitted to visit her; and the crew, therefore, must sicken and die without help within view of many thousands of their countrymen. It would be more merciful to fire a broadside into the vessel and sink her at once. If the intention were to increase the disease, add to its intensity, and thus increase the danger of contagion, nothing could be imagined more likely to effect it than the course adopted We do not believe that the spirit of the quarantine regulations authorises such a barbarous isolation in such a case; they were intended to prevent immediate and indiscriminate communication with the shore, from vessels coming from climates where contagious disease is common. But this at least supposes that the greater portion of the crew is in good health; in such a case the detention, though an evil, is a supportable one. But when the ship is like that of the "Ancient Mariner," freighted with the dead and dying, to close them round with a wall of iron, and deny all access to them, even that of the physician, is a barbarity worthy only of savages. Even when the plague was raging in London, the visits of medical men and nurses were permitted;—are we to have less humanity than our ancestors, who certainly had less knowledge of disease and its laws? they can stand excused and justified in their policy of isolating disease, which to modern enquiries appears almost absurd. The whole theory of quarantine, as a preventive of disease, is fallacious. Prudence and caution are necessary in all cases, but not brutality. There is a medium between transferring the crew of the Eclair, at once into the midst of a crowded city, and allowing them to perish without human sympathy or assistance. If removed on shore, the change from the close air of a ship, to the cool, fresh land breezes, good provision, medicine, and, above all, the mental reaction, would, in all probability, check the fever at once. Forty days in their present state may exterminate the crew—who will have been murdered according to the law of quarantine! It is the opinion of those best informed on the subject, that this severity (which may have such frightful results) is wholly useless. The plague is never out of Constantinople; the trading nations of Europe are in constant communication with that city, but the disease has not appeared in Christian Europe for two centuries. It is not the quarantine that has kept us out, but no ship can import the glowing sun, the filth, the indolence and indifference of the Moslem, who trusts all to fate, and deems human exertions almost impious. The plague and the fever of the tropics, spring from local causes, and will not affect those not exposed to them; diseases like the cholera may be universal, and sweep over whole climates and countries indifferently; against them quarantine is not even the semblance of a protection. The crew of the Eclair is suffering from the black or yellow fever of the tropics. The only mode of arresting it is to remove and separate the men; to keep them shut up for forty days, by which time the ship may be a mere "floating coffin," is an act of most ignoble ignorance. Some alarmists may plead danger to the public health as a justification. If there is any danger, the short breadth of sea between them and this ill fated ship cannot diminish it, and if the men were on shore would they be permitted for a moment to remain unvisited and unaided? If we reason in this way there is danger in everything, in riding, in bathing, in walking the streets—above all in a railway journey; yet no one abstains from any of these things. Danger never ought to stand between Englishmen and a duty to a fellow being, nor would it for an instant in this case, if the law did not interpose like fate.

We hope, for our national credit, if there is any power of suspending the operation of the law in this case, it will be done, and that the remnant of a crew of men in the service of their country will not be abandoned to death, or suffering even worse than death, in this cowardly and unchristian manner.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert.—The Queen and Prince Albert on Thursday, at Windsor, left the Castle for Osborne, Isle of Wight.

Windsor, Thursday Evening.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Her Majesty promenaded this morning in the private grounds and plantations in the Home Park; his Royal Highness Prince Albert being drawn in a garden-chair. The infant Royal Family were taken out for airing at the same time, attended by the Dowager Lady Lyttelton. Her Majesty was driven out for a carriage airing this afternoon by Lady Lyttelton; her Royal Highness Prince Albert, proceeding through the Long-walk to Virginia Water, and returning to the Castle shortly before five o'clock. The Hon. Colonel Grey was in attendance upon the Queen on horseback. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, attended by the Baroness de Spaeth, took a carriage airing this afternoon. There was no dinner party at the Castle this evening; her Majesty and the Prince Consort dining in private.

Accident to Prince Albert.—We regret to state that on Saturday last Prince Albert met with an accident of a painful nature. It appears that as the Prince was descending a flight of stairs, leading from the private apartments to the Queen's entrance in the quadrangle, his foot slipped, and, in the effort to save himself from falling, his Royal Highness severely sprained his ankle. The Prince, who treated the matter very lightly at the time, proceeded forthwith to Slough, and thence, by the Great Western Railway to Paddington. Upon the Prince's arrival at the Castle, from Buckingham Palace, in the evening, his Royal Highness suffered considerable pain, the ankle being very much swollen and inflamed. Mr. Brown, surgeon to her Majesty's household, who was immediately in attendance, prescribed the necessary remedies.

Aristocratic Marriages.—The matrimonial alliance some time since alluded to as in contemplation between the Earl Howe and Miss Gore, Maid of Honour to her Majesty the present Duchess, is now definitively arranged. We believe we are correct in stating, that the 16th of this month is fixed for the celebration of the ceremony, which, in accordance with her Majesty the Queen Dowager's residence, will be celebrated at Witley Court.—On Tuesday the marriage of the Hon. Charles Hugh Clifford, eldest son of Lord Clifford of Chudleigh, with the Hon. Agnes Petre, daughter of Lord and Lady Petre, was celebrated at Thorndon Hall, in the county of Essex, by the Rev. Joseph Sidden, private chaplain to Lord Petre.

Death of the Dowager Marchioness of Bredalbane.—The Dowager Marchioness of Bredalbane died at Langton House, on Thursday week. Her ladyship, who was daughter of David Gavin, Esq., of Langton, married to John, fourth Earl of Bredalbane, in 1793, and was consiederably advanced in years.

The State Apartments at Windsor Castle.—Several visitors arrived at Windsor, during Tuesday, for the purpose of inspecting the State apartments, which were closed. It will be the means, perhaps, of preventing many similar disappointments on the part of the public, by stating that, during the sojourn of the Court at Windsor Castle, the State rooms will not be open to visitors on Tuesdays and Fridays.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

ELECTION OF THE LORD MAYOR.

On Monday a Common hall was held for the purpose of electing a Lord Mayor for the ensuing year. There was a numerous attendance of the Livery in the Guildhall. A great deal of interest was excited, and the meeting was an exceedingly bustling one.

When Alderman Wood, whose friends had been making great exertions to procure his return, made his appearance as a candidate for the office, the applause was overwhelming.

The Common Sergeant briefly addressed the Livery, and then said, that in order the choice might be free and uninfluenced, the Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen would retire from the hall.

As the Lord Mayor and Aldermen were about to retire from the hall, Alderman Wood stepped forward upon the hustings amidst loud acclamations and partial hisses, to address the constituency. He was the Alderman first in rotation, and was so under circumstances very different from what had taken place in former years; and however calumniated he might have been, he had every warrant for saying that the confidence of the Livery in him had undergone no diminution, and the manifestation exhibited by them justified him in anticipating the return he so anxiously looked for. (Cheers). He should not, however, have addressed the Livery at all, if it were not for a report which had been most industriously circulated that morning, to the effect that he was so clothed with writs that no responsibility could attach to him, and that he was, therefore, unfit to preside over this great city as chief magistrate. To that report he could only answer, that a more gross falsehood never was uttered. (Cheers and hisses). It was the result of the vilest slander, as no such thing as a writ could be found in existence against him.

The Lord Mayor and Aldermen immediately afterwards retired from the hustings.

The Common Sergeant then put in nomination the names of all the Aldermen below the chair, and there was an immense show of hands for Alderman Wood and Alderman Johnson, the next in rotation to Alderman Wood.

The Common Sergeant then announced the decision of the Sheriff to be, that the election had fallen upon Alderman Thomas Wood and Alderman Johnson, and proceeded to the Court of Aldermen to make the return accordingly.

After the lapse of half-an-hour, the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, &c., returned to the hall, and the Common Sergeant stated to the Livery that the Court of Aldermen had elected Mr. John Johnson Lord Mayor for the year ensuing. The announcement was received with a loud burst of general disapprobation by the numerous body assembled to support Alderman Wood, and with cheers by those who were desirous to see Alderman Johnson in the civic chair. The scene was, as might be expected, one of great confusion.

The Common Crier called upon Alderman Johnson to come forth and declare his consent to the election.

Alderman Johnson then came to the front of the hustings, and was invested with the chain of office amidst great uproar. He thanked the Livery for the manner in which they had been pleased to elect him to the high office, declared that he would perform all the duties of it most zealously and faithfully, and do all in his power to carry out the objects they had in view. He trusted, that at the end of his year of office he should meet with the congratulations which he felt so much honoured by at that moment.

Alderman Wood again presented himself, and was enthusiastically received.

Although," said he, "defeated, and, for a time, deprived of my just rights and expectations, the Livery may rest assured that my sense of their kindness in supporting me shall never be effaced from my memory. I come amongst you, my fellow-citizens, as a magistrate, who has sustained fearlessly that rank, and has already the voice of the Livery, filled the important and honourable office of Sheriff. I have not come forward as a rich man, making a boast of my riches as a qualification for the discharge of the important duties which appertain to office, but with a determination to use my abilities in the discharge of those duties with a view to the best interests of my fellow citizens. But the Livery will be surprised to learn that wealth is now deemed one of the qualifications to serve them, and that one of the grounds of my rejection is, that I am not rich enough to support the position I seek to attain. If wealth were to be esteemed and held as the only qualification, the sum of the brightest integrity, the greatest probity and virtue, and the most distinguished intellect, would be excluded from serving their fellow-subjects in public departments. A more flimsy, wretched objection never was offered against any man. The adoption of it is an invasion of the privileges, and strikes at the root of the right of the electors, and annihilates the choice of the Livery. (Cheers.) Apart from all these considerations, another and a leading objection to me has been that, unfortunately, some five or six years ago, I had honestly embarked in a speculation which eventually turned out to be bad. (Cheers and hissing.) Speculation seems now to be the order of the day. No man can take up the ordinary newspapers without seeing schemes and projects announced, in which the names of magistrates are put forth in support of them. If the failure of any of those projects were to operate as a disqualification, no magistrate filling the highest trust his fellow citizens can repose in him, what is to be augured as to the fate of many magistrates whose names are every day to be seen in railroad prospectuses? I have stated such a line of demarcation as were to be drawn; if an unsuccessful issue to a speculation be a disgrace to me, what ought to be said of those magistrates who have taken up schemes which on the face of them tell their own tales (cheers)—schemes taken up solely for the purpose of selling scrip, and for effecting which their names are used as decoys? (Cheers and hisses.) If such be the rule by which a man is to be deprived of office, I am quite safe—I have not received punishment, and I shall watch for the prospective difficulties of those who are to follow me."

Deputy Gibbons then proposed a vote of thanks to the late Sheriffs (Aldermen Hunter and Sidney), for the splendour and hospitality with which they had maintained the dignity of their high office, and the punctuality and courtesy they had shown to the Livery.

Mr. Obbard seconded the vote, which was agreed to amidst applause.

Alderman Hunter and Sidney returned thanks, and the Hall was dissolved

The following was the state of voting in the Court of Aldermen, between the two Aldermen, Thomas Wood and John Johnson:—

For Wood.	For Johnson.
Mr. Alderman Kelly	The Lord Mayor	Sir John Pirie
Sir Chapman Marshall	Alderman Sir C. S. Hunter	Sir William Magnay
Alderman Humphery	Sir Jonn Key	Sir G. Carroll
Alderman Hunter	Sir Peter Laurie	Sir James Duke
Alderman Challis	Alderman Farebrother	Alderman Musgrove
Alderman Wood himself	Alderman Copeland	Alderman H. Hughes
	Alderman Wilson	Alderman Sidney and Alderman Johnson himself

There arrived too late to vote, Aldermen Lucas and Hooper, who intended to vote for Alderman Wood; Alderman Moon, who also intended to vote for Alderman Wood, was absent; as was Alderman Thompson, who intended to vote for Alderman Johnson.

Prorogation of Parliament.—Both houses met on Thursday, and Parliament was prorogued in the usual form by the Lord Chancellor, till Thursday, the 27th of November.

Presentation of the New Sheriffs.—The new Sheriffs of the city of London and county of Middlesex, Wm. J. Chaplin, Esq., and J. Laurie, Esq., Alderman Marshall and Alderman Humphery, were presented to the Curator Baron (W. G. Bankes, Esq.) in the Court of Exchequer, Westminster, and received, in the usual form, her Majesty's approbation of the choice the Livery had made of gentlemen to fill that high and important office for the year ensuing. The Common Sergeant, in the absence of the Recorder, introduced the new Sheriffs to the Curator Baron in a highly complimentary speech. The usual ceremonies were then gone through, such as shoes and hob nails, and cutting of sticks, was then performed by the senior Alderman who has not passed the civic chair, and the members of the Corporation returned to Guildhall, in the evening the new Sheriffs gave their inauguration dinner at the London Tavern.

Railway Club.—A meeting of gentlemen connected with railways was held at the London Tavern, on Wednesday, at which Sir George William Prescott, Bart., presided. The chairman explained, that the object of the meeting (which was of preliminary character) was to adopt measures for the formation of a club, to be composed of railway directors and parties interested in railways, for the interchange and record of valuable information connected with them. The proposition had already the approbation by letter of upwards of 200 gentlemen connected with railways. Mr. Owen, solicitor, and other gentlemen addressed the meeting, and urged that the proposed plan would have the effect of diffusing railway intelligence generally, giving confidence to the commercial and trading state of the country, and the improvements of locomotive engines, &c., and a resolution in conformity with the objects of the meeting was adopted. It was suggested to the committee which was appointed to consider the principle of geology, &c., be named to give occasional lectures, and another gentleman observed that a new Bourse should be established, to be devoted exclusively to railways.

The Metropolitan Improvements in Spitalfields.—On Tuesday the Commissioners of her Majesty's Woods and Forests issued notices for the erection of the houses in the new line of street leading from the London Docks to Spitalfields Church, the entire length consisting of about 3000 feet, being divided into thirty two lots The width of the new street will be about fifty four feet. The lots, severally, are to be let on lease for a term of eighty years, from Christmas Day, 1845. The new street, north of Highstreet, Whitechapel, will be called Commercial street; that leading out of East Smithfield will be called Dock-street, and East Smithfield will be named St. George-street. In Commercial-street a new church is in course of erection, to be denominated the Church of St. Jude, and in Dock street a church will be built for the Sailor's Home in Wells-street. A new street is also proposed to be formed in the continuation of the Commercial road, to High street, Whitechapel.

Mortality in the Metropolis.—The number of deaths last week was 858, exceeding that of the previous week by 84, and about 46 below the average of five summers. The deaths from measels and bronchitis are still high, being respectively 52, 25, average 24, 7.

POSTSCRIPT.

THE DEAN OF LINCOLN.—It is stated that the Deanery of Lincoln will be filled by the Rev Mr. Ward, the respected Rector of St. James's.

MR. HUDSON AND THE RAILWAYS.—It has been officially announced that Mr. George Hudson has joined the South Midland Railway Company, and also the Liverpool, Manchester, and Newcastle Junction Railway Company, the latter the project for a direct line between the manufacturing districts and Newcastle and the eastern coast of England. In the case of the former Company, its constitution is to be re-organised, and additional capital called for.

LAUNCH OF THE "BULL DOG" STEAM FRIGATE.—This fine steamer was launched on Thursday at Chatham. Her keel was laid down on the 8th of July, 1844; consequently, she has been fourteen months building. She has been constructed with great care, and is built with Honduras mahogany, African teak, and well seasoned oak. She was laid down by Mr. John Fincham, the late master builder, on the plan of the Surveyor of the Navy, Sir W. Symonds.

THE MORTALITY ON BOARD THE "ECLAIR."—LATEST PARTICULARS.—The Eclair left Madeira on the 22nd ult., and, from that time to the day of her arrival at the Motherbank, eight additional cases presented themselves. Two men on the morning of Wednesday (one of whom had a severe attack of fever in August) showed premonitory symptoms. Five died on the passage from Madeira, and two more have been added to the list of deaths since her arrival. Thus, of 145 officers and men, the full complement of the Eclair, no less than 65 have died since April last, and 22 only have escaped attack. These are all Englishmen, for it does not appear that any of the Kroomen who formed part of the ship's company have suffered in any way from the fever. During last month 40 officers and men died. At the present time there are 45 down with the fever in their beds: two of these are almost in the last stage, and one man is suffering from a second attack. We believe that the first lieutenant, Mr. Harston, was invalided some time since. Lieut. C. W. Isaacson is well on board, and has availed himself of permission to send a single sheet from the vessel to write to his friends. He attended Captain Execurt up to the time of his death. The other surviving principal officers of the Eclair are Lieutenant Gordon Bullock and the master, Mr. Henry D. Burney. The general treatment appears to have been an application of warm turpentine over the epigastrium. If in most cases save ease to the patients, and is said to have been attended with great benefit. The Standard, of last night, says:—"The Eclair has returned from the coast of Africa—not with cholera on board, but with that deadly fever which has proved so fatal to Europeans at Sierra Leone and elsewhere within the tropical region of Western Africa. That the disease, whatever its symptoms, is not cholera, is proved by the immunity of the Africans, who are as susceptible of Asiatic cholera as others. Again, the disease is not extending; there have been no new cases since the vessel's arrival in the temperate latitudes. Finally, there are two surgeons on board; and no simple supply of fresh provisions and of medicines has been sent on board from Haslar hospital. To Stangate-creek the vessel has, we see, been ordered; and as the wind has been pretty fair, she is probably there while we are writing: there every attention that humanity can suggest will be paid to the sufferers, meanwhile there is not the slightest ground for alarm of an imported cholera or pestilence of any kind."

THE STABBING CASE AT NEWCASTLE.—The inquest on the body of Ralph Parker was resumed on Wednesday, and after the examination of several witnesses, the jury returned a verdict of manslaughter against the prisoner Selby Green.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

FRANCE.—We gather from the last Paris papers that the result of the election at Douai has resulted in some measure the drooping spirits of the Opposition. The Legitimists coalesced with their deadly enemies for the purpose of defeating the Conservative candidate, and succeeded in their object. The Duke and Duchess of Nemours returned to St. Cloud on Monday. The King and the rest of the Royal Family were to arrive on Wednesday. The King and Queen of the Belgians were expected in Paris on the approaching jour de fête of the King of the French. The Presse announces the approaching creation of a new batch of peers. The anxiously-expected notice of the adjudication of the new railroads has not yet been published in the Moniteur.

NEW ZEALAND.—We have accounts from New Zealand to the 3rd of May. Another collision had taken place at the Bay of Islands between the natives and the troops, in which fifty of the latter are reported to have been killed; but Pomare, one of the most mischievous of the chiefs, had been captured, and was confined on board the Hazard, his entrenchments having been destroyed. Hongikien, one of the chiefs of the Kaiteke tribe, was also taken, and the Aurora, Simiacutie, and Velocity, merchantmen, were engaged in blockading Kororarika. The schooner I Don't Know, which our readers will recollect ran into the Thames with ammunition, and been lightered off by the American war steamer in the harbour, has been seized by the Government and removed to Auckland, where its owner, Mr. Waitford, is committed to take his trial for piracy, in consequence of colluding with the rebel chiefs. At Wellington the natives were perfectly quiet, but it was understood that Rauperahi had gone in that direction with 500 men, for what purpose is not known. The Legislative Council at Auckland closed its session on the 22nd April.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

LAMENTABLE OCCURRENCE AT HOUNSLOW BARRACKS.

An occurrence of a melancholy character took place on Sunday night, at the barracks of the 4th Regiment of Light Dragoons, stationed at Hounslow, during which Quartermaster Thomas Tarleton was stabbed in the stomach by Lieutenant Kerwan, of the same regiment. The circumstances are immediately in circulation as to the particulars of the transaction, one of which was, that in consequence of the promotion, by purchase, of Captain Cornet Masters, of the 4th Dragoons, to the rank of Major, Colonel, Unattached, which appeared in the London Gazette of Friday week, that officer on Sunday last gave a dinner to his brother officers, which took place in the mess room of the regiment, at Hounslow Barracks. The conviviality of the evening were kept up until a late hour, and it is stated by some who profess to be well informed, that about twelve o'clock, and while under the influence of wine, Lieutenant Kerwan took umbrage at something that occurred, and finally quitted the mess room for his own apartments, whither he was attended by Quartermaster Tarleton, who endeavoured to soothe his irritated feelings, but on reaching the apartment at which Lieutenant Kerwan immediately seized his sword and stabbed Tarleton as above described.

On Monday morning, on the return of Colonel Dacre, the commanding officer, to the barracks, Lieut. Kerwan was, by direction of the military authorities at the Horse Guards, placed under arrest.

At eight o'clock on the same morning, a local magistrate, attended by Sergeant Jeeks, of the police, attended at the barracks, and Quartermaster Tarleton's deposition was taken in writing by the reverend magistrate, and afterwards in the presence of Mr. Frogley, the surgeon, as to the nature of the wound and the state of the wounded man.

At 12 o'clock on Tuesday a meeting of the magistrates was held in the petty sessions room, at the three Hammers, Hounslow, at which a warrant was issued for the immediate apprehension of Lieut. Martin Kerwan, on a charge of cutting and wounding, which was placed for execution in the hands of Sergeant Jeeks, of the police. Shortly after the warrant was arrived, accompanied by Colonel Daley. Lieut. Kerwan was immediately placed at the bar.

In the deposition of Quartermaster Tarleton was read over in the presence of the prisoner, as was also the deposition of Mr. Frogley, who, being present, added to his testimony, that the unfavourable symptoms which had presented themselves on Monday evening had that morning greatly subsided, but that he was quite unable to pronounce the wounded man out of danger.

Colonel Daley expressed his readiness to enter into any amount of bail for the appearance of Lieut. Kerwan at a future day; but the Bench said the charge was of so serious a nature that they could not take bail, and it was their duty to remand the prisoner to Tothill fields Bridewell. Previously, however, Quartermaster Tarleton can be ascertained, or his recovery be such as to enable him to attend.

The prisoner, accompanied by one of the officers of the regiment, was then removed to Tothill fields Bridewell.

According to one account, the officer between whom and Lieut. Kerwan the disagreement took place, was the senior captain of the same regiment. Most of the officers present at the dinner drank freely, and, while at table, the altercation took place between Captain Lane and Lieutenant Kerwan. It was stated on Lieut. Kerwan finding that the Quartermaster, Tarleton, would not allow him to leave his apartment with his naked sword in his hand, he shut the door, and, pointing to another sword which was hanging up in the room, told him to defend himself; but, before the unfortunate man could do so, he received the wound from the Lieutenant's sword under which he is now suffering.

Quartermaster Tarleton is married, and has three children. His father was quartermaster of the 18th Light Dragoons for many years.

Lieut. Kerwan is believed to be single, and is stated to be highly connected, and of Irish extraction.

The wounded man continues in much the same state.

DESTRUCTIVE ACCIDENT BY FIRE.—On Tuesday morning, the following distressing accident by fire, occurred to a respectable woman and her daughter named Harrison, residing in Windsor-terrace, City-road. It appears that Mrs. Harrison, who is living upon her income with her unmarried daughter, a young lady about seventeen years of age, and of great personal attractions, was sitting in the back parlour, in which was a fire, when she desired the latter to reach some article from the mantel shelf. Miss Harrison immediately rose, and while in the act of obeying her mother's directions, a portion of her dress ignited. The mother, who at once rushed to her daughter's aid, was also set on fire, and before assistance arrived, both were shockingly scorched and burnt about the hands, arms, and neck. Medical aid was promptly sent for, and the necessary steps were taken, but we are sorry to say that both the sufferers are in a deplorable state of agony.

COUNTRY NEWS.

FROST IN LANCASHIRE.—On the nights of Monday and Tuesday last the whole of Lancashire, from the Mersey to the Lune, was visited by an intensely severe frost, which cut down the stems of the potatoes, and put an end to the magnificent appearance which the potato crop presented to be growing vigorously, now present nothing but the appearance of withered stalks. What effect this will produce on the quantity of the crop, and on the keeping of the potatoes, is somewhat doubtful.

ROBBERY OF PLATE IN CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY.—A very large quantity of valuable plate was missed on Monday morning, from the plate-room of St. Peter's College, Cambridge. The butler had locked the door, it appears, shortly before midnight, and saw that all was safe in the butteries; and the robbery must have taken place after that hour. The articles stolen consist of large tankards, pint stoups, goblets, dishes, covers, waiters, bread basket, all silver, with the names of the donors on them, besides several dozens of silver forks and spoons of all sizes, soup ladles, fish knives, &c. All had the rose keys and the arms of the college on them. It is suspected that the robbery has been committed by a gang composed of London thieves and some notoriously bad characters in the neighbourhood of Barnwell. About two years ago a similar robbery was committed in the butteries of Jesus College, of plate to the amount of about £700. The value of the plate stolen on Monday night from St. Peter's is upwards of £1000.

THE MURDER OF MR. FRASER.—The four prisoners, Tallant, Lynch, Nowland, and Burns (approver), were brought up again on Saturday, at the Castle, Chester. The case had been adjourned from Wednesday, to allow time to the magistrates to consider of the course to be pursued under the circumstances, two witnesses having distinctly proved an alibi with regard to Lynch. The prisoners, more particularly Lynch and Nowland, looked remarkably dejected. Burns presented the same haggard appearance as before. The Rev. Mr. Fielden said, "We have given this case that ample consideration which we promised we would give, and the decision we have unanimously come to is, that the case of the prisoners must be sent to a higher tribunal, and, therefore, that they be committed to take their trial at the next assizes.

ROYAL EXCHANGE BUILDINGS.

This handsome pile, facing the east front of the New Royal Exchange, has just been completed from the designs of Mr. J. Anson, the architect, to whose taste it is highly creditable. It comprises four stories; about 60 feet in height, and 284 feet in length; the depth varies from 57 feet to 58 2-4ths, this being the extreme boundary of the freehold,—the property of Magdalen College, Oxford. The materials of the new buildings are fine red brick, with Portland cement dressings: the door and window-heads are in bold style, and the festoons in the attic story are a judicious enrichment. The lower floor will be fire-rate shops, railway offices, &c.; and the upper stories will form handsome suites of chambers. Altogether, this is a very striking and meritorious addition to the architectural character of this very important locality of civic improvement.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL CHIT-CHAT.

Mr Keeley had the misfortune to be thrown out of his chaise on Monday morning in Southampton-street, and was so much injured as to be unable to play that night at the LYCEUM. Mr. Frank Matthews read his character in "Peter Jenkins:" Mr. Turner, in "The Governor's Wife:" and Mr. Bender, in "Open Session!" A comic drama, called "The Last of the Bravos" is in preparation; and the burlesque of "Aladdin" will be revived, in all its original splendour, on Monday week.

An elegant fac-simile of the Warwick Vase, executed in silver, was presented to Mr Webster, on Saturday evening last, after the performances, by the ADELPHI Company, as "a token of their regard for his unwearied exertions and perseverance, and to commemorate the unprecedented prolongation of the season." The vase was presented by Mr Paul Bedford, and, when the ceremony was over, the company assembled, comprising the members of the corps dramatique and several friends and patrons of the establishment, sat down to an elegant supper. The réunion was exceedingly gratifying to all who were favoured with an invitation

Mrs. Seymour, whom some of our readers may remember as Miss Allison, at the St. James's and Adelphi Theatres, appeared as the HAYMARKET on Wednesday evening as Miss Dorrillon, in Mrs. Inchbald's comedy of "Wives as They Were, and Maids as They Are." The lady created a decidedly favourable impression, and will prove an acquisition to the already excellent company at this theatre. She was loudly called for at the conclusion of the play, and greeted upon her appearance with general applause and a liberal shower of bouquets.

The PRINCES' Theatre opens on Monday. One of the earliest novelties will be the ballet of "Le Diable à Quatre," which has attained great popularity in Paris; and Mr. Macready will appear on Monday, the 13th inst. Midle. Nau is engaged as prima donna.

The OLYMPIC Theatre also opens on Monday. We gave the names of the pieces to be produced on the occasion a week or two ago.

Letters from Berlin of the 23d ult., state that the Duke of Prussia, after much negotiation, has succeeded in re-engaging the celebrated Jenny Lind for the Prussian Opera, for three years from the 1st of November next, at terms amounting closely to £4000 per annum. The fair Jenny will be the creation of the play, and greeted upon her appearance with general applause and a liberal shower of bouquets.

Sir George Smart, we are happy to announce, has recovered from his accident after his return from the Bonn Festival. It appears, now, that Dr. Breidenstein, the Chairman of the Committee for the Inauguration, was invited by the King of Prussia, to invite to the Concert at the Palace of Bruhl, Sir George Smart, Mr. Moscheles, and Mr. Grunesien—names that, at his Majesty's request, the Earl of Westmoreland had given to, as persons arriving from London to attend the Beethoven Inauguration. Dr. Breidenstein's head was so turned by the novel position in which he was placed, that he omitted altogether to inform the invited gentlemen of the distinguished compliment paid by the Prussian Monarch. The explanation is due to the King of Prussia, as Berlioz, of Paris, and Fétis, of Brussels, were present at the Palace, as guests, and an apparent slight was thus manifested towards the English visitors.

The Italian Opera House, in Paris, opened on Thursday the 2nd. There is a strong company, comprising Grisi, Persiani, Brambilla, Lilbrandi, Frezzolini, Grisi, Arigo, Bellini, Grimaldi, and Signori Lablache, Marco, Rocconi, Derivis, Malvezzi, Corelli, &c.

Three new operas, by G. Macfarren, E. Loder, and H. Glover, are to be produced at the Princess' Theatre.

The Western Madrigal Society has received fourteen compositions, for the Prize of Ten Guineas for the best Madrigal, after the ancient masters.

Alexander Lee is Musical Director for the Olympic Theatre.

THE THEATRES.

LYCEUM.

On Thursday evening, the farce of "Next Door," which has been announced during the last week in the bills, was produced here with the most unquestionable success. It is a clever adaptation, by Mr. Alfred Bunn, of a lively Parisian piece, "Le Vis en Partie Double," and from the extreme drollery of its situations, and the very humorous acting of the author, drew forth continuous peals of laughter. The piece is of the [illegible] order, and [illegible] the story is divided into two parts, representing two contiguous rooms—those of the entresol of the Quadrant. One of these is inhabited by a young lady—[illegible] father, the [illegible] and both of them are flagrantly Jack Sheppard (Mr. Wigan), a medical student, is paying his addresses. The dilemmas into which he is plunged by the contretemps of this double courtship form the staminants of the piece, which irresistibly [illegible] a milliner, the first very flagrant [illegible] Mr. Wigan, who becomes enamoured of the milliner's fair assistant, and doing both with the same happy facility of accommodating himself to circumstances, which superior medical students, for aught we know, may be able to command. The finishing point—in which, to alarm the milliner, he threatens to knock out his brains, and dashing his head against the partition wall, thrusts it into the young lady's room, which she is listening to the fervent address of a young musical poet—brought down a roar of applause and laughter. The versatility of Mr. Wigan had full scope in the character he assumed,—whether he was fighting an imaginary horrible combat, imitating an Astley's hero, tossing pancakes, or making love, he was equally effective.

Mr Bellingham also surprised us by his very droll personation of the love-sick musician. We had not given him credit for being half so funny. Mr. Wigan was called for at the end of the piece, which promises to enjoy a very long existence. Mr. Keeley was sufficiently recovered to act in the first piece, "Peter Jenkins." He appeared to be suffering from the effects of his accident, but did not play in "Open Sesame," where his part was announced to be performed by Mr. Emery, the third member of the company who has undertaken it since Monday.

ADELPHI.

A very broad farce, adapted from the French, by Mr. T. Morton, was produced here on Monday night, and kept the audience in roars of laughter from the commencement to the end. It is called "Seeing Wright:" and we imagined, at first, it was of a personal nature, similar to one or two French vaudevilles in which Ravel and Déjazet have figured as their own proper selves. We were, however, mistaken, the name being merely taken from the circumstance of one of the characters going to "see Wright," at the theatre, in the course of the piece. To attempt any description of the plot is perfectly impossible. It consisted of a series of exceedingly comical practical jokes, which scarcely gave the audience time to think about what they were witnessing; but, having the effect of causing their sides to ache with laughing, answered every end that could possibly be wished for. To "see Wright" as a policeman, is suggestive of great fun; but to see him play the part as he did on Monday, with all his humour, and none of those ultra buffooneries which we sometimes take him to task for indulging in, is still more provocative of mirth. All the other performers in this trifle exerted themselves very creditably, and the applause at the end of the piece was perfectly unqualified.

SURREY.

Another translation, by Mr. Edward Stirling, of the French drama, "Le Canal St. Martin," now performing at the Adelphi, was produced here on Monday, entitled "The Rover's Secret; or, the Bridge of St. Martin," and was completely successful. It resembles the Adelphi piece in every respect, with the exception that it is a little more highly seasoned for the Surrey audience; and the startling effect in the barge scene (of which our readers may have seen a large wood-cut in the walls of the mercopole, where the Red Rover Mortimer is let down into the water), contrived at the Adelphi by a platform turning over on a pivot, is managed at the Surrey by an arrangement known to stage carpenters as the "vampire trap," which opens in the middle and closes up again directly, allowing the character going through it to disappear instantaneously. The drama has been got up with much care, under the direction of the author, and was very well acted. Mr. Hicks displayed a great deal of judgment in his conception of Marsial. The cool assurance and precaution of the chevalier d'industrie were excellently portrayed. Mr. H. Hughes was equally effective as William, the foreman of the timber-yard; and Mr. H. Vining was an interesting heroine. Great care and intelligence is always apparent in every representation of character this lady undertakes. Mr. S. Cowell provoked the laughter of the gods by his droll assumption of Barbillon, the canal diver; and Miss Martin played up to him with much spirit and archness, as Ninette, the grisette. Her dress, however, we must protest against: it was anything but characteristic, and she may take a good hint for its improvement from the costume worn by Miss Woolgar, at the Adelphi, or some of Valentin's exquisite sketches in the illustrated "Mysteries of Paris." The drama was received throughout with loud applause; and will, we think, have a run. The ballad opera of "The Quaker" followed, in which Mr. Leffler appeared to great advantage as Steady, and was very warmly received. The performance concluded with an effective nautical drama, by Mr. T. Webb, founded on Dibdin's song of "Tom Starboard," and named after it, with enough dances, struggles, sea-fights, and situations to satisfy the most inordinate lover of dramatic excitement. The house was very well filled

OPENING OF DRURY-LANE THEATRE.

The difficulties attending the production of a new opera, on the opening night of an English theatre, are greater than is generally imagined. The Manager is dependent entirely on his own resources; he has no Government grant or private subscription to fall back upon; and he must pay his company their weekly salaries, whether the performances be necessary rehearsed or beyond what are called the ordinary "calls." On the Continent, months—and, in some instances, years—are taken up in the drilling of the choral and orchestral forces. Here, all is hurried at a railroad pace. Costa, at her Majesty's Theatre, had no first representation in this country of Donizetti's "Lucia," had the parts for the band only on the morning of its coming out—but he is a musical magician, under whose influence instrumentalists play from an instinctive appreciation of his readings. At Drury-lane Theatre the lessee is not an idle man, and, although not a practical musician, he has a method of his own in accelerating the troops under his command. The system of speed is in itself productive of bad work, what is to be done? The private speculation must realise immediately to meet the financial demands of the establishment, and he must, therefore, resort to the vîperare, for the first days of his campaign. An original ballet, with new music, has, indeed, been produced—a report of which will be found under our theatrical heading—and this is an especial wonder: to have expected a new opera was out of all question. Hence it is that we have been doomed to listen again to the "Bohemian Girl" and to the "Enchantress," until the expected novelty from Mr. Wallace is ready.

Salvi—(knight (Saturday), by way of variation, we have Donizetti's "Lucia," for the purpose of introducing Mr. Allen as Edgar, after an absence of three seasons, and for the re-engagement of Madame Eugenie Garcia. It appears therefore, that the lessee is resolved to have all the operas at present in can obtain, and he is right—nothing like a corps de reserve to guard against "sudden indispositions," "hoarseneses," and other ills, to which leading vocalists are so theatrically well acted. It is astonishing fact, that one never hears of the "stars," when on a provincial tour, falling ill. So long as their purses are filling fast, their healths remain remarkably robust; but when a prima donna, or tenore robusto is in the receipt of regular stipends, the vocal combriéres become manifest, just as the managerial thermometer rises or falls. That old diplomatic sinner, Talleyrand, was once informed that a certain Ambassador was ill. "Indeed," replied the wily veteran, "quel malheur est-ce qu'il a de cette maladie." So with our singing birds; their reasons for being indisposed are too often questionable.

Although the "Enchantress" has been deprived of its prologue—without a doubt, it is a most fortunate circumstance for the public and certainly contributes to the best of Balfe's music—it still lasts nearly three hours and a quarter—a terrible infliction, considering that half the time is taken up with stage explanations of a most unnecessary nature. Balfe has written, in this opera, the language of the "Enchantress" than is his usual good fortune. Written in great haste, nothing can be stronger than the reminiscences which are provoked throughout the whole of the curious but the prettiest morceaux—that of the Friars' Chorus—heard so frequently, is to be found in the finale of the third act of Donizetti's "Favourite." The themes are note by note the same. In the scene of the fiends, in the palace, the tremolo passages are decidedly in Meyerbeer: we presume Balfe himself will not dispute the property in this instance. We might multiply "phrases," but the want of originality is so repeatedly displayed, that we should be too much occupied to point out all the plagiarisms. The great hit of Balfe, in the "Enchantress"—and that praise is shared equally by the dramatic writer—is in the accurate message taken of Thillon's qualifications. The part of Stella was, at first, merely vocal exercises; but they are such as that charming songstress executes deliciously: albeit, her precision in the runs may be often disputed. Thillon's pretty face and captivating style, render her a most piquante Fratical Queen. She sang and acted the part without effort, and charmed by her combination of personal, vocal, and histrionic talents. We do not remember to have seen the fairy of Miss Rainer more graceful or much dramatic impulse. She has maintained her position as a popular favourite for many years, with numerous rivals, but we always listen to her noble voice with the utmost regret that it had not received higher cultivation. Miss Rainer is a coarse, and she indulges in a most vicious use of the tremolo. Her intonation is also at times sadly at fault; but, when Miss Romer has a bit of level singing, she startles her hearers by some exquisite vocalisation. In the fraternal scrap ballad of "Woman's Heart" her power told against the flagrec archness of Thillon, and she earned for herself equal glory, namely, a double encore; but, in the second act—Queen of the Fairies—the nightshade's monodious theme of the third act, owing to charm the Senators, nothing could be more unsteady and imperfect than Miss Romer's execution. Barring the conventionalities of the Stage Queen, her acting was startling for hearers by some exquisite vocalisation. The trio in the last act is well contrived by the composer, but he probably expected that the executants should sing in the same key a result not realised most assuredly on the opening night. We cannot compliment Schira, the conductor. The difference in the orchestral effect when Hughes, the first violin, led for the ballet, was palpable. The latter has energy, and will keep the players together. With Schira, there is a somnifirous mode of handling the baton. The strunged instruments are not sufficiently heard, and the ardour of the "brass" not adequately checked. The music of Adam for the ballet is delightful. It is admirably scored, and there are some bits for the first violin and flute of great beauty. The descriptive passages of the movements of the statue are worthy of especial attention. The composer of the "Chalet," the "Postilion," the "Lonjumeau Chicken," the "Brasseur de Preston," &c., has established his reputation.

We learn that the lessee, in addition to the opera of Mr. Wallace, has accepted one from Mr. Henry Forbes, long the director of the "Societa Armonica." There are two romances, also, that will be by Mr. Rooke and Mr. Planché are under consideration. The policy of the manager to afford chances to our native musicians is most praiseworthy.

After the opera, a "new grand ballet fantastique," was produced, entitled "The Marble Maiden," constructed by M. St. George (to whom we are indebted for "Le Diable Boiteux," from which the "Bohemian Girl" was taken), and arranged by M. Albert, with the additional advantage of some very effective light music by M. Adolphe Adam. The story is very poetical, and sufficiently fanciful for a ballet. Pygmalion, the sculptor; with the accessory, but it is to be hoped, the last woman out for three acts. A celebrated sculptor of Florence, Massacho (M. Albert), has Pygmalion-like, become enamoured of a very beautiful statue of Hebe (Mdlle. Adèle Dumilâtre), which he has purchased. In the interim of his passion he appeals to a statue of the Evil Angel in his atelier, to assist him; and from this incantation learns that the statue shall be animated by day for his delectation. To counteract this threat, another statue, that of the Good Angel, decrees that the statue shall be marble by night for his safety. Upon these two conditions, the plot of the ballet turns. The Prince Cosmo de Medicis (M. Perrot) discovering the marble female figure in the possession of Massacho, contrives to possess himself of it, and carries it to the palace of his uncle, the Duke Laurenzi de Medicis (Monsieur Pichler), where he also falls in love with it, driving from the palace Massacho (his successful rival), Mademoiselle Adèle, the Hebe, now animated, returns the passion of Cosmo; but, feeling that she is, in duty, bound to Massacho, leaves the palace with him during a fête, and returns to the sculptor. Cosmo attempts to regain her, but night appears, and she is turned to marble. Cosmo is, however, so madly in love with her, that, having traced her to a villa wherein Massacho resides, on the Arno, he contrives to gain admittance, as a member of students, and presents on her to the sculptor who him to the Duke's palace, where a splendid festival is about to be given in her honour. The Duke, enraged at the passion of his nephew, orders Hebe to be driven from the palace. Massacho has pursued her there, and arrives at the fête. The commands of the Duke are about to be obeyed, when the hour arrives for Hebe to become marble again; and when the change takes place, Massacho, in a delirium of rage, love, and jealousy, seizes a hammer, and breaks the statue to pieces. Hebe is then borne to Heaven by the Good Angel, and the ballet concludes.

From this outline it will be seen that the part is admirably suited to the genius of Mdlle. Dumilâtre. Nothing could be more artistically conceived or executed than her animation; and her general dancing and pantomime throughout the ballet was of the highest order. We may extend our approbation to everybody concerned in its representation; and make especial mention of the very splendid manner in which it has been placed upon the stage: the exceeding beauty of the scenic and general appliances elicited loud applause from a very full house. The ballet had, however, one great fault—that of most unconscionable length, which somewhat jeopardised its success; but we hear that it has been considerably curtailed since the first representation. So much time was occupied in tedious, uninteresting stage-business, that the audience were worn out long before the conclusion. The theatre was crowded in all parts. The various novelties underlined betoken much energy on the part of the Management; and great expectations are formed of Mr. Wallace's new opera.

We trust the production of this work, by an English composer, and supported by English singers, will silence the very silly and worn-out attacks upon the lessee for his employment of foreigners in other departments. He engages the experienced M. Scribe to write the libretto of an opera, for the simple reason, that none of our English authors can do it so well; and he employs Mademoiselle Dumilâtre upon the same principle that the foreigners import our cutlery and other manufactures—because, in either case, the home market produces nothing so good. If faith is kept with the public—and we shall be the first to speak should it not be—there is the chance of a brilliant season at Drury Lane; and, certainly, judging from the programme already issued, the speculation deserves to be a profitable one.

OPENING OF THE NEW THEATRE ROYAL, MANCHESTER.

In May, 1844, the Theatre Royal at Manchester was destroyed by fire; and the scene of the conflagration will be found graphically recorded in our journal. This disastrous event, occurring in less than two years after the expenditure, by the spirited lessee, of upwards of £1,600, in embellishing it in the style which made it one of the most handsome theatres (internally) in the kingdom, did not daunt the lessee, Mr. Knowles. The proprietors of the old theatre having decided on the 6th September, that they would not rebuild it, he at once commenced taking the steps necessary for the erection of a new theatre, and having fixed upon the Wellington Hotel and Concert room as a suitable site, purchased it about the 15th Sept.; bought the patent of the proprietors of the late Theatre Royal, for £815, on the 7th Oct., by which time the ground in Peter-street was cleared of the old buildings; and the first contracts for excavation and foundations were let on the 9th, to be completed in four weeks, and to be ready for the erection of the front of the buildings to be commenced within a fortnight. The corner stone was laid by Mr. Knowles, the proprietor and patentee, on Monday, December 2nd, 1844, but at that time 580,000 bricks had been laid in the foundations and below the level of the street, at a cost of about £1,200. Such an instance of individual energy and industrious enterprise merits this special record.

The site is well chosen, being in the vicinity of our principal public buildings, as the Natural History Society's Museum, the Concert Hall, the Free-Trade Hall, the Royal Institution, Athenæum, Mechanics' Institution, &c. The theatre has all the advantages and security of isolation; being wholly detached from other buildings, and bounded by four streets, affording a good carriage-way all round.

The external dimensions of the new theatre are about 67 yards in length by 23 yards in width; being 16 yards longer and only 20 inches narrower than the late Theatre Royal. Its form is a sort of parallelogram, more than 2½ times as long as it is broad.

The internal dimensions are, from the back wall of the centre box, to the back wall of the stage, 120 feet; and from side wall to side wall of the boxes, 55 feet. The interior approaches very nearly to the horse-shoe form, and that line is preserved throughout, without that narrowing at the sides of the proscenium which is often seen in theatres, and which impairs their acoustic properties. It nearly resembles, in this respect, the Lyceum, which, being wholly free from these projections, is justly celebrated for its advantages for vocal performances. Some points, too, have been adopted from the Princess' Theatre, in Oxford-street.

The architects of the new Theatre are Messrs. Irwin and Chester, of Manchester. The exterior is of Darley Dale stone, in the modern Italian style, consisting of a centre loggia portico, and wings; the former divided into three entrances by fine Corinthian columns and pilasters; the middle surmounted by a circular arch and pediment.

The audience part of the house consists of a pit floor and four tiers, of which three tiers extend round to the stage, and the fourth is a central space abstracted from within the roof of the building. On the floor are the orchestra, the stalls, and the pit. The first tier is the dress circle; the second, the upper circle; the third, the gallery in the centre, and side upper boxes; and the fourth, the upper gallery. The dress circle and two upper circles are supported by large cast iron beams, ten in each circle, and by as many cast iron pillars, not brought to the front, but standing some distance back, so that the circles have the appearance of hanging balconies. The upper gallery has six similar beams beneath its flooring.

SCENE FROM THE OPERA OF "THE ENCHANTRESS," AT DRURY LANE THEATRE.

The house will accommodate with seats 2147 persons, and hold, at the prices stated, about £250.

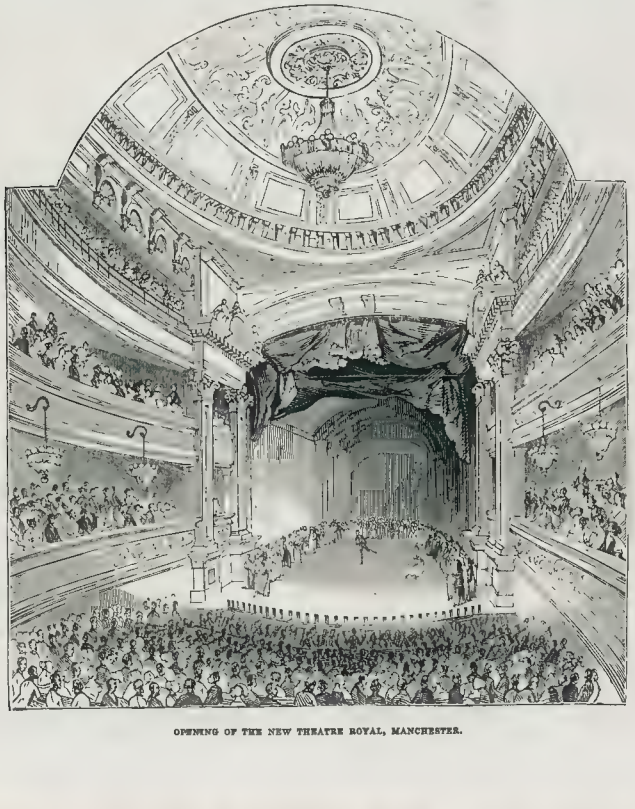
The decorations, executed from the architect's designs, by Mr. George Jackson, are in the Italian style of the 16th century, the age of Benvenuto Cellini. Its chief characteristics are flowing scrolls and foliage, intertwining and so filling up the space, all the ornaments being in high relief, in burnished and dead gold, on a French white ground. These being not merely the prevailing, but almost the only colours employed, the effect gained is that of great richness and splendour, combined with much chasteness and purity. From the oval ceiling depends a large gas chandelier, and the lower part of the house is lit by smaller lustres. The arch of the proscenium is very lofty, so that all the audience may see the higher portions of the scenery. The ornaments throughout are neither plaster of Paris, nor wood, but carton pierre; and they are beautifully executed.

We have not space to detail the stage arrangements, which comprise the latest improvements in this branch of art, especially with regard to the mechanical mode of working the scenes. The classic act-drop is painted by Mr. W. Beverly, who, by the way, is now painting scenery for Mr. Macready's performances at the Princess' Theatre.

There is a provision against fire by a tank of 20,000 gallons of water, upon the roof of the theatre. The building is warmed and ventilated by Mr. W. Walker's improved plan. In its dimensions and capacity—its extent of accommodation and numerous appliances for the comfort of the audience—its various mechanical contrivances and adaptations for giving increased effect to the business of the scene, and its beautiful decorations, illuminations, &c., the new Theatre Royal may be regarded as complete and carefully furnished. The great perseverance, known business-ability, spirited enterprise, and large expenditure of the proprietor, are, so far as we know, unexampled in the annals of theatres. To a loss sustained by the destruction of the late Theatre Royal, to the extent of £1000, he has now added an outlay, for the land, building, fitting up, and furnishing of this new theatre, of not less than £23,000, relying on the growing public taste in Manchester for theatrical amusements, to crown his costly enterprise with success.

The new theatre was opened on Monday evening last, when, such was the pressure of the crowd of visitors, that there were present 2468 persons. After "Rule Britannia" had been sung by the vocal corps, the stage-manager, Mr H. Wallack, delivered an "opening address;" the act-drop then rose, the whole of the company appeared on the stage, and "God Save the Queen" was sung. Mr. Knowles, the proprietor of the theatre, was then recognised in his box, and was loudly cheered by the audience. The performances then commenced; they were Douglas Jerrold's admirable comedy of "Time Works Wonders," and the ballet-afterpiece of the "Court Ball in 1740." In the latter, several of the dances were loudly applauded, and the curtain fell at midnight on the most brilliant scene ever exhibited within the walls of a Manchester theatre.

At the close of the comedy, the spirited proprietor presented to each of the architects a piece of plate, as a testimony of his approval of their very efficient services.



OPENING OF THE NEW THEATRE ROYAL, MANCHESTER.

A REMINISCENCE.

BY A CITY REMEMBRANCER, LONG SINCE FORGOTTEN.

ILLUSTRATED BY ALFRED CROWQUILL.

HOW difficult a task is it to convince this age of improvement that we had, formerly, anything good, since it seems determined to sweep away everything as bad which has been done by our forefathers. The present streets have become, from their great width dangerous to cross; and the snug little shops, and money-worn counters, have entirely vanished before acres of plate glass. The windows are stuffed with goods all sold under "prime cost," which, formerly, would have been a declaration of insolvency, but now, is only a spur to a brisk trade. The old shopkeeper, with his sober brown breeches and gaiters, powdered hair and pigtail, who condescended to wait upon his own customers, assisted by an apprentice or two, who swept out the shop, cleaned the shoes, and retired to rest under the counter, and who, with the master and mistress, felt nervous if they slept out of the sound of Bow-bells, have all passed away! We now have the overpowering, empty-headed boors who emigrate from the country, and are quickly clothed in sable suits and white handkerchiefs (a kind of cross between a waiter and a piece of Kennington-common Mawwormism), and who are preferred by their proprietor according to their quantity of vulgar impertinence.

Wander down the fine old city streets, and see the magnificent mansions of our merchant forefathers standing as mournful examples of the improving age which renders it necessary that a country house, and an exceedingly polite domestic arrangement, should welcome the trader home at seven, to dinner, where his fair daughters greet him with a French salutation. It is also indispensable that he should be a man of ton, who goes to the filthy City only to make money, and who horrifies his fashionable tiger, by compelling him to stand about in such a shop-keeping locality.

The comfortable has gone for ever! It was once essentially an English word, but now no more to do with us than with the French and their coffee-house friendship and ball-room love. Where are the good old housewives who went to market, and who dared go down into the kitchen in a cotton gown, and make their own preserves; and who never peeped into the "Belle Assemblée" for an alteration to the sleeve of the black silk dress, the preservation of which was a matter of much care and lavender?

The merchant or shopkeeper's wife, now, has a very indistinct idea of the City, except as a necessary disagreeable place, where her husband must go, and from which he returns, sometimes very cross, and where men get very brittle—as they are often broken by having a run against them.

The plodders have vanished: the rapidities have commenced their reign; 'tis now of no use being any thing, unless you are a fast man—not standing to woo Fortune, but, like a bold brigand, seize here by the throat, and compel her to yield her treasures, or be crushed under her wheel, for your precipitancy: it is all a matter of luck. Mercury has put his wings into his pocket, taken to steam, and got into a new line.

It is, perhaps, unwise for old codgers like me to grumble at the rapid pace of change, which, in its hurry, upsets our old usages and sweeps away our nooks and corners; but we cannot forget the time when we were what was then considered the active, and railways were not the staple commodity of the country, and a man travelled, "God willing," in four days to Birmingham—when the City was the City—when the Lord Mayor was the King thereof, and shut his Fleet-street door in the face of the King who lived at Westminster—when Aldermen and Common Councilmen were magnates, and ate their dinners unquestioned by prying Committee-men, or had their stomachs, which are things of history, robbed by new acts of severely virtuous Common Councilmen and brother Aldermen. Farewell to the Guildhall luncheon! that green spot for wondering Aldermanic stomachs; that appetite-provoking trap, where a live Alderman could be always found to sit in the judgment seat. Reform has destroyed their pasture and pleasant places, and the delinquent waits in vain at the bar for a second Daniel to be found to try him.

All these and many greater evils have I put down with much care and grief in my little memorandum book, which shows me that the world is far from improving; and of which anon I will take further notice, and, individually, in their proper places. I lament more particularly for the loss of one of our most ancient privileges—the comfortable families' mild and amiable guardian of the night called the watchman. Ah! the comfort to the sleepless of that mournful quavering cry: it gave assurance to you in the darkness and the stillness of the night (although the correctness of the hour could never be depended on). What matter! you knew a guardian was watching round your pillow, too old to be wheedled down your area, and too weak to commit a burglary on your pantry, and who, when wanted, was always to be found in his box. See what a comfort it was to dining out men, and what assurance to their wives and families to know that if, in zigzagging home, they missed their footing or their propriety, that a tender motherly watchman, without an ounce of the present police ferocity (who have no discrimination between a gentleman's error and a plebeian fault), was always near to foster them and prop them up against their own door-posts. When the watchhouse became necessary (which it sometimes did even in the best regulated families), the constable of the night was a man who listened to reason, and, very likely, was your butcher or baker, who put your appearance down only as a late call upon him to see that he was doing his duty, and who drowned all animosity in a pot of egg-hot, jointed in most cordiality by the lamb-like watchman, who knew the propriety of handling one of the ward with tenderness. Those affairs were much simplified when, as was often the case, the aforesaid watchman was your daily porter or other menial connected with your establishments, and lost all his lion-like ferocity before his keeper. In fact, in the door of many even watchhouses was fixed at night a pretty mechanical contrivance in the shape of a box, wherein was a ward watchman whose memory I reverence, and whose form comes powerfully before me. Look upon it! age has marked the features strongly, but age brings experience, and, although he had not the agility of the present police to run after a midnight burglar caught in the fact, he did better by being on the spot, and not letting him do it; at least, I can speak positively as far as my own premises were concerned. Notwithstanding all his good qualities, and the fine evidence he was of our attachment to our ancient usages, he has been shamefully discarded; his box ignominiously torn from its ancient nook, losing its identity amidst the parochial lumber and rubbish; and his lantern sold, at a discount, to some stable-boy, to flicker for a while over the midnight pilferings of the corn-bin, instead of, as in the days of its glory, terrifying the evil-doer, and showing him from afar how close he was to detection. This is not all. The Government allowed their ancient guardians to be insulted ere they deparied from the scenes of their usefulness and long service; they were Tom-and-Jerried into contempt and disrepute, and lowered in public favour, ere the bold step of removing them for ever was dared to be attempted.

The day will come when antiquarie will pay a high price for one of the lanterns, and the great coat will be looked upon as the cloak of Alexander, for the rows it has passed through—for Warriors are only Watchmen, watching for a chance, and wars are but great rows. I have taken much pains to procure, in this paper, a fac simile of a celebrated one, in full costume. Now, instead of that respectable old man, we have thrust upon us young men, who have not learnt to subdue their passions, and who will not understand a joke, or how far it is allowable to have it carried by Gentlemen, after charity-dinners, or other convivial meetings, and those who slyly upon any respectable man who cannot walk a chalk line, or does not know his number. Bah! I say this is no longer a Land of Liberty.

KING RAIL.

His parents, FIRE and SPEED!
His wings like Flame and Wind!
Rushing along like human Thought
On thro' the rushing light!

ELEMENTS build his throne;
EARTH is bound to his will;
He cleaves his way with a gathering sway,
And is TIME'S great Victor still!

He screams to the arching sky—
He bellows within the cave—
And storms along, with a fiery eye,
Over the whelming wave!

But their course seems dull and slow
Faster his flight than the waters of light
That shine in their beds below!

He has tunnell'd the sloping hill,
He has bridg'd the expanded vale,
Nor have him fall with his screeching shrill
The far ears of the gale!

Under the mountain steep,
Over the river, still,
Miles and miles thro' a darkness deep
That maketh the Spirit still!

A darkness long and dank,
Deep as the mystic night,
And then away in the blaze of day
On thro' the rushing light!

His muscle, the Song of Steam,
His anger, the doom of soul,
When he gathereth rage,—like a night-mare Dream—
And escapeth man's controul—

When madness fills his speed,
And fury foams his breath,
And he flieth too fierce and fast to heed
The warning cries of Death!

But he stems his passionate speed,
When Science grasps the rein;
And the fleet, and fierce, and fiery steed
Is passive once again!

KING RAIL were an awful KING,
And would shake the world with dread;
But SCIENCE hath put in her Right Divine—
Kneeling him down at her glorious shrine
Oh! but she forged us a Magical Ring,
When COMMERCE and HE were wed!

IMPORTANT RAILWAYS.—So many Railway projects daily see the light, that it would be difficult to analyse them all accurately. For this reason we seldom recommend any new line. Where we depart from this rule it is in cases where we can speak with confidence, as in the instance of the Nottingham and Boston Railway, which is in high favour. The York and Lancaster is highly spoken of. The Morning Post of Thursday says:—"The York and Lancaster are advancing in the public estimation." We can speak well of the Peterborough and Holbeach, from our personal knowledge of the line and the promoters of it. The Peterborough and Nottingham also comes forth under good auspices. Among the lines which have come into the market during the week, the Cornwall and Devon Direct is worth notice. The Globe of Wednesday says:—"The Cornwall and Devon Direct letters of allotment were issued to-day, and found eager purchasers at 1 prem., with a decided upward tendency." The letters of allotment of the Southampton, Manchester and Oxford Junction, were also issued, and some business is doing in the line, although the price is not yet officially quoted. We hear that the Staffordshire Potteries project is well received. The Lincoln, Horncastle, Spilsby, and Wainfleet Haven Railway, meets with attention in the Railway world, and we understand that the applications for shares have reached to an enormous extent.

HANOVER AND BRUNSWICK.—On and after the 1st October, the postage upon all letters posted in the United Kingdom and addressed to the Kingdom of Hanover, or to the Duchy of Brunswick, and vice versa, when such letters are conveyed direct by packet boat or private ship between the United Kingdom and Hanover, will be reduced to the uniform rate of 9d. on a letter not exceeding half an ounce in weight, is 6d. not exceeding one ounce, and so on, according to the rate in operation in this country, for charging letters by weight. The rates of 9d., 1s 6d., &c., comprise both British and foreign postage on letters between these countries, and they may be either paid in advance, or the letters forwarded unpaid, at the option of the sender. British newspapers may also be forwarded on payment in this country of a postage of one penny each.

ANOTHER FASTING MAN.—An extraordinary fasting man has lately turned up in the county Monaghan, in the townland of Emy, near Emy Mills. He is decidedly insane, but is said to have existed for thirty-six days without food of any sort.

A RAMBLE IN THE REALMS OF CHAT.

Considering that it is a time of Recess, and from Railroads are eating their way into the public vitals, we have no right to complain of want of diversity in the talk topics of the hour. What with Canada, Boenos Ayres, the Silver Plate, the Times Commissioner, the Irish Agitation, the Agricultural Societies, the French wine growers, and the antics of magistrates of police, there is food for a divertissement for the public, and we may chat away in a lively strain enough.

And of railways first. What have the official orders been doing towards the clearance of Capel Court? is it true, gud a mercy! that there is as great a panic among the stags of London as there was among the stags of Gotha.

Are they a weeping vanished crew?
At cry of "pay up" have they started?
Are they in very truth defunct,
May they be called the "dear departed"?

Is Capel-court no more—alas!—
The scene of former promenading,
Are Stockbrokers allowed the pass,
Without bloodshed*ing* or black guarding?

Have silence sweet, and soft repose,
Usurped the place of noise and swaggering?
Have they grown sober in their woes,
Are they for bulls and bears disgarding?

Has Capel Court—which once dressed up,
By dint of Shares the poor and needy—
Sent them to "Court of Shabby" back,
Must the whole Crop again be seedy?

Poor Stags! they have been baited sore;
The cry's "Beware 'em! Snare 'em! Tear 'em!"
The bears are all as fierce as bulls,
While for the bulls they can't a bear-'em!

Since the letters of allotment are to be paid for, the whole lot are dismayed, and Change Alley has become the pis aller of speculation. With the Stags, it is now share and share alike, but the capital for distribution is nothing but a great stock of discount.

The police reports have furnished us with another mode, besides stagging, of coming at net, and we may add, neat, profits by means of railways. We allude to the practice by expert thieves of sharing among themselves the luggage of the passengers.

A gentleman of the name of Garrett appears to have exercised wit little short of attic, in his dispersal of trunks, portmanteaus, desks, carpet bags, and dressing-cases, jewel boxes, hat-boxes, and the like. The functions of Justice appear to be working out the punishment of this novel species of highway robbery; but, in the meanwhile, does not the root of the evil lie with the Railway management? which, although it has in the long run paid more respect to property than it has to life, has now begun to be as care-ess of the former as it ever and repeatedly has been of the latter. Why not appoint to each train an inspector of passengers' luggage, with check tickets, and let his duty be, by means of those tickets, to regulate the distribution of luggage at the journey's end? It would save time, trouble, and anxiety, and put such gentlemen as Mr. Garrett au desespoir!

In another part of our journal will be found an article of exclusive and important intelligence with reference to Canada. We are here enabled to add to it a fresh item of information. It is known that public benevolence rose to its height on the occasion of the melancholy fires in Quebec—that the press of England echoed the cry of Charity, and that vast funds were transmitted to the scene of the disaster. We now learn from unquestionable authority that there is reason to doubt the wisdom with which those funds—intended for the instant alleviation of the sufferings of a sudden and intense affliction—will be distributed at their destination. It is a fact—that the Committee entrusted with their management, have already voted the sum of TWELVE THOUSAND POUNDS towards the improvement of a simple Street! The architectural ornaments of Quebec City had no part in the benevolent intentions of the British public towards the alleviation of a public distress. It is laudable and wise to improve cities, but not to the wrong of distress, or at the expense of charity—and we hope that proper vigilance will be exercised to see that English benevolence is not perverted by our colony in these respects.

The wine growers of France have attacked its Royalty in a body, in the shape of a remonstrance, in favour of free trade with this country; and as a Prince of the Blood has promised the deputation to bring the matter under the serious consideration of King and Government, we may hope to see champagne levelled to humble port, brandy running neck and neck with gin, and sm ordinaire at the price of porter.

Claret will be a thing to drink of,
And not, as now, a thing to think of,

Of affairs at the River Plate, we have only to observe, that

With respect to old Rosas, the Ministers twain,
French and English, are *di*ing at last what we wished·
If he doesn't give in, he is stuck with war's din,
And on his Plate river be thoroughly dished!

This is the ultimatum which Mr. Gore Ousseley and his French colleague have given to one of the most blood thirsty of South American tyrans; so that diplomacy in that quarter is getting rather peppery, and the mercantile interests may look up.

Conciliation Hall has, in Ireland, enacted a great farce within the last few days. An immense hoax has been played off upon the imbecility of the genus O'Connell; and, while my Son John distributed against it a volley of patriotic mensa, Father Dan anathematized it in Hibernian Billingsgate, and then had it solemnly and authentically inserted on the minutes of the Society. While the O'Connells were the virtual victims of the hoax, the "Times Commissioner" was its nominal subject.

A dash of spleen had been fired at him through the squib of the paternal vocabulary; he was admitted obli, but was denounced ugly. Son John "rose in his place," and started in the mail train of vituperation; and, in consequence of what he said and what he did, he received a letter which might be taken poetically as follows:—

Sir, I've read,
What you so said;
'Twas unfair and ill-bred
So, respecting the Heaven-throned vow of your Sire,
To unregister which, Sir, I far from desire,
I call you in person a blackguard and liar.

The letter was signed John Foster, and Dan had already given out Foster as the name of the Times Commissioner. It was dated in Salisbury, and, therefore, it was concluded that Mr. Commissioner was in Suffolk, instead of being at the scene of his commission. This was asserted deliberately at the Hall by father and son, and the letter is now in the archives of the national sedition.

Next day out came the truth. The name of the "Times Commissioner" is not "John Foster;" and the "Times Commissioner" being very busy over his duties—for the Irish, and Irish Mayo County—had not conceived the most remote idea of the condescension of writing a letter to either of the O'Connells.

Such blunders, exposures, and personalities, would disgrace the most sacred cause in the world. Personality has been the stumbling-block of agitation, from the first commencement of its career.

MR. G. HUDSON, M.P.—It is said that Mr. George Hudson, M.P., has completed the purchase of another large estate in Yorkshire from the Duke of Devonshire, at a price little short of half a million of money. It may be presumed that Londesborough, one of the richest and noblest estates in the East Riding, is the property alluded to. The friends of Mr. Hudson have resolved that the contemplated dinner in honour of that gentleman's triumphant election for Sunderland shall be held in the Athenæum, in that town, on Tuesday evening, the 21st of October, and that a grand ball shall be held in the large room at the Athenæum on the following evening.

WILL OF THE LATE DUKE OF LEINSTER.—The property was sworn under the Prerogative Court to the Marquis of Downshire, on the property of the late Marquis, who died intestate, and the personalty sworn under £100,000. The duty on the latter probate was £4,650, the largest sum ever paid in any single case in Ireland. So highly esteemed was the late Marquis in King's County and neighbourhood, where he had property, and always resided as a kind and considerate landlord, that both Protestants and Catholics are uniting to raise a fund for the erection of a monument to his memory.

ACCIDENT ON THE KENYON JUNCTION, NEAR LEIGH.—A dreadful and fatal railway accident occurred on Monday morning last, at Kenyon Junction, near Leigh. A young woman named Ellen Platt, of Tyldesley, started from the Bag lane (Chorley) station by the first half-past seven o'clock train, with the intention of proceeding to Liverpool. On arriving at the junction of the Leigh and Kenyon line with the Liverpool and Manchester line, the passengers have to get out of one train and wait to await the arrivals of the respective trains to convey them onwards. The young woman being not acquainted with the customs of the line, got out of the carriage on the wrong side, and walked round the engine of the next train, which was in readiness on the arrival of the train which was to convey the passengers to Liverpool the remainder of the journey. At this moment a train of third class cattle wagons was seen on the Liverpool line by the bell

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

THE MARQUIS OF ELY

John Loftus, Marquis and Earl of Ely, and Viscount Loftus in the Peerage of Ireland, and Baron Loftus in the Peerage of the United Kingdom, was born on the 15th of February, 1770, and succeeded his father as second Marquis, the 22nd of March, 1806. In politics, his lordship was a Tory, and a stanch supporter of the Protestant party in Ireland. As a magistrate and landlord, he was much respected, acting on all occasions with justice and kindness. The death of the noble Marquis was of a sudden and unexpected nature. He had arrived at Ely Lodge in apparent good health and spirits, when, on the night of Thursday, the 25th ultimo, he was seized with English cholera, and he expired the following day. By his wife, Anna Maria, eldest daughter of Sir Henry Watkin Dashwood, Bart. (to whom he was married in 1810), his lordship leaves issue, besides four other sons, and three daughters, a son John Henry, now third and present Marquis of Ely.

The family of Loftus, Earls and Marquises of Ely, boast to come of Saxon origin, and to have been of considerable note as early as the time of King Alfred. A younger son of the house—Adam Loftus, a clergyman —went into Ireland with Thomas, Earl Sussex, in 1560, and was there consecrated Archbishop of Armagh, and constituted Lord Chancellor of Ireland. From him descended Nicholas Loftus, Governor of Wexford, who was elevated to the Peerage, as Baron Loftus, in 1751, and Viscount Loftus, in 1756. These honours were, in 1769, inherited by Henry Loftus, who was created Earl of Ely in 1771, but who dying without issue, all the titles became extinct. They were, however, revived in the person of the late Marquis's father—Charles Tottenham—who, as nephew to the previous Earl, inherited the estates, and who assumed the surname of Loftus on being raised to the Peerage. he was further created Marquis of Ely, in 1800.

SIR JOHN MORDAUNT.

Sir John Mordaunt, Bart., was the head of a branch of the ancient family of Mordaunt, one of Bedfordshire origin, where it ranked amongst the most eminent houses of the county. The estate of the Mordaunts in Bedfordshire was a grant from William the Conqueror. In 1486, Sir John Mordaunt of Turvey, commanded for King Henry VII., at the battle of Stoke; and being as learned in law as skilful in arms, he was made Justice of Chester, and Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. This Sir John's younger brother's descendant—L'Estrange Mordaunt—signalised himself as a military leader, and did good service for Queen Elizabeth, in Flanders; and he was one of the first raised to the dignity of a Baronet, being so created the 29th June, 1611, soon after the institution of the order. Sir L'Estrange's heirs have, from father to son, held the baronetcy down to the present time, and they have, for the last hundred and fifty years and more, represented in Parliament the county of Warwick. Sir John Mordaunt, whose lamentable death we now record, was the ninth Baronet; he was born the 24th August, 1808, and inherited the title on the decease of his father, the 30th May, 1823; he married, the 7th August, 1834, Louisa Sophia, second daughter of the Right Rev. Dr. Murray, Bishop of Rochester.

Sir John Mordaunt was M.P. for the southern division of Warwickshire, and was highly and justly respected by his constituency: he was a Tory in politics. His death occurred under distressing circumstances.

While out shooting, on the 27th ultimo, Arthur Mills, the gun of the latter accidentally went off, and severely wounded the Baronet, the whole charge lodging in the calves of his legs. The accident did not, at first, present so dangerous an aspect, but erysipelas eventually set in. Mr. Hoghton, the eminent surgeon of Birmingham, was sent for, but all human skill was unavailing. On the morning of the 27th ultimo, the unfortunate gentleman expired, in his thirty-eighth year, at his seat, Walton, near Stratford-on-Avon, in the presence of his family, and of his father-in-law, the Bishop of Rochester, and his eldest son, and two daughters: his eldest son and successor, Sir Charles Mordaunt, the present baronet, is only nine years of age.

MR. WILLIAM UPCOTT.

Mr. Upcott, who, for many years, was Librarian of the London Institution, was well known in the literary and antiquarian world, as the editor of a number of popular and valuable works which have issued from the press, during the course of the last thirty years. He also employed his time in collecting and arranging the autograph letters of illustrious persons, who flourished in the last and present centuries. This series, which amounts to several hundred volumes, is, perhaps, the most valuable now existing. Mr. Upcott's profound judgment in historical and literary matters was often referred to. He had a most retentive memory, an inexhaustible store of anecdote: this, combined with his kind disposition, and agreeable manner, rendered him a popular member of society.

Mr. Upcott died on the 23rd ultimo, at his residence, Islington, after a very short illness.

NAVAL INTELLIGENCE.

MORTALITY ON BOARD THE SLOOP "ECLAIR."

The Eclair steam sloop, Commander Walter G. B. Estcourt, came up to the Motherbank on Monday morning, about 9 o'clock, with the yellow flag, with a black ball in its centre, flying from her mainmast head, emblematical of death on board. She has been visited with sickness since she has been on the coast of Africa that she has been sent home. The awful number of 62 have died in the vessel, and others are lying hourly. We regret to state Commander Estcourt is among the number dead. There are now 23 ill on board. The surgeon was alive on Monday morning, and on the quarantine officers going alongside the vessel, he answered their inquiries, and said, the mortality was from a fever, something between the yellow and the black. One of the men died on Monday morning. The Customs' authorities are fearful of removing any one on board. We believe, however, fresh provisions have been sent to the vessel, but whether any human assistance we cannot find out; we believe none, owing to the fear of contagion. If she remains at the Motherbank, she will have to ride out 5 days' quarantine, but it is understood she will be supplied with fuel and fresh provisions, and be sent for a cruise in the North Sea. The Admiralty despatches are landed, but nothing else.

The Eclair was only commissioned last August twelve-months, and is a new vessel (first named the Lucifer), of 350 horse power

The fever broke out amongst the crew whilst the Eclair was at the islands on the west coast of Africa. At that time she proceeded to Bonavista to recruit their health. Finding, however, that the mortality increased, she was sent to Madeira, and as the virulence of the fever had suffered no abatement, the Commodore (Jones) ordered her return to England, the most judicious step which could have been taken under the melancholy circumstances. Since her arrival, the Admiralty, although not receiving no accounts from her excepting by telegraph, have momentarily exerted themselves to ameliorate the sufferings of the survivors.

The names of the officers dead are—

Mr. W. G. B. Estcourt, of the Eclair (1841.)

Surgeon.—Mr. John Maconchy (1838.)

Paymaster and Purser.—Mr. Thomas R. Hallett (1838.)

Assistant-Surgeon.—Mr. Charles Hartman (1840.)

Clerk.—Mr. Cleland M.ll.

Naval Cadet.—Mr. Symons.

Master's Assistant.—Mr. Goman

The fever still prevails on board, and the yellow flag with the black ball still flies from the masthead.

The following is a list of the men dead.—H. Fudge, captain's steward; W. King, captain's cook; John Mills, W. Pardner, and John Gibson, quartermasters; C. Brennan, captain's coxswain; J. Wright, purser's steward's mate; G. Caplin, gunner, Marine Artillery; J. Culver, J. Hancock, W. Kirby, and R. Chipp, Marine Artillery; James Gusgrey, caulker; T. Davis, leading stoker; J. M'Dermot, C. Hooks, W. Moran, B. Conolly, A. Thomas, J. Tarvaty, G. Keely, J. Sullivan, and W. Cannon, stokers; W Skinner, John Warwick, H. Goodhugh, James Fielden, H. Cory, M. Dillon, A. Coes, and R. Gallagher, ableboded seamen; J. Fower, W. Thorpe, T. Coleridge, James Harting, G. Brown, P. Ward, G. Steel, and James Watson, ordinary seamen; B. Hill, J. Luck, T. Cranage, H. Sherman, W. Forest, W. Kirk, R. Martin, and W. Rice, Marines; W. Harris, R. Morton, W. Field, and W. Pend boys of the 1st class; J. Dillon, J. Athorn, T. Lloyd, and G. Long, boys of the 2nd class.

No one is allowed to go on board of or to leave the vessel. The Ecko tug has, however, towed down a lighter with 36 tons of coal, stores, &c., on board, for the use of the vessel. This stock will be moored to a buoy, and left for the Ecaire's survivors to take on board

SUICIDE AT HAMPSTEAD.—On Tuesday afternoon about three o'clock, an act of suicide was committed at Hampstead, in the field adjoining that in which Mr. Delarue was murdered. The deceased was a person of middle age, and was very respectably dressed, but his name is at present unknown He went to a retired corner of the field, close to the hedge, and there blew out his brains by discharging a pistol into his mouth. The report of the pistol was heard by a man in an adjoining garden, who went to the spot, and found the gentleman weltering in his blood, with a discharged pistol in one hand and a loaded one by his side.

POLICE.

THE LATE RAILWAY ROBBERIES.—Daniel Garrett, who stands charged with having committed several robberies at the railway termini, was further examined on Tuesday at GUILDHALL, before Mr. Alderman Hughes Hughes. Mr. Alderman Humphery and the Lord Mayor took their seats on the bench. Mr. Clarkson attended, with Mr. Nash, from Messrs. Swain and Co.'s, to prosecute on behalf of the Great Western Railway, the South-Western Railway, and the Brighton Railway. Mr. Humphreys attended to support three or four charges on the part of the Birmingham Railway, and Mr. Thwaites appeared on behalf of the prisoner. Mr Clarkson stated, in opening the case, that he was in hopes of having had the prisoner at the person who stole a letter-case from Mr. France, for receiving which Maynard had been already committed, he proposed to charge him with stealing some property belonging to Dr. Daniels, a medical gentleman residing at Bath, and to Mr. Winter, of Morecombe-street. It would be remembered that Mr. France's loss occurred on the 8th of July, and that on the 12th he received an anonymous letter, stating that his letter-case and contents were safe, and might be recovered for a liberal reward. By showing that this letter was in the handwriting of the prisoner, he should fix him with the possession of the property four days after it was stolen. On the 18th a second anonymous letter was sent, complaining that no attention had been paid to the first, and requiring a reward to be immediately advertised, or the property would be placed out of the power of the writer. An advertisement was accordingly published on the 23rd of July, which produced a third letter from the anonymous correspondent, stating that his agent was at Sandhurst, and would write to Mr. France. Thus introduced the agent, Maynard, upon the scene, who produced the stolen property. He should prove these three letters to be in the handwriting of the prisoner, by calling Captain Culpepper, in whose service the prisoner was for a time. He should show that the prisoner visited Maynard in the Compter the day after he was apprehended, and that when the prisoner was taken into custody he made that desperate resistance which would be expected from a man who was conscious that he was deeply involved. Mr. Clarkson adverted to a miserable device which had been resorted to by some of the prisoner's friends or companions, who had sent to the females of Mr. Nash's family a letter containing dreadful threats if he pursued his charge against the prisoner. It would completely fail in its object, for Mr. Nash would persist in endeavouring, to the utmost, to bring to justice not only the prisoner, but all his companions.—Captain Culpepper, of Sackville street, was then sworn. He said, the prisoner was in his service as butler for the season of 1843. He saw his handwriting, but not frequently; but he had a recollection of his hand, and had received a letter from a person named Maynard in the Compter.—Cross-examined by Mr. Thwaites: He used to dishonr small sums occasionally, and make out bills, which witness settled and took up. Never saw the prisoner write, and did not swear to his writing. Mr. Alderman Hughes Hughes said, no person swears to handwriting; they only swear to their belief.—Captain Culpepper said, that was exactly the case. To the best of his belief two of the letters produced were written by the prisoner. To the other he could not speak.—Cross examined: He received a good character of the prisoner from Lord Falkland, and gave the prisoner a good character when he discharged him. Had never seen him write. Could not say that he was able to write, or that the bills the prisoner brought to him had not been written by one of his fellow-servants; but he presumed the letter was written by the prisoner, and it was from that letter he spoke more particularly as to the prisoner's handwriting, because the prisoner said it was his writing.—Joseph Collard, the superintendent, was next examined. He said, the prisoner remained with great coolness, till Mr. Nash spoke of pistols. Amongst the things he found at the prisoner's lodging, was a pencil case, with a checkered wafer-stamp at the end, which corresponded with the seal on the three letters produced. He apprehended Maynard on the 8th of August, and on the 6th, he saw the prisoner come out of the Giltspur street Compter, where Maynard was.—G. E. Evans, a turnkey at the Compter, identified the prisoner as a person who had an interview with Maynard on the 6th. The prisoner gave his name as John Smith, for entry in the Visitors' book. Maynard was short of money, and the prisoner lent him, he might have five pounds, if he had. Maynard replied, a sovereign would be sufficient, and it was given to witness to put to his account—prisoners before conviction, having the option to support themselves. The prisoner and Maynard appeared to be well acquainted.—Mr. Nash deposed to finding some pieces of paper in the grate at Maynard's house, in Howland street, which, upon being matched, appeared to have been a rough draught, and nearly a verbatim copy of the letter, dated the 13th of July, which Captain Culpepper had identified as the prisoner's writing.—Louisa Ludeman, of 19, Queen-street, Edgware road, deposed to the prisoner. He lodged at her father's house till Aug. 13, when he went away. She had seen Maynard in Newgate, and recognised him as a person who called four or five times to see the prisoner Garrett. Maynard was present when before he (Maynard) was apprehended.—Mr Alderman Hughes Hughes asked Collard if he had ever seen the prisoner at the railway?—Collard replied he had not, but there were other persons who had. Mr. Alderman Hughes remarked to the second charge.—Dr. John Bamfylde Daniels, of Bath, deposed that he was a traveller on the Great Western Railway in the early part of August, and he lost a black leather portmanteau, containing apparel to the amount of several pounds. The train came in at dusk, and there was some confusion in getting the articles out of the luggage receptacle. There were several portmanteaus. He saw a man and his porter to hand him one, which witness believed to be his own, and he went round to the person who had obtained possession of it. This was the prisoner. He asked the prisoner whether he had his own portmanteau? The prisoner said he had. Witness replied, "I am sorry to say you have not, for it is not mine." Witness rejoined that it was very like his portmanteau. The prisoner said nothing further, but got into a cab, and was driven away. Witness went back to the luggage-room, and found the portmanteau was there, but could not find it. He had a strong recollection of the prisoner's features, but he had not spectacles on then.—The prisoner was ordered to take off his spectacles, and put on his hat.—The witness said he was sure the prisoner was the same person. He had not seen him on the road to London, but only at the terminus.—Mr. Clarkson remarked that the packing of the portmanteau Hughes said, if the prisoner's lodging would prove that he was not mistaken. The witness identified two gold rings, some gloves, and other articles, of which he delivered a list. He also delivered in a List of property which had not been found, of the value of £16. The cross examination elicited nothing material, and in re-examination the witness stated, that there were some cards with his address in the portmanteau.—Mr. Alderman Hughes Hughes said, if the portmanteau had been taken in mistake, or found, the finder could have had no difficulty in discovering the owner. The witness said certainly not. Collard proved the finding of the duties mentioned by the doctor. He brought them from the prisoner's lodging, at 40, Great North street, Lisson grove. He produced also the portmanteau, which he recovered on Saturday last, from the possession of a person in charge of Kennington Green. Mrs. Hobbs, of Great North street, deposed, that the room where the articles were found was rented by the prisoner. He was introduced by a man who said he was a neighbour, but she had not seen him since. She had no reference. The prisoner, when she asked his name, said he would tell her that another time. He came to her on the 13th of September. Mr. Hawkins, a watchmaker, of Tottenham-street, said he knew the prisoner from having recently lodged at the Cock Tavern, at Kennington, where witness occasionally spent an evening. He lodged there for a short time about a month ago. He occasionally said he had been travelling, and was going on the continent, and was encumbered with too much luggage. He wished to dispose of some, and took witness up into his room, and offered him various articles for sale. Witness bought them for £1. 18s. 6d. Besides the portmanteau identified by Dr. Daniels) there was a carpet-bag and a hat box marked "Winter." The prisoner said his name was Winter. The witness remarked the strap of the portmanteau, and before he purchased it, the prisoner said that he had lost a bunch of keys, and had been obliged to break open all his trunks. Witness thought this was probable. There were some articles of apparel in the hat box, which he had since pledged. Hearing of the railway robberies, he thought it proper to communicate with Mr. Collard. After some desultory conversation, Mr. Alderman Hughes Hughes adjourned the case till to-day.—Mr. Nash said he had identified the carpet-bag again examined.—Mr. William John Winter, of 47, Jewin-street, said he was a passenger on the Great Western Railway in August last. He came from Sarnen, in Switzerland, and had lost his luggage in a carpet bag, and a leather hat case. The value of the articles in the bag was about £12. When he arrived in London he missed the bag, and called upon the Company to make good the loss. The carpet bag and hat case now produced were his. His name was on the handle, and also upon a card, which was placed on the bag. There was a printed ticket of the Great Western Railway on each parcel.—The case was then closed for the prosecution, and a listing of a quantity of shirts, handkerchiefs, socks, &c.

Superintendent Collard said that all the articles were found at the prisoner's lodgings, with the exception of the shirts.—This closed the case for the Great Western Company; and evidence was then offered against the prisoner on behalf of the South Western Railway. It appeared that, on the 13th of July, a Mr. Benningfield was a traveller from Gosport to London, and that he had a trunk, with various papers, linen, and all kinds of wearing apparel This was lost, and some of the articles were traced to the prisoner.—Mr. Humphreys then called several witnesses, to prove that the prisoner was concerned in robberies on the London and Birmingham Railway. Some of the property stolen was found at the prisoner's lodgings, 40 Lisson grove. The prisoner was remanded for a week.

DEATH OF BENSON HILL, THE COMEDIAN.—Benson Hill, who was a humorous and artistic actor, a facile writer, and some time editor of the "Old Monthly," died on the 7th ult., after an obscure sickness of a few days and distress. The last employment Mr. Hill held was at the free list of the Lyceum Theatre. Whilst attending to his duties here he caught a severe cold, which resulted in consumption, a disease that soon proved fatal to him His age was verging on fifty. Besides having been a popular actor, Benson Hill was the author of various light works of travel, and social novels, still inquired after in circulating libraries.

CANALS CONVERTED TO RAILWAYS.—A meeting of the Directors and Proprietors in the Trent Navigation was held at Nottingham on Tuesday, and at Stone on Wednesday, to consider the expediency of converting the navigation into a railway, or of disposing of it for that purpose to one or more of the numerous lines projected in the district.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The national taste—not to say instinct—for manly exercises, if any proof were needed of its existence, might fairly be said to be illustrated by the number of fishing matches in every variety of sporting that every season gives rise to. The encounters of personal prowess, indeed, argue well for the spirit, but, in too many cases, omen badly for the cause. In especial our inference would attach to aquatics. Sailing races of all sorts are, beyond all such contests, abundant in dispute, and wager matches are the climax. Doctor Johnson used to say, that a concert would be a very pleasant place, only for the music. So far as regards the harmony, it may lawfully be said a regatta would be all the better if the racing were omitted. It is not invidiously that we allude to the proceedings of the Royal Yacht Squadron in support of this view; neither that the latest instances of the working of the system among the members of that society is brought forward to exhibit the discord which these floating duellos too constantly engender.

Some short time since a match for £500 a side—to come off on the R.Y.S. Monlsey Hurst, "round the Eddystone and back"—was made between the owners of two crack schooners of the Club, the Wyvern and Zephyretta. As the case is always, or thereabouts, on such occasions, it blew a gale of wind—a state of the weather not particularly suited to the class of vessels called yachts. We won't stay to draw "odorous comparisons"—nor to say a word about the gentlemen of Scotland being worse provided for keeping the sea than the coal-whippers of Sunderland and Newcastle; but proceed to demonstrate the resemblance which pleasure-vessels' trips bear to the commercial history in general. Says the log of the Wyvern, now snug in St. Helen's Roads, riding in five fathoms smooth water:—" 6.30. Zephyretta sent a boat on board, with Capt. Lyon, who proposed to drop stakes, which, owing to the increasing gale then blowing, was accepted." Says the log of the Zephyretta—epitomised by Capt. Lyon:—"We kept the sea, refusing, when asked by the 'Wyvern,' to drop stakes" Now, either party feeling had so far damaged the senses of the commanding officers and crews, in this match, that they would not hear or see aught, or they had fallen in with some such blast as transformed Jack's maritnespike into a sheeting bronze, and their breeze had blown each other's negative into an affirmative. However it may be, such breezes are not "gentle gales," but rather the "trade winds" of yacht matcles. How the difference will end, remains to be seen; or supposes it be a great matter whether we never hear or see more about it. If the disputants stand in need of a precedent, we beg to furnish one in the case of the great river match between the Coombes and Clasper crews, for the championship of the Thames; they will find it not unworthy of imitation, either as regards temper or taste, albeit the actors were not of the patrician order. Speaking of the Claspers reminds us that the match between one of that family, and Mr. Harry Carroll, of Liverpool, a noted oarsman, came off on Monday, over a five mile course from Eastham Ferry, on the Mersey. In consequence of the indisposition of the Lancashire champion, the man of coaly Tyne won in a canter—nothing could have been more hollow than it might have been—Clasper, when he took his pull, being some three parts of a mile a-head.

Turning from things afloat to matters ashore, among a multitude of race meetings the earliest in account was the First October at Newmarket. It was the commencement of the autumn series at that place, and put forward some novel features—as all indications of a spirit of improvement are—in the locality. We read the racing telegraph in full work, and also sent lists as heiped the stranger to some knowledge of the actors as well as the performances: the jockeys' names were given in the return lists; were they added, in all instances wherein they are known, to the lists and cards used on the heath, it would be still more useful to the neophyte of the turf. The meeting was better off for weather and company than it deserved. One would have thought that at Newmarket, with its hundreds of high-bred cattle, the finest courses would have been their stables, and rescued the immortal flat from the ignominy of a walk over. Such alas! was not the case; and Wednesday, with its wretched jack-lustre programme, actually had a trace of those "imported conclusions." The Two-year Old Stakes in the First October are rarely of much worth, the principal causes of interest being those which bring together the three-year old stock of the season—generally comprising a sprinkling of favourites for the spring and summer races, sometimes not a few of the memorable nominations. This week, the Grand Duke Michael brought to the post the renowned Ida, and increased his defeat. That he came to the contest in this case free from pull or potion there can be no doubt—his rating as a first-class racehorse is more problematical. Next to the Grand Duke likewise stood the St. Leger, awaiting proof of the versality of the sex. Refraction must either have been out of her form (like Ida?) or Lord Lonsdale's colt—winner of both these events—must be set down as something more than a flash in the pan of the year. He won the Criterion last autumn, beating a very good field (with some queer customers among the starters). The two remaining meetings at Newmarket, during the present month, will of course be far more sporting affairs; albeit the enthusiasm of betting has been a little cooled by the defalcations on the late Doncaster St. Leger. Several hopeless accounts remain from it—and more than one notable Leo gone "to grass" and worse.

We will look forward, however, to the Second October and Houghton weeks, giving a satisfactory "wind-up" to the racing year. Each has its sporting handicap, of which, we shall come to speak presently. The turf season over, we will "to fresh fields;" the routine of our National Sports is certainly not their least charm: rarely does then not the smallest zest. As Dryden sings:—

"For active sports: for pleasing rest—
The best is but in season best."

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—Scarcely members enough, in the early part of the afternoon, to make a house, and an accession, about five o'clock, had so little effect, that not above a round half of the horses enumerated below deserve a quotation. The real favourites were The Baron, Wee Pet, Jenny Wren, Boarding School Miss, General Pollock, and Intrepid, Jenny Wren having decidedly the most numerous party. My Mary and Kentish were also in request. Several bets were laid on the Grand Duke Michael, at 6 to 4 and 5 to 4 against Idas, and, eventually, at evens.

"THE MARMORA," SCREW STEAMER, AT LIVERPOOL.

THE AMERICAN BARK "MARMORA."

Yesterday week, at 1 o'clock, a.m, the American screw-auxuiliary bark Marmora, Captain Page, arrived at Liverpool, after spassage of 23 days] and a half, and bringing some 40 or 50 passengers. The length of the voyage is stated to have arisen from her propeller, which is made of wrought copper, having been struck and so damaged by a heavy sea shortly after leaving New York, as to be rendered not only useless, but also a serious hindrance to her progress. It was bent out of its position, and had to be dragged after her throughout the greater part of the passage.

The Marmora is a neat, light bark, with exceedingly lofty masts. She is fitted with Ericsson's propellers, on nearly the same principle as the screws of the Great Britain, and carries a low-pressure engine, a new invention, by which the consumption of coal is comparatively small. The entire steam fixtures, boilers, engine, coal bins, and all, do not cover a space of more than 16 square feet. A more compact and well arranged engine has never been seen. The main and upper decks have a clear sweep, unencumbered by coal or steam machinery of any description. Her cabins are comfortable and airy, and fitted up with a great deal of taste and neatness, and are capable of accommodating 43 passengers. Her size is registered at 400 tons; she is 24½ feet beam, 10½ feet hold, and 145 feet keel: engine 155 horse-power. She presents a very neat appearance; her riggingis that of a bark, lofty, and exceedingly well trimmed, and capable of carrying her ten knots with a fair wind.

The Marmora, previously to her departure from New York to Liverpool, had made one coasting voyage to New Orleans. She is destined for Constantinople, to be placed under the direction of the Turkish Government, to ply between the above capital and Paris.

Sir Robert Peel in Suffolk.—Sir Robert Peel and his lady have paid a visit to this agricultural county, and were for several days the honoured guests of Sir W. F. F. Middleton, at Shrubland Park. Each of the distinguished visitors expressed the highest admiration of the mansion and beautiful grounds composing Sir William's estate. On Sunday morning Sir Robert Peel and his lady, together with Sir William Middleton and friends, attended Barham Church, when the Rev. W. Kirby officiated—the esteemed and venerable author of the work on Entomology, and one of the Bridgwater Treatises.

Rowing Match on the Mersey.—The scullers' contest for £50 a side, between Henry Clasper, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and Thomas Carrol, of Liverpool, came off last Monday, on the Mersey. The match had created considerable excitement at Liverpool and Newcastle, and partially so in London; and, from the reputation the men had acquired as scullers, a very first-rate contest had been expected. Though both men had been for a length of time in active training, they had each by turns been very unwell. Clasper, however, had recovered by the day of rowing, but his opponent was still suffering much. The distance to be rowed was five miles, and betting, which had stood for some time at two to one on Clasper, was materially increased in odds as the time approached for starting. The start, which took place in the presence of an immense assemblage, was very evenly taken, but immediately afterwards Clasper drew ahead, and went rapidly away from his opponent. In the first two miles Clasper was a third of a mile in advance, and in three miles was half a mile ahead. He then relaxed, and, taking it gently, won by two minutes.

WINNING HORSES AT DONCASTER, 1845.

SWEETMEAT,

The winner of the Piece of Plate at Doncaster, is a dark-brown Colt, three years old, free from white, and not more than fifteen hands and a half high. He is, altogether, a very racing-looking nag, although possessing no peculiar points. His head is neat, and well set on to a light neck; his shoulders are strong, and well inclined back; large fore and back ribs; highwithers; strong back and loins; long quarters; full in the gaskins; good arms, thigh, and hocks, with excellent flat legs, and sound feet. His temper is first-rate; he is a horse likely to train on, and prove himself as great an ornament to the Turf as those justly-celebrated mares, Beeswing and Alice Hawthorn.

The Messrs. Baily, Brothers, of Royal Exchange-buildings, Cornhill, have in the hands of the Engraver, a portrait of Sweetmeat, from the pencil of Mr. Herring, from whom we have procured our sketch; and we predict that the Plate will be a worthy addition to their splendid Publications of celebrated Winning Horses.

MY MARY,

Winner of the great Yorkshire Handicap, at Doncaster, is a chesnut Filly, three years old, with white hind legs, and a star in the forehead

"SWEETMEAT," THE WINNER OF THE DONCASTER PLATE

"MY MARY," WINNER OF THE YORKSHIRE HANDICAP, AT DONCASTER.

She is a small mare, being under fifteen hands; her head is cleanly, with rather a projecting forehead; her ears bend back, at the tips; her neck is light, and very elegantly attached to the head. She is very perfect in all her points, and, for so small an animal, possesses a good share of power. She has a great turn of speed, and, if not too heavily weighted, it must be something out of the common way to beat her.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

CHARLECOMBE CHURCH, NEAR BATH.

This ancient Christian temple is situated at a short distance from Bath, and is generally termed "the mother of the Bath churches." It has a very low embattled square tower, which projects over the principal gable, and is partly supported by rude corbels; the buttresses, also, are of very primitive form: there is a small, low, entrance doorway. The church is much visited, for its antiquity; and in the churchyard is an antique yew-tree, reported to be twelve hundred years old. It is, altogether, a beautifully sequestered "haunt of meditation."

BATTLE CHURCH.—On cleansing and scraping the old wash from the walls of Battle Church, Sussex, previous to their being re-washed, the walls were discovered to be full of paintings, of a very ancient and curious character, some of them very well executed, which appear to have been done during the reign of one of the Edwards, or probably before.

PURCHASE OF THE REGENT'S CANAL FOR A RAILWAY.—A meeting of the Regent's Canal Company was held on Monday at their rooms in the City-road, for the purpose of considering an agreement entered into by the Committee of the Company with the Central Railway Junction Company. The Chairman (Mr. Parker) called on the Secretary to read the terms of the agreement, which was to this effect, that £5000 was to be paid as "caution money," in case the Railway Company did not fill up its lists by the 31st of December; that in the event of their bill passing £500,000 was to be paid to the Canal Company, with another sum of £300,000 to be liquidated in yearly instalments; that, in the event of the bill being defeated on the standing orders, £10,000 was to be paid to the Canal Company; and in case it should be lost on the merits, and that it was intended again to submit it to Parliament, £100,000 should be forfeited to the Canal Company. This agreement was approved of by the vast majority of the proprietors. Seven or eight, however, supported an amendment to the proposal, that the seal of the company should be appended to it, on the ground that the deposit money should be £50,000, instead of £5000. To this suggestion it was answered that the Railway Company proved the bona fides of its undertaking by giving such a sum as £5000 to the proprietors of the Canal Company for the trouble of meeting; that the first payment of £500,000 was equal to the value of the canal property (the shares being now at 25 premium), and that the additional £300,000 was clear gain. The committee of the Canal Company also declared their reliance on the power of the Railway Company to fulfil their engagement in every particular. The meeting concluded by adopting a resolution to the effect that at a future meeting provision should be made for the secretary and servants of the establishment of twenty years' standing. The result will be advantageous to the present shareholders in the canal, for they will receive £40 for each share, although a short time since the shares could been procured as low as £13. The Regent's Canal begins at Paddington and terminates at Blackwall, and we shall consequently have a railway running through the heart of London, and connecting the Great Western, the London and Birmingham, and the Eastern Counties Railways.

STRAND THEATRE.

M. Philippe, the conjuror, whose extraordinary performances during the season of the French plays at the St. James's Theatre, we had more than once occasion to speak of in the highest terms, has taken the Strand Theatre for a series of "Soirées Mystérieuses," and with every apparent chance of making a more successful entrepris therein than any of the preceding lessees. All the principal tricks of his former entertainments are introduced; and some of them are perfectly inexplicable, resulting from the combination of matchless manual dexterity with mechanical contrivances of the greatest ingenuity. We need not recapitulate them; but we can, with the utmost confidence, recommend all our readers to go and behold M. Philippe's very clever delusions. He is certainly the King of Necromancers, leaving even Herr Döbler far behind him. The other "wizards" have been, more or less, imitators of these two masters of their art; and we must own, in all their performances there has been a sameness and conventional routine of deception which has somewhat wearied us. But in this case, everything is novel and startling; and his last strange tour—that of the gold fish and "grande menagerie"—sends everybody away completely bewildered.

SADLER'S WELLS.

The revivals of the olden drama at this theatre, we are happy to say, continue unabatedly attractive. We are not altogether surprised at this success; for, if called upon to write the intellectual topography of the metropolis and its environs we should point to the district in which lies Sadler's Wells, as containing a larger proportion of intelligent population than either of the other suburbs. Islington has been the favoured 'biding-place of men of genius, especially of artists, for many centuries past; and it maintains this literary and artistical reputation to the present day.

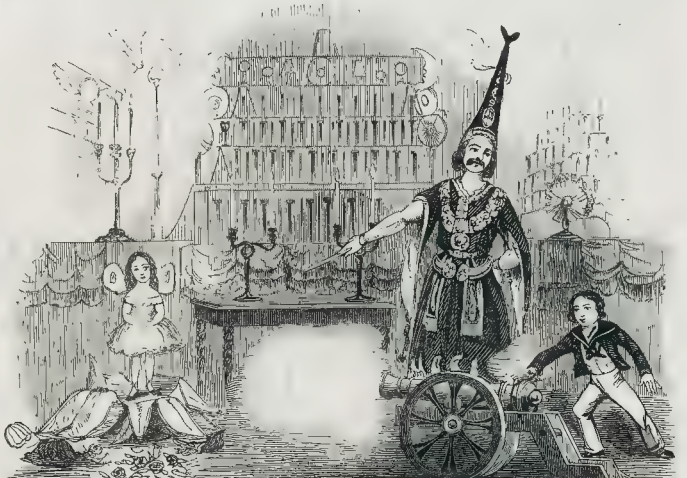
On Monday evening, we found the Shakspearian Sadler's Wells, densely crowded with a most attentive audience to witness the noble play of "Hamlet;" reproduced with that attention to accessories for which this little theatre enjoys well-earned repute. The crowd was so great that the box accommodation was extended by somewhat primitive benches, even to the outermost wall; and it was, indeed, "tragedy in warm weather." Nevertheless, with the exception of a few occasional ebullitions from what Swift termed "the twelvepenny colony," (in our day, the sixpenny,) the multitude were evidently participating of one common amusement, from our old dramatic poet. How truly has Shaftesbury said:—"That piece of his which appears to have most affected English hearts, and has perhaps been oftenest acted of any which have come upon our stage, is almost one continued moral, a series of deep reflections, drawn from one mouth, upon the subject of one single accident and calamity, naturally fitted to move horror and compassion." John Kemble, too, was wont to say:—"Take up any Shakspeare you will, from the first collection of his works to the last, which has been read, and look what play bears the most obvious signs of perusal. My life for it, they will be found in the volume which contains the play of 'Hamlet.'" And every indication of the audience on Monday night supported these positions of the philosopher and the tragedian

Hamlet was, of course, played by Mr. Phelps, in whose natural tones there is so near an approach to the voice of Macready, as to be disadvantageous to the former actor. Nevertheless, Mr. Phelps's performance was, by no means, an imitation: it was sensible and vigorous, occasionally, perhaps, rugged for the polished Dane, and less like a reading than the part itself. It was greatly applauded throughout: the play and closet scenes were tremendously effective; though the recognition of Hamlet's subtle wit was now and then an irreverend laugh. Gertrude was played by Mrs. Warner with her accustomed ability: Mr. G. Bennett personated Claudius with his usual statelliness; and Polonius was not overstepped by Mr. A. Younge. The minor characters were well filled—a point of great importance for the dramatic solemnity of the play. It has been admirably put upon the stage: the architectural scenes have but few improprieties, whilst they are rich in picturesque effects; and some of them would have delighted even the scenic reformer, old John Capon: the play-scene, with the Saxon arch for a proscenium, and the lectern with a copy of the play, was even in advance of the improved taste in such matters; and in the tapestried closet-scene, the Ghost in the King's own proper habiliments, walking out from his presentment, showed nice deference to the critical acumen of Tieck, on the German stage.

The attention to the character of the appointments was minute—even to the antique-shaped spade of the gravemakers, and the garlanded coffin of the crazed maiden. What an improvement is all this upon the mere spreading of the cloth for tragic work at Drury-lane!

Sheridan Knowles's intense play of "Love" has been repeated with increased effect; and, still more creditable to the audiences, Massinger's "Fatal Dowry" maintains its hold upon their affections. This is the play from which Rowe audaciously pirated his "Fair Penitent;" and of other productions of Massinger's master-mind, Warburton made waste-paper!

The Sadler's Wells management, we need scarcely add, merits golden success; since it presents us with the pure ore of the drama, in place of the bombast, and buffoonery, which are metal most attractive at other metropolitan theatres.



MONS. PHILIPPE, AT THE STRAND THEATRE.

EPITOME OF NEWS.—FROM EVERY STATE AND DOMESTIC.

Accounts of the 15th ult., from Florence state that Ibrahim Pacha, who is at the baths of San Guitano, near Pisa, was in a suffering condition. It was thought that he would pass the winter at the baths or at Pisa. The Grand Duke had placed his palace at his disposal.

A slight shock of an earthquake was felt at Florence, at 11 o'clock at night, on the 24th ult.

Intelligence from Constantinople of the 10th ult. announces that the Ottoman Porte had at length granted the firman so long solicited by Sir S. Canning relative to the construction of a Protestant church at Jerusalem.

Prince Talleyrand, who has been seriously ill at his estate at Bavaria, is now fast recovering, and is expected to be soon restored to health.

The German papers announce the death of the venerable Archbishop of Cologne.

The workmen, in repairing the Grand Court of Louis XIV., the Hotel de Ville, at Paris, have discovered two marble slabs, on which are the following inscriptions:—"1660—Interview between Louis XIV., King of France, and Philip of Spain, in the Island of Pheasants, when peace was sworn between the two Kings. Marriage of the King with Maria Theresa of Austria, Infanta of Spain. Solemn entry of their Majesties into the city of Paris amidst the acclamations of the people. Triumph of the Government over the Algerians; punished the Genoese; forced his enemies to accept a truce for twenty years; and, yielding to the prayers of the Spaniards, remitted 2,500,000 livres of taxes.

On Monday the 22nd ult., three earthquakes occurred at Comrie (Scotland); first, about one p.m., next, about twenty minutes afterwards, and the third about twenty minutes to four o'clock p.m., but as they were comparatively slight, they did not give much alarm.

The Queen of Greece arrived at Venice on the 18th ult., where her Majesty was received by her father.

A Berne letter, of Sept. 25, says: "The President of the Communist Club of Berne, who was a simple workman at one of the printing offices, has just been arrested. The club was immediately closed. A formidable coalition of workmen has been formed at Soleure. The members of it are the drawing up a petition against the liberty of manufactures, and against the introduction of foreign manufactured produce."

We learn from Berlin that the Empress of Russia took her departure from that city on the 23rd ult., by the Anhalt railroad. It is said that the route of her Majesty has been so far changed that she will stop for two days in a chateau of Baron de Stockmar. The Queen of Prussia goes on a visit with her, as has been reported. The King of the Netherlands and the Duke of Cambridge were expected at Berlin, where apartments had been prepared for them, and also at Potsdam.

A letter from Athens of the 13th ult., gives an account of the arrival of the Duke de Montpensier in that city on the preceding day. The Duke made but a very short stay in Athens. On the 13th, the day after his arrival, the Prince took an excursion with the King and Queen to Pentelicus. The same letter states that accounts had been received of an attack by 200 rebels on the fortress of Coron, in the Morea. The assailants were however repulsed.

The Constantinople State Gazette publishes the text of the two Hatti-scherifs addressed by the Sultan to the Grand Vizier, notifying the dismissal of Riza Pacha and Saofete Pacha. They are very brief, and make no mention of the causes which led to the disgrace of these functionaries. The Sultan states simply that it had become necessary to deprive them of their offices. The two ex ministers live isolated in their houses on the Bosphorus; but Riza is treated with more indulgence than his late colleague. He is permitted to go to the Mosque, and to take exercise in the country, while Saofete Pacha is closely confined to his house.

A letter from Fernambuco states that the steamer Cacique was being fitted with paddles, instead of her screw, in order to proceed to the coast of Africa for slaves. It was expected that this novel experiment of slaving by steam would soon be imitated by other parties.

The Augsburgh Gazette states that the King of Prussia had commanded the houses of the two reformers, Luther and Melancthon, to be purchased by the State, and converted into museums. In 1504—the 13th of Luther's life—he was ordered the doors of Luther's dwelling, which the French had in a great measure destroyed, to be restored. They will be formed of metal, and richly embellished.

We have received accounts from New Zealand to the 21st of May. It appears that the natives were quiet, and that the inhabitants did not appear to apprehend an attack, though they were very wisely forming block-houses and volunteer corps. The natives still kept possession of the pah at Hutt, which the Government had paid for, and it was expected that advantage would be taken of the presence of military at Wellington to force them away. There had been about 3.0 additional soldiers of the 99th Regiment sent from Sydney.

The Berlin Gazette mentions that serious conflicts had again taken place between the smugglers and the Austrian custom-house officers on the frontier, several of the former of whom had been dangerously wounded, and one killed.

Accounts from Constantinople of the 10th ult. confirm the news of the severe losses of the Russians in the Caucasus, and likewise affirm that no garrison had been left at Dargo.

It results from a document published at Monte Video, that out of the whole number of French subjects who had taken up arms for the defence of the city from June 3, 1843, to June 9, 1845, 135 had been killed or had died of their wounds. The total number of wounded was 431. Besides, 642 Frenchmen had been received in the hospital since the 23rd of May. There remained, when the table was published, 21 wounded men in the hospital, and 84 other patients.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—The arrivals of English wheat for our market since Monday have been on a very moderate scale, but those for the supplies of most foreign articles have been to-day was by no means extensive. However, as the attendance of buyers was comparatively small, the demand for grain of all descriptions ruled very heavy, at a decline in the quotations of Monday's currency, but all o her kinds could not be sold, except at a slight depression to value. Very little free foreign wheat was on offer, yet it was fully equal to meet the wants of the buyers. In all descriptions very little was doing at barely late rates. The demand for bonded grain for export to Holland having ceased scarcely a transaction took place, and prices were almost nominal. In fine barley nothing was doing at market. Grinding and distilling sorts were without alteration. We had only a retail trade for malt, but, as very little was on offer, the currency remained unaltered. In oats a fair demand for all average quantity of oats has reached us this week from Ireland, yet the trade was steady, and the quotations were well supported. In beans nothing was doing, and the currencies had a downward tendency. Maple and grey peas were dull, and cheaper to sell. In flour no sales reported.

Dutch butter firm, at 108s to 110s for the best Friesland. Bacon has been quiet to a fair extent, at 52s to 54s per cwt. Hams 60s to 68s per cwt. Lard, 48s to 50s for prime. Hams are commanding full prices, while lard has been to 46s to 50s for prime bladdered. In other kinds of provisions there is no notice of material change.

Hay and Straw.—Coarse meadow hay, 65s to 75s; seconds, 80s to 85s; fine upland ditto, 85s to 95s; ditto, 100s to 105s; clover hay, 95s to 98s; oat straw, 45s to 50s; wheat straw, 45s to 48s per load. Trade good; new meadow hay, 75s to 80s; and new clover, 95s to 98s.

Oils.—Linseed is very dull, and the turn lower. In other descriptions, we can report no alteration.

Tallow.—Town tallow is in fair request at 41s. Russia is steady, at 41s 3d to 41s 6d on the spot; for forward delivery, a few rates are asked. The shipments at St. Petersburgh up to the 8th of Sept. were 21,000 pieces, against 20,000 at the same time last year.

Seeds (Friday).—Brodbent's West Hartley, 18s 6d; Holywell Main, 18s 6d. Old Pontop, 14s. 6d. Cox's Eastbourn, 14s 6d; South Pontop, 18s; Tanfield Moor, 16s 6d. Bewicke and Co., 17s 6d: Hawell, 18s 9d. and Stewart's, 18s 9d per ton.

Hops (Friday).—During the present week several parcels of new hops have arrived hither from Kent and Sussex; yet the demand has ruled firm, and prices are still supported. Picking is now very general; but the accounts relative to the produce are by no means favourable. The duty is called at 56,000 to 60,000 cwt. In pressing and old hops, comparatively little is doing.—New Sussex pockets, 40s to to 42 Os; New Kent ditto, 46s 10s to 47 Os.

Wool.—Owing to the approaching sales—at which will be offered upwards of 30,000 bales—very little is doing in the private contract market, at late rates.

Potatoes.—The supplies of potatoes being large, the demand is inactive, at from 40s 10s to 45s per ton.

Smithfield (Friday).—In to-day's market the supply of beasts was reasonably good as to numbers, but very deficient in quality. Owing to the unfavourable state of the weather for slaughtering, the beef trade was extremely dull, at barely stationary prices. The supply of foreign stock consisted of only 50 beasts, and 20 sheep. The numbers of sheep were small, yet the sale for them was heavy, at late rates. For veals, the inquiry was moderate, at a decline in the quotations of 2d per 8.lbs. In pigs, a fair business was transacted. Milch cows moved off slow, at from 2Ols to 40l each.

Per 8lb., to sink the offals.—Coarse and inferior beasts, 3s 4d to 3s 8d.; second quality ditto, 3s 10d to 4s; prime large oxen, 4s 2d to 4s 4d; prime Scots, &c., 3s 8d to 4s 2d.; coarse and inferior sheep, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; second quality ditto, 3s 8d to 4s 0d, prime coarse woolled ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 4d.; prime South Down ditto, 4s 6d to 4s 8d; large coarse calves, 3s 8d to 4s 4d; prime small ditto, 4s 8d to 4s 8d; large hogs, 3s 8d to 4s 4d, neat small porkers, 4s 6d to 4s 8d. Suckling calves, 18s to 24s; quarter old store pigs, 22s to 32s each. Beasts, 2,415; cows, 101; sheep, 5300; calves, 263; pigs, 310.

Newgate and Leadenhall (Friday).—We had a very inactive demand here to-day, and prices were with difficulty supported:—

Per 8lb., by the carcase.—Inferior beef, —s to 2s 6d., middling ditto, 2s 8d to 2s 10d.; prime large ditto, 3s 0d to 3s 2d.; prime small ditto, 3s 4d to —6d.; large pork, 2s 4d to 4s 6d.; inferior mutton, 3s 4d to 3s 10d.; middling ditto, 4s 0d to 4s 2d.; prime ditto, 4s 4d to 4s 6d.; veal, 3s 8d to 4s 8d.; small pork, 4s 8d to 5s 6d.

MARK LANE.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

The English Market was heavy at the commencement of the week, Consols, on Monday, quoting only 97⅞ for money. Large sales of Money Stock rapidly following each other (by some attributed to the demands for Bull way investments, and others to the necessities of the Bank, whose coffers were full of Stock, and the heaviness of the market continued until Wednesday, when more firmness was perceptible. As the week advanced, Consols improved, and the closing prices of the Stock Exchange were 98⅛ for money. We have not varied materially, closing at 47 prem. India Stock is 266; and India Bonds, 6s prem.

The Foreign market generally continues dull, and the few actual sales have been nearly all for the fall. Dutch, Portuguese, and Mexican Stock have declined, most Spanish partaking in the depression. Mexican has fluctuated between 32¼ to 3 and 32⅜. Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents., have declined 3/8 and 6o, closing at the former quotation. Spanish Actives, between 26⅝ and 26⅛; the Three per Cents., 28 to ⅜, and 28, which prices are the last quoted. Portuguese Five per Cents. are 87½; and Brazilian 87⅜, ex Dividend.

The absorbing occupation of the week in the Share market has been the settling, which can yet be scarcely said to have terminated. The multitude of new schemes daily springing into life, and the impossibility of money finds its way into the market, makes the settling day almost overwhelming. To lessen in some measure the labours of the fortnight's account, particular days are agreed upon for signing Deeds on those Scrips which have been largely dealt in. Money has fetched enormous rates, and although the account may be considered to have on the whole satisfactorily adjusted, it cannot be concealed that a large number of speculators have left a very succeeding settling. Eastern Counties have been done at 23, in consequence of a report that Mr. Hudson will accept the office of Chairman. Among the new lines which have been brought out this week, the Dees and Dublin Company have concluded a treaty with the Norfolk Company to join that line at Thetford, and favourable negociations are pending with the Eastern Counties directors. The Great Northern and the Sussex are also delivering finds its way into the market, makes the settling day almost overwhelming. SATURDAY MORNING.—The Consol Market was rather flat yesterday, with an unconsiderable amount of business at present, however, there is more firmness, and money is pretty plentiful. Consols for the Account are at 98 to 98⅜, and for Transfer 98⅜. There is no alteration in the value of Exchequer Bills. The foreign Bond mail were more in request. The Portuguese Converted Stock was firm. Spanish and the other Bonds have varied but a little. The Railway Shares were very firm. Manchester and Southamptons (Wheeler's Lane) were brought into the market, and deal in at 4¼ to 5⅛ pm.

PARLIAMENTARY AGENTS.—Messrs Richardson and Connell, Finsbury-circus, Westminster LOCAL AGENTS—William Lawrence, Esq., Peterborough; Messrs. Johnson, Stanton, and Key, Peterborough.

This Line will pass from Holbeach to Peterborough, in the most direct practical route, a distance of about 20 miles, accommodating Fowlmere, a county town, and the Great Northern Railway accommodation. The country is almost a perfect level, and does not present the slightest engineering difficulty. The land is of the best description, and the Standing Orders of the House of Lords not to be departed from without the consent of the parties interested.
Holbeach, and the Parish of Holbeach—which is the largest parish in England—and the other towns enumerated, are situated in a rich marsh land, the most productive in the whole Kingdom, and communication between the Towns and Peterborough is now very imperfect, and every variety of farm produce is most abundant. All that is required to nearly double in value every acre of this beautiful country, is an easy and cheap transit for the produce to the commercial districts. The Line of Railway now proposed will ensure it this desirable object, and it will be conveniently accessible to the inhabitants, as the nearest point to the Railway is but little upwards of a mile from the Town.
This Railway will give facilities for immediate transit to the NORTH and SOUTH by the Great Northern Railway; to the EAST, by the Peterborough and Wisbeach Railway; to the SOUTH, by the London and York railway, and to the WEST, by the Peterborough and Blisworth Railway, and various other Railways.
This the great seats of manufacture, and the Metropolis—in short, any part of the King dom can be cheaply and quickly reached, affording great facilities to produce a choice of markets.
By means of this Railway, Fat Stock, which now requires many days to reach London, to the injury of the meat, will be brought to the Metropolis in a few hours, in fresh and healthful condition.
To the above means of traffic, may be added a large and important trade in Fish, between the sea coast and the populous Inland Districts, when the means of communication are established; and Rain being caught in large quantities on the whole East Coast, and sold at 1 penny, to the supply of food the Railway will give the immediate command of London at many pence. There are many other important results which may be anticipated from the Railway, but all minor ones are overlooked in the magnificent Trade and Revenue which the opening of the Line will produce.
Power is intended to be reserved in the Act to allow 4 per cent interest upon deposits, until the completion of the Line. No Interest can in any case be paid until the Act of Parliament is obtained, and the further term will not be allowed on any shares.
Ladies are now proposing, when they are desirous to contract a descent of the Passengers and all other Traffic on the Line; they will appear in an enclosed Prospectus

As extensive returns traffic arises from the line, Coals, which at present are extremely expensive in the Fen Districts, as the nearest point to the Railway is 12 miles distant, will be carried at a greatly reduced price. Lime, Cement, Mercantile articles, and all other requirements of a farming district, will also be conveyed upon the Railway, the distance, although but an average point as the manufacturing portions of the Kingdom, yet contains a large number who would find it highly advantageous to have the means of transit afforded to them.
The line proposed has met with the decided support of the land owners and occupiers, to whom it is intended to be of the greatest benefit, and the Provisional Committee are now being aware of the importance to have with them the support of the landowners, is peculiarly anxious their co-operation and personal support in the undertaking.

EXTRACT FROM THE SURVEYOR'S REPORT

"Agreeably to directions communicated to me, I proceeded on the 23rd ult. into the country from Peterborough to Holbeach, and have since taken the level of the country, the initial point of commencing at the Peterborough Railroad, on the east end of the River Nene, which river it would be necessary to cross by a bridge, on the east side of the present Peterborough Bridge, passing from thence by Eastrea, Oxney, and Eye Way, to the town of Eye, from thence by Peterborough Fen to Crowland Bridge, and from thence to Holbeach, the whole line pursued by Crowland. The country between Crowland and Peterborough looks very favourable for the purpose, there being a valley at about a quarter of a mile to the east side of the road, and there are not above three drains in this length that would require bridges with about twenty feet waterway. From Crowland to Lone road cross St. James's Deeping line, through Great Postand, by St. Guthlake's Cross Lodge, to Moulton Basket Hall Inn, by Moulton Chapel, across Moulton Bank, by Four Turns Bridge, and Sea Bank, to Wingland's Sluice, at Fen Gate and Blackbeach Fen to Holbeach and from thence by Market Hall and Holbeach Clough bank to near Plant Hill and Petwood bridge, at the road to Boston and Moulton Sluice, down by a New Fen to the New Channel of the River Welland. The windiest this part of the country between Lincoln and Holbeach, and, to say the least, is of the most favourable description of a railway. The present distance from Holbeach by the road to Peterborough is 20 miles, but from Crowland to Peterborough Railroad, ten miles, or twenty-six miles. By the proposed railway, it would be but twenty miles from Peterborough to Holbeach and from thence to the Improved Channel of the Welland, at two miles below Fosdyke Bridge, or Gulf Hall, about the same, leaving a total distance from Peterborough to the improved Channel of the Welland, twenty-five miles; and, by making a branch line, which here no resident of any consequence, it might be adopted and direct to the Gulf to Holbeach might be continued to Fosdyke Bridge—of course, from the line of Peterborough to be about twenty-four miles.
I am Line, in connection with the Peterborough and Wisbeach Branch of the London and Birmingham Railway, unless Nottingham will be the nearest line from Holbeach.
It has been determined by the Promoters of this Line not at present to carry the Railway to the Sea, but to await the result of Parliament, with regard to several proposed Lines which will, if carried into effect, serve the purpose of the branch to the Sea and to the Sea. Therefore, I am therefore, late the opinion of the Railway remaining the terminus of the Line at or near Sea.
On account of the limited number of Shares in this undertaking, no applications will be attended to, as the Line remains open for transit, or accompanied with the deposit, as the Provisional Committee will be published in a few days. Applications for Shares and Communications to be addressed to the solicitors, 7, South-square, Gray's inn.

NEW RADNOR CHURCH.

The Consecration of this new Church took place on July 31; and the day will long be remembered by the inhabitants of New Radnor as a scene of high gratification. The ceremony was performed by the Lord Bishop of the diocese, assisted by the Very Rev the Dean, Rural, and Clergy. The service was interspersed with some of the most devotional and impressive compositions of church music, by the members of the Hereford Cat edral choir, and the truly organist; the Bishop kindly preached a sermon on the occasion, and there was a large collection made towards the cost of the building at the church doors. The hospitable mansions of Downton and Harpton, were kindly open to visitors; and it was a day of great festivity through out the borough of Radnor.
The church is beautifully situated on the Castle Hill. It may be interesting to the antiquary and the historian, that the vicinity of New Radnor is rich with subjects for the antiquary and historian. The borough itself boasts of its ancient Corporation; and, in the person of its revered representative, Richard Price, Esq., is justly proud of one who is within three degrees of being the Father of the House of Commons. Many a hill around is distinguished by its British or Roman camp or ancient beacon; and its fertile valleys teem with Druidical Remains, Cromlechs, and Rocking Stones. Here, in 1402, when all left a common prey to Owen Glendwr, who, after their capture, beheaded the survivors of the garrison on Castle Hill. The greater part, at least, of the church, whose ruined state has led to the recent church rebuilding, was built after that destruction; but the city walls and castle were never restored, and are only to be seen in their sites and grass grown mounds. Their Saxon origin is still to be traced in the pure dialect of the pas ora inhabitants; and their entire freedom from the language and customs of Wales, though mapped within the principality. In the late work of rebuilding the church, proofs of the sad story of the garrison were found in a mass of human bones in one spot; in another, of a corresponding collection of skulls only. In more modern history, many a house, and lane, and field, mark the wanderings in August, 1645, amongst this humble but ever faithful people of the Monarch who was soon to die a martyr to that pure Christian faith so beautifully evidenced in his own writings; when traitors, though of the most opposite opinions amongst themselves, yet made common cause against the religion and person of their anointed King.

Few structures of modern date have greater claims upon pious liberality than the church at New Radnor: it does great credit to the original design, as well as to the contractor, Mr. Follett, who has evinced a spirit and liberality, which have greatly conduced to the beauty and stability of the structure. The stone was given by the Right Hon. T. F. Lewis, in addition to the very liberal contributions of himself and family. A handsome and sweet-toned finger organ has been added by the lady of Sir William Cockburn; and the three painted windows of the Chancel, the encaustic tiles of the floor, the tasteful and appropriate decorations of its three sides, as well as the elegant cover of the font, and several of the shields in front of the Gallery, are the gift of the Rector, in addition to his previous liberal pecuniary donation. Nor were the observances of the sanctuary the only features of this day of note—the poor were not forgotten. About 100 cottagers were supplied with roast beef and plum-pudding by the Rector, whilst an equal number of children of the Sunday and day schools were also regaled in the same school room by the wonted kindness of Sir W. and Lady Cockburn; and the workmen employed in the erection of the church, dined at the King's Arms, through the kindness of Mr. and Mrs. Frankland Lewis.

The new church, the subject of this notice, on account both of its pure Early English style of architecture, and of its interior arrangements, is worthy to be a model for imitation; and, although of smaller general dimensions than the last structure, yet, by its admirable adaptation for the purpose, it supplies one hundred more free sittings. In consideration of the small means of the parishioners generally, they have been only called upon to raise £500 by the rates; whilst voluntary contributions have been in the course of subscription for the remainder of the cost of the building, amounting to above £1400, of which, notwithstanding the signal liberality already experienced, and for which the parishioners can never be sufficiently grateful, about £70 are still deficient; besides, no provision being yet made, either for a clock or for bells, contributions towards which will be thankfully received by Mr. J. Young, the Churchwarden. May those who are rich in this world's goods, aid in this work to the glory of the Most High, and the good of their fellow men!

ROYAL AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY OF IRELAND.—MEETING AT BALLINASLOE.

The Committee of the above body having, with considerable judgment, selected, as the scene of their third annual show, at a time just antecedent to the great fair, which is one of the largest in Europe, Ballinasloe, usually crowded as it is at this period, has never hitherto witnessed such an influx of visitors, or such bustle or excitement.

The preparations for the show and its attendant festivities are on a scale of great magnitude. Six acres have been taken off the ample proportions of the fair-green and enclosed with comfortable sheds and stalls for the bloated beasts which agricultural societies delight to honour, whilst the central space is reserved for novel farming implements, with all their intricacy of cog wheel, tooth, and rack. A handsome show-house has also been erected for the exhibition of grasses, seeds, flax, useful plants, and esculents. Bordering on one side of this enclosure stands the new Agricultural-hall—a vast building of cut stone, just completed for the occasion, and finished in a style of great comfort, solidity, and good taste. Exclusively of other apartments—kitchens, boiler house, &c., it contains a magnificent room, 150 feet long, by 70 feet wide, extremely lofty, which is the intended scene of feasting and banqueting.

A great number of fat cattle have been carted into the town, and have been arranged in stalls by the judges. The proceedings may be said to have commenced on Monday, by Professor Kane delivering the first of a series of lectures on Agricultural Chemistry.

Our sketch shows the ordinary aspect of the town, lying on the west side of the river Suck, a tributary to the Shannon. Though a small place, it is one of the most prosperous towns in the county of Galway. Its celebrated wool-fair is held on the 12th of July. The great cattle market is held from the 5th to the 9th of October. At the commencement of the present century, the number of oxen annually sold at this fair, was 10,000; and of sheep, 100,000.

Ballinasloe is a handsome town, and is singularly neat and clean, owing to the constant solicitude of the noble owner, Viscount Dunlo. The streets are paved, the houses well kept, and the cottages neatly thatched and whitewashed. The church is an elegant stone structure, and the market-place, (which is engraved), much resembles that of an English town: would that such scenes were less rare in Ireland.

To Correspondents.—"Rusticus."—The following position serves to exhibit the power of the Queen very strongly. Place the men thus. White King at Q B 3rd, Q at her K1 square, Black King at his K2 square. Here White, having to play, is to mate in twelve moves, without moving his King. There is a problem of the description alludes to by Brede, the denouement of which is ludicrous enough. You must dispose the pieces as follows: White—K at his square, Q at K Kt 7th, R at K Kt square, R at Q B square, B at K 7th, B at Q 7th, Kt at K B 7th, Kt at Q Kt 4th, Pawns at K B 2nd, K 2nd and Q 2nd. Black—K at his B 5th, Kt at K R 6th, Kt at Q Kt 4th, Pawns at K B 3rd, 4th, and 5th, Q 5th, Q B 2nd, 3rd, 4th, and 5th. White now engages to compel his adversary to capture all his Pawns and pieces except a Knight, with which he mates the Black King at his seventeenth move. We purpose giving the solution of this very amusing position in our next.

"Juvenile."—There are problems of even two moves, which an inexperienced player would find difficult to solve from the diagram alone. Try that of Brede's. White—K at his B 2nd, Q at K B 5th, B at K B square, and Kt at K B 6th. Black—K at Q 5th, P at Q B 2nd: White to mate in two moves. Or thus from Mr. K. A. Brown's collection: White—K at Q 7th, R at K R 6th, B at Q B 4th and 5th. Pawns at K Kt 5th and K 4th. Black—K at his Kt 3rd, P at K 4th: White mates in two moves

"J. M." is in error; the Liverpool Chess Club outnumbers any other provincial club in the kingdom.

"R. C.," Oxford.—In the Indian problem, Mate must be given on White's fourth move: your solution is, consequently, erroneous. Tomlinson's little work, "Amusements in Chess," is an instructive little manual for learners.

Game No. 24.

THE PION COIFFE.

The following specimen of this remarkable game was played some time ago, between the Hon. Mr. T— and Mr. Staunton. It is, as far as we know, the only one at these peculiar odds which has ever been printed.

In this game Mr. Staunton, White, places a ring or a cap (from whence the term Pion Coiffé) on his K Kt Pawn, and undertakes to Checkmate his adversary with that Pawn. The reader unacquainted with games of this description, may form some idea of the difficulty of mating with a particular Pawn, when told that the Pawn in question is never allowed to be made a Queen or other piece, but must effect the Mate as a Pawn only—that if the adversary (Black) by skill or the sacrifice of his pieces, can win the said Pawn, the game is his. In like manner, if he can compel White to give Checkmate with any other piece or Pawn, or can himself, while White is intent upon the preservation of the all-important Pawn, Checkmate him—he of course wins the game.

Before playing the game over, a thimble or some distinguishing mark should be put on the K Kt's Pawn of White.

† He feared to attack the Kt with his B's Pawn, on account of the check with White's Q at K B's fifth.

‡ This Pawn was thrown forward as a lure—Black thinking that if his adversary took it, by playing the Q to K Kt fourth, he should presently win the Kt.

‖ If White, instead of this move, had played his K Kt to B's third, Black would have left the Queen en prise, and won the game off-hand by moving his Q B to K B's sixth.

¶ He would clearly have lost his Queen by taking the Kt.

 If Black had checked with his Queen on either of his last two moves, White would have interposed the Queen, in hopes to effect an exchange, and to do so would willingly have left his Kt to be taken. Black now threatens to win the Pawn immediately by moving his Queen to K R's sixth, next move.

ANNEXATION.

The last accounts from America prove, what many readers of the signs of the times have long foretold, that the Anglo-Saxon race of the northern portion of that continent are destined to become the lords and rulers of the whole of it. The laws that govern the political existence of States are as invariable as those of the material world. Corruption and decay cannot endure; they are but the process necessary to be gone through before another condition of existence is attained. Utter confusion and anarchy, the weakness of a State, so sunk in ignorance and sloth, as no longer to produce men capable of commanding others, is equally abhorrent to the feelings of mankind. They know the evil, though they cannot remedy it, and, to escape from the uncertainties and miseries of a condition in which there is neither rule, head, nor order, they will accept almost any form of authority, provided it possesses the great and important element of government—power. So far from the truth are the dreams of some enthusiasts of human liberty, that the great necessity of man is a bond of strength within which society can exist and act; the destruction of the old forms of that compact is inevitable, when they become worn out, effete, or unsuited to the character of the age; but they must be replaced by new ones of equal efficacy; and so imperious is the necessity, that in all history we cannot find an instance of permanent suspension of all government, or ruling energy—not even among savages, whose condition the perversions of poetry and philosophy have represented as the most perfect of all. On the contrary, history is full of examples of one form of government decaying, and another rising from it, as strong and vigorous as its predecessor was weak and powerless.

When nations have not the internal vigour to effect these changes within themselves, and are falling deeper and deeper into decrepitude and degradation, they become subjected to the nearest and strongest State. National pride survives national power, and foreign rule is often detested, even while it is obeyed; but the murmur is useless; it is the penalty of weakness and incapacity in men and kingdoms that they must obey those who have the power and ability to direct them. This is the principle at the bottom of the question of "Annexation," an extensive development of which we must evidently be prepared for.

The process was anciently called "Conquest," but modes of acquisition vary with times and circumstances. The old and barbarous plan of openly seizing a territory by the strong hand, even when as well peopled, and, perhaps, as wisely governed, as the invading State, has been generally abandoned: it was dangerous, and often led to hard knocks and small profits. The experiment is now mostly tried by civilised countries on what they call barbarians; thus France has "annexed" Algeria to her dominions, and talks of doing the same with Madagascar. The whole of our Anglo-Indian empire is the product of gradual "Annexation," sometimes receiving a temporary check, as in Affghanistan, but on the whole constantly progressing, and even depending on that progress for existence. We should bear this in mind when we feel disposed to censure what we call the avidity of our American kinsmen in the "Annexation" of Texas to their territory. There is not an argument we use against them we have not wholly disregarded in our own case; they have not taken a step which may not be paralleled by many in our own history.

With respect to this Annexation of Texas, of which so much has been said, we cannot see why England should wish to prevent it, nor how she could have prevented it, had she entertained the desire. Formerly belonging to Mexico, but peopled (where inhabited at all) from the Northern States, it declared itself independent of the imbecility of the Mexican Government, which has utterly ruined its own fine territory, and has now neither authority, credit, nor respect. The settlers in Texas were all Americans, and to share in the advantages of the only settled government of the continent they wished to become a part of the United States. Inasmuch as the Union places the coasts and harbours of the country in the hands of an active, enterprising, and commercial people, Europe at large will gain by it; in the hands of Mexico it would remain a desert. The world progresses, and the spirit that animates it will not permit any State to arrogate to itself rights over a territory it can neither colonise, cultivate, nor defend; it must do and act, or yield to those who can.

If this should seem to partake too much of the "good old rule," and the doctrine that might makes right, it may be observed that the "annexing" principle is in very active operation in other parts of the world with which we ourselves are intimately connected. The Americans have as complete a justification of their policy provided for them in our proceedings in India, as they could desire. The last Indian mail states that we are about to assemble an army on the banks of the Sutledj; for what purpose is not doubtful; we never assemble an army in India but for one end—conquest; or, as we may better call it in connection with our present theme, Annexation. And how do we defend this policy? On the simple ground of political necessity. Within the past week, one of our ablest political writers has thus stated this necessity:—"A State which cannot govern itself must be governed by its neighbours—for the interests of humanity are at stake. Without an efficient Government, a territory soon becomes a public nuisance, the harbour of disaffection and outrage, the focus of intrigue, the nursery of revolution and war. It is enough that a territory is in so disorderly a condition as to entail on its neighbours the necessity of continual, inconvenient, and expensive precautions. It is enough that it involves a more oppressive police, a larger standing army, or any other interference with the liberties and immunities of peace. Such is the state of all that region enclosed within the Upper Indus and its tributaries. Bloody revolutions, an insolent and rebellious soldiery, a ruined and distracted people, keep Northern India in perpetual alarm. Self-preservation compels the neighbours to abate the nuisance. Such is the necessity, if not the duty, which now devolves on that Great Power which Providence has made the centre and source of order to the whole Peninsula." Nearly the whole of this will apply as well to the Government of Mexico, as to that of the Punjaub; "bloody revolutions, an insolent and rebellious soldiery, a ruined and distracted people,"—all the elements of disorder are in full play in Mexico. Such a Government by the side of the powerful and still growing Republic of the North, cannot stand. "Annexation" is destined to have a much wider range than the state of Texas; will it spare Mexico itself? It is a question to which the answer lies, as yet, far in the future; but events seem to denote the extension of the race of the North—the descendants of Saxon blood—over the whole Continent; and this will be the result not of policy or calculation, but of necessity. Mexico is about five times the size of France, with no more than half the population of England; the Government is without authority, arms, or credit, for the Treasury is bankrupt, the army unclothed, unfed, unpaid, and in a state of revolt. Frequent revolutions and changes of rulers are the symptoms of public uneasiness, as the restlessness of the patient indicates the inward disease, but the changes bring no relief. So desperate are affairs, that men can scarcely be found who will accept public office. Such a Government can neither defend its territory without, nor improve it within. What wonder is it to find it falling to ruin, though not a hundredth part of its great capabilities have ever been developed? The Annexation of Texas is regarded with apathy; not even the appearance of resistance is made to it. A squadron of ten ships in the Gulf of Mexico, and two thousand men landed in Texas, prove into whose hands power has passed. So that a passage in the last Mexican mail seems to point out probably enough the future course of events: "Unless a miracle takes place, in half a century Mexico must become a portion of the American Union. It is already breaking up at the extremities. Tobasco and Yucatan furnish no supplies to the Central Government; Texas has gone, California is meditating revolt, and New Mexico and other northern states are speaking also of Annexation. Is it possible for 7,000,000 of inhabitants, 4,000,000 of whom are Indians, to resist the encroachments of the Anglo-Saxons? Must not the red skin give way before the white? Has not the north in all cases overrun the south? The American President Jefferson asserted sixty years ago that, in the natural course of events, the American Union must extend to the Isthmus of Panama. The Union is daily occupied in working out that prophecy, and I see no means of preventing its accomplishment."

The diplomacy of Europe will not be able to prevent this consummation; which, looking at the disastrous consequences which have everywhere attended the rule of the Spaniards, will hardly be considered a calamity by the world at large. Such interference may bolster up a decaying empire where it is in contact with the other powers of Europe: their mutual jealousy renders a seizure of the prey difficult. Thus protected, the empire of Turkey still stands erect, though rotten and decayed; Russia would seize it, but that she is held in check by England and France. When what are called the Great Powers can agree in a division of the spoil, that they show very little regard to national rights—the partition of Poland by Russia, Austria, and Prussia is a proof. The interests of Europe with Mexico and the United States are those of commerce and trade, and these will be better served by the diffusion of the northern race. The great territorial possessions of England are to the north of the St. Lawrence, and do not interfere; with so rich a region as Texas and Mexico available, American enterprise will hardly seek the cold and barren wastes of the Oregon. It is evident that the possession of that vast tract stretching from the southern boundary of the Union to the Isthmus of Panama, will be the prize of the most energetic; and as no third party could interfere to prop up the weakness of Mexico, except at a most enormous expense, the issue of the contest is by no means doubtful. Whether this spreading of the American people over such an immense surface may not weaken the power of a Government which already needs concentration rather than expansion, is another question; but the defect is one which remedies itself—space remaining fixed, and numbers always increasing. But such being the tendency of things on the other side of the Atlantic, it becomes us to look into the real nature of "Annexation," and not to be frightened into paroxysms of passion whenever it is named, as if its only meaning was that of robbery committed on ourselves. The decay of weak, bigotted, and ignorant nations, ought rather to remind us of the only terms on which power is held, either by States or individuals—that of pre-eminence in knowledge, justice, and general utility. The curse pronounced against the tree that only "cumbereth the ground," is never suspended; the ignorance and misrule of Mexico would, if long continued, make England the "Annexed" of some wiser and stronger Power, whose legions might be encamped on her fields, as once were those of the Roman. The Romans themselves fell before the race of the North, when strength and wisdom deserted them. Decay is the penalty of nations; and in whatever shape it falls upon Mexico, it is difficult to say that it has not been deserved.

ARRIVAL OF M. THIERS IN LONDON.

The arrival of M. Thiers in the metropolis has been expected with considerable interest, at Mivart's Hotel, in Brook-street, where Madame Thiers and family have been sojourning for some days. Upon inquiry at the hotel on Thursday evening, we were obligingly informed that information had just been received of M. Thiers having landed on that day at Southampton, and we subsequently learned that he arrived at ten o'clock, in excellent health and spirits.

The present is, therefore, an interesting opportunity for introducing to our readers a portrait of the distinguished Visitor, engraved from a highly-finished plate by Robinson. A Memoir of the late Prime Minister of France and Historien will be found in No. 91 of our Journal; since which M. Thiers has created great attention by the commencement of the publication of his "History of the Consulate and the Empire of France under Napoleon;" an excellent translation of which, by Mr. Duncan Forbes Campbell, (the only authorised edition), is now in course of issue.

A Cadiz Journal announces the arrival of M. Thiers in that city, and states that he was about to embark for England. At Seville, on his way to Cadiz, M. Thiers was serenaded by the orchestra of the theatre, and several other musicians, who had been engaged for that purpose by some of the French residents. M. Thiers made his appearance at the balcony of the hotel to thank the performers and his fellow-countrymen, and was much cheered by them.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Wednesday.

The various journals are in a state of rabid litigation relative to the right to certain feuilletons written by Alexander Dumas and his host of collaborateurs. The Siècle some months ago, for the space, that by a treaty entered into with Alexander Dumas, in the feuilleton would appear after a no ; that "Le Vicomte de Bragelone," the continuation of the "Trois Mousquetaires," "Fabien," and "Une Année Orageuse," and that besides, by a treaty dated last August, it had acquired the exclusive right to reprint the complete works of Dumas—romances, impressions of travel, theatres, &c.; that they should commence with the first part of "Monte Cristo," which the Journal des Débats was now publishing the second portion of. This announcement gave instant rise to a lawsuit. It appears, beyond contestation, that the prolific author had entered into a contract with the Constitutionnel and the Presse, which interdicts him during the term of five years from producing more than eighteen volumes of romances per annum; nine volumes of which to appear in the Constitutionnel, and nine volumes to appear in the Presse. By this treaty, the single right that is reserved to Dumas is to publish them when completed at one publishing establishment. For these works, in feuilletons, he has been paid 315,000 francs. It is quite plain that if two journals have paid this enormous sum for copyright, that the wholesale piracy of other journals should be stopped by the iron hand of the law. A rather bold task for Alexander Dumas to bind himself to the production of upwards of ninety volumes in five years!

A solemn réunion, for the distribution of the prizes, at the Académie Royale of the Fine Arts, took place on Saturday, a brilliant assembly upon any similar occasion. The ladies literally crammed every place, even those reserved for the members of the "Institut." All the musical, artistical, and scientific notorieties were present. Halévy presided. The séance commenced with an instrumental piece, composed by M. Maillard, a pensioner of the French Academy at Rome, since 1841, at which epoch he had assumed the grand prize. The overture was immensely applauded. The first portion of the work is infinitely superior to the last, which I thought was a "lame and impotent conclusion."

Young Hebert, of whose charming copy of the "Sybil of Delphos" I wrote to you in a former letter, has been disabled from pursuing his labours, by a serious accident—he has had the misfortune to break his leg at Florence. The distribution of crowns was attended with its accustomed theatrical pomp. The mothers, sisters, aunts, and cousins of the fortunate recipients were in a state of irrepressible delight. It is an unique circumstance that two brothers should be crowned the same year; this, however, has been the case with MM. Benouville. Besides these, the two laureats for historical painting, M. F. L. Benouville and M. Cabanal, whose works are really remarkable, were received with a triple salvo of applause; and, at last, when the grand musician, Ortolan, received the crown, he went immediately and made his homage to the widow of Berton, from whom he originally received misfortune.

This really interesting séance terminated with the execution of a piece of music, that secured the second prize to M. Ortolan. By the foundation of an annual prize, resulting from the will of the late M. Deschamps, it has been established for poetry for the lyric drama. It was decided that a medal, value 500 francs, should be the prize of the successful poem. M. Viellard, the author of a cantata, called "Imogine," was the victor. It was this cantata that M. Ortolan had set to music, and which was executed by a grand orchestra, and sung by Mdlle. Nau, M. Mocker, the tenor of the Opera Comique, and M. Bremond, scientific baritone singer of brilliant reputation.

There is one species of gambling of which the French have not the most remote idea—that connected with the turf; making a book, or betting, is to them pure Phenician; but that sport, as far as it goes, is pure sport—a lottery is unknown to them—and, to all the mysteries of jockeyhood, they are as innocent as new born babes. At the Chantilly Races, which have just come off, it was wonderful to listen to their babbling of horseflesh: the best portion of the affair was the fine weather and the dresses of the ladies. I append the results of the various starts.

Criterium of the First Class—1000 francs, given by the Duc de Nemours; 160 francs entrance; seven horses started; won by Premier-Août, the property of M. Calenge.

Omnium Handicap for all horses—4000 francs, given by the Minister of Agriculture and Commerce; 100 francs entrance; twenty-four horses started, won by Suavita, property of M. Auguste Lupin; Narvaez, second; and Error, third.

Criterium of the Second Class—1000 francs entrance; ten horses started; won by Vanité, property of M. Fazque.

Special Race for a considerable wager, between M. Reiset and the Prince de Beauvau. Tigar, belonging to M. Reiset, came in by a neck to the winning-post.

On Sunday, a crowd of Parisians started by the locomotives for Chantilly, where the Great St. Leger, for 10,000 francs, is to be run for. The Préfet of the Seine has published a notice, which orders that all horses must be entered without further delay that are intended to be placed at the approaching races at the Champ de Mars. Two purses, furnished by the city of Paris, will be run for on next Sunday, for the opening of the autumnal races. The first is two years-olds; the second, 3000 francs for three years-old and above. A recent "ordonnance" of the Préfet of Police forbids all dogs to appear on the course, on pain of "instant death or mortal mutilation."

FRANCE

The news of the renewed and calamitous attack upon the French by Abd el-Kader has excited the deepest attention in Paris. Full details of it will be found under the head of Algeria. The Government are, therefore, on the spot immediately, and it is evident that operations will now be carried against Mogodor with great energy.

The Moniteur of Tuesday morning contains the following:—

"A Council of Ministers was held yesterday at St Cloud. The King has commanded that six regiments of infantry and two regiments of cavalry be embarked and carried immediately into Algiers, in the province of Oran, where the Marshal Duke D'Isly is about to receive orders to return immediately."

This army, consisting of 12,000 men, is intended for an expedition into Morocco, as is unequivocally announced by the Journal des Débats, of almost equal authority with the Moniteur itself, in the following terms:—

"The news published by the Messenger will excite in the public cry for a prompt and striking punishment of the perfidy to which our brave soldiers have fallen victims. Eight regiments, forming 12,000 men, are to be sent immediately into the province of Oran. Marshal Bugeaud returns to his post.

"It now remains to be seen what shall be the destination of these forces. It is not difficult for us to form a conjecture. Everything indicates where the blow, in order to be efficacious, ought to be struck. We shall express our opinion in one word—we must have done with Abd el-Kader, and seek him in whatever place he takes refuge. We have no have in affording more than suffice for the repression of partial insurrection. The Government need not reinforce eighty thousand men with the single object of chastising some rebel Arab.

"Abd-el-Kader is the soul of these ceaseless rebellions. He is an obstacle who must be destroyed before we can arrive at the definitive pacification of Algiers."

The Débats goes on to show, that, according to the law of nations, an expedition into Morocco is justifiable; besides this legal right, there is the strongest one founded upon the treaty of Tangiers, by an article of which the Emperor engaged to expel Abd el-Kader from the territory of Morocco, or to confine him therein; and concludes by saying that the war is not against the Emperor of Morocco, but "against Abd el Kader in Morocco."

In another article the Débats gives an account of the forces under the Emir's command, and a description of the locality where they are placed. It is as follows:—

"The river de Malonia, in Morocco, where Abd el-Kader has taken refuge, is but two or three days' march from the French frontier. It is by the coast side that he has come into the district of Nedroma, where is situated the fort of Djemaa Ghazaouet, passing by the Djebelor Mount Rarmoun by Mesuda, and the countries of the Souhalas. His douira is upon the left bank of the river, at the extremity of the little inland desert of Garet, upon the slopes of the Djebel Touzia and Djebel Azgan, descending from the long chain of the Rif. This douira is a colony of fractions of tribes, who, with their families, hope by the holy war to gain the paradise of Mahomet.

"This tribe is composed of about 5000, of which 500 are regular cavalry the Emir's command, and a description of the locality where they are placed. It is as follows:—

"The loss of Generals Bourjolly, on the 22nd, has been ascertained to have been serious. There fell with Colonel Berthier 28 killed, and 90 were wounded; 9 horses killed, and 11 wounded. The Arabs attacked with 300 infantry and 1000 cavalry. Of the force cut off by Abd el Kader, only ten escaped out of 450."

The Epoque states that the King was so affected with the news from Africa, that he ordered the concert to be postponed, which was to have been given on Monday evening, upon the occasion of his Majesty's birthday.

The Constitutionnel mentions that orders directly to return to Paris had been communicated by telegraph to Marshal Soult and Marshal Bugeaud.

The Paris papers discuss the subject with some acrimony. Some of them condemn the Moroccan treaty, and the Débats attributes the occurrence to the bad policy adopted by Marshal Bugeaud in Algeria.

The King and Queen of the Belgians and their children arrived at the Chateau of St. Cloud on Sunday. The Duke de Montpensier arrived in Paris, from Toulon, on the same day.

According to the Epoque, a new paper, formerly called the Globe, the German Reformer Ronge has received an invitation of visiting France, and the French Government have informed him that he may come as a private individual, but will not be suffered to perform his new culte.

SPAIN.

We have letters from Madrid to the 1st inst., but there is nothing of importance in them.

The Gazette publishes the names of the 30 persons who are to compose the new Council of State, the most conspicuous of whom were Messrs. Pedro de Castro, Lopez Battesteros, Javier Burgos, the Marquis de Valgornera, Vasquez Figueroa, Ruiz de la Vega, Ramon Santillan, Generals Miguel Tacon, Oraa, Felipe Rivero, Felipe Montes, and de la Hera, Olivan, Donoso Cortes, &c.

Mr. Bulwer, the British Minister Plenipotentiary, returned to Madrid on the 1st.

It is said that French engineers are surveying the road from San Juan to the port of Rosas, by Figueras, with the view to a railway project, the temptation to which are the rich coal-mines of Berga.

A letter from Barcelona of the 17th ult. says—"Blood continues to be shed in this distracted country, and with no unsparing hand. Twelve of the fifteen unhappy young men conscripts, by court martial, were sentenced to death, and this morning shot in the glacis of the citadel. It was a heartsickening sight: twelve able-bodied, fine young men, the oldest not having attained the age of twenty one. They were a number of those deluded beings who had fled from their homes to avoid the conscript, and, not having submitted themselves to the authorities, were declared and treated as outlaws at the expiration of the term marked out for giving themselves up. They were ordered about in small armed bands, and, when pressed by hunger, entered some remote village of the mountains and demanded money or provisions. An ambuscade of the army was laid for them on one of these occasions, and these fifteen prisoners were taken. Some 20,000 people assembled on the glacis to witness the execution. The whole garrison were under arms."

ITALY

An insurrection in Italy forms a prominent topic with the Paris papers this week. The Débats has the following:—"We learn by a letter from Milan, dated the 18th ult., that on the 24th an attempt at insurrection was made at Rimini. This attempt had been conceived, it is said, by some Italian habitants of the town and some Spanish and Piedmontese refugees. In the night of the 24th, about 300 men, these refugees landed near Rimini. The insurgents immediately proceeded to the fort of St. Leo, situated at a short distance from the town, and in which they are supposed to have had partisans. They gained over the fort, and set at liberty the political prisoners, who were very numerous. They then went to Pesaro, where they stopped the couriers and carried off the dispatches. The Cardinal Legate of Forli commands the troops at Rimini. On the 27th, at their approach, the insurgents, who, without doubt, had found out that the plot was known in the town and environs, hastily quitted Rimini, after abandoning their arms; some of them re-embarked, the others took refuge in the mountains. The letters from Bologna do not speak of any other movement having taken place in the Romagna. At the first report of this attempt, Marshal Radetzski, who commands the Austrian troops, reinforced the garrison of Ferrara. It was rumoured at Milan, that at Rimini some musket-shots had been fired at the Cardinal Legate and his secretary, and that the latter had been killed. This news needs confirmation."

The Débats of a subsequent date gives some further details. It says that the attempt was made by some Italian refugees, joined by two or three Spaniards. The insurgents, it appears, penetrated into the legations by the Republic of San Marino and the Grand Duchy of Tuscany, and had promised a vast conspiracy for a general rising of the country. At the head of the plot was Rebotti, a Piedmontese refugee, who, after 1833, served in Spain, with the rank of Colonel, and who had, since the termination of the civil war in that country, resided at Valence. The Pontifical Government, aware of his arrival in Romagna, had issued an order for his arrest, but Rebotti, aware of it, succeeded in making his escape, and remained concealed in the town of Rimini, where the insurrection first broke out. It was during the night of the 26th and 27th that some armed bands, headed by Rebotti and Pasi (also an Italian refugee), paraded the streets of Rimini, and proclaimed

ELECTION OF VICE-CHANCELLOR.—A convocation was holden this morning at twelve o'clock, for the purpose of electing a Vice Chancellor for the ensuing year. After the usual letter from the noble Chancellor, nominating the warden of Wadham College, had been read, the Rev. Charles Page Eden, M.A., fellow of Oriel College, immediately came forward and "non placet, non placet," but the Vice Chancellor would not consent to have a scrutiny, and the business of convocation was proceeded with. After the usual oaths of supremacy, allegiance, &c., had been administered, and certain formalities gone through, Dr Symonds was, for the second time, duly installed into the office of Vice-Chancellor. At the same time the following pro-Vice Chancellors were appointed, viz. Rev. Dr Cotton, D.D., provost of Oriel College; the Rev. P. Wynter, D.D., president of St. John's College; the Rev. J Radford, D.D., rector of Lincoln College; the Rev. Frederick Charles Plumptre, D.D., master of University College, when the Vice Chancellor dissolved the convocation. It is rumoured that the non placet party, of which Mr Eden is one of the leaders, intend entering a protest against the whole of the proceedings.

The convocation, owing to the colleges not having yet met, was a thin one, very few more than 30 members being present.

Congregations will be held for the purpose of granting Graces and conferring Degrees on the following days in the ensuing term, viz.

Thursday, October 16	Thursday, November 20
Thursday, October 23	Thursday, December 4
Thursday, October 30	Wednesday, December 17
Thursday, November 13

No person will, on any account, be admitted as a candidate for the degree of B.A. or M.A., or for those of B.C.L. or B. Med. (without proceeding through Arts), whose name is not entered in the book kept for that purpose at the Vice Chancellor's house, on or before the day preceding the day of congregation.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

DEATH OF AN IDIOT BY SUFFOCATION.—On Wednesday afternoon Mr. Baker held an inquest at the Cumberland Head, City-road, on the body of Sophia Brook, aged twenty years, an idiot, who, for some time past, had been an inmate of St. Luke's Workhouse. It appeared, from the evidence, that, on Sunday last, the deceased, who was in the lunatic ward of the house, had her dinner, which consisted of a brisket of beef and potatoes; it was cut up in small pieces, as usual, by the nurse; whilst eating which a piece of the beef stuck in her throat, and she became black in the face and violently convulsed, and died before medical assistance could be procured. The jury returned a verdict of "Accidental Death by Choking"

ACCIDENT ON THE SHEFFIELD AND MANCHESTER RAILWAY.—Owing to a cow having negligently been allowed to stray on to the above line, by a drover from Penstone market, after dark, on Monday night, an accident occurred, which had well nigh been the destruction of a whole train of passengers. Shortly after the train had left Dunford bridge, and while it was dark, a shock was received which threw both engine and train off the line, seriously injuring several of the carriages, and almost crushing the guard to death. As soon as the passengers could be got out of the carriages, it was ascertained that a cow had got upon the line, and the engine had come in violent contact with it. The poor animal was nearly cut in two, and of course killed on the spot. Information was immediately sent to the Sheffield station, and a pilot engine promptly despatched at ten o'clock at night. It returned at midnight, with a portion of the passengers on board, and after immediately conveying them safely, started again for the remainder, with sufficient carriages, arriving again at Sheffield about two in the morning. The passengers, who, as might be expected, were almost crushing the guard to death in such considerable fortitude—not a syllable of complaint being uttered by any of them. Happily none of the passengers were injured beyond some slight bruises, and all reached their homes in safety, between midnight and ten o'clock on Tuesday morning.

SUICIDE OF A TRADESMAN AT BATTERSEA.—On Monday evening, a long inquiry took place before Mr. Carter, Mrs., at the Crown Inn, Battersea Old Town, respecting the death of James Ryan, aged thirty six years, a tradesman living in Battersea square. Lydia Tugwell, residing at the next house, deposed that she had known the deceased for some months past. On Sunday morning, between twelve and one o'clock, whilst getting into bed, she was alarmed at hearing a female scream out "Murder" several times. Witness ran into the street, and saw the deceased standing at his bed-room window begging for assistance. Witness went into the house, and saw deceased lying on the floor partly undressed. He had a large wound in his throat, the room was deluged with blood, and he appeared to be quite dead. Will ness went for Mr. Mackey, surgeon, who attended with promptitude, but he pronounced life extinct.—Police-constable Spreadborough stated that he was on duty in Battersea square on Sunday morning, between one and two o'clock, when he heard a female shriek, and saw deceased in the act of throwing himself out of the back room of the deceased's house, and there saw the deceased in the arms of several persons. Upon examining the room, witness found a penknife lying in a pool of blood on the floor just to the right hand. Witness had often been called by the deceased from the bedroom window at the middle of the night, when he would say "policeman, come in, you have to murder me to-night," or he was always addicted to drinking, and was frequently in a state of excitement. Sarah Peel, the sister of the deceased, said that he was constantly in the habit of calling out in the middle of the night, and appeared in a state of madness. Other corroborative evidence having been adduced, the Jury returned a verdict, "That the deceased destroyed his own life, being at the time in a state of unsound mind."

RAILWAY ROBBERIES.—An organised system of robberies on railways seems of late to have arisen, which has been put in practice on most of the principal lines. On Thursday week, Mrs. Hirst, while travelling in a first-class carriage from Leeds to Normanton, had her pocket cut with some sharp instrument, and notes and gold to the amount of £35, and two gold rings, were taken. The robbery was supposed to have been committed by some war as Mrs Hirst's. Three robberies were committed on the same day at the station at Derby, while the parties were booking; and on the following day, a gentleman was robbed at Leamington of £20. In consequence of representations on the subject, the Mayor of Leeds (Darnton Lupton, Esq.), directed police-officers Child and Stubbs, of the detective force, to proceed to some of the principal stations on the north Midland Railway, with a view to the apprehension of the robbers; and three officers at Rugby took two men into custody on suspicion of being concerned in the robberies in question. They had at the time in their carpet bags, a new portmanteau, and some valuable clothes, in their possession.

DREADFUL DEATH OF MADAME HENGLER.—On Thursday night, shortly before eight o'clock, a shocking circumstance occurred at Jones's brewery manufactory, 4, Asylum road, Westminster road, by which the lives of several persons were jeopardised, and Madame Hengler, mother of the celebrated female dancer, lost her life, under the circumstances of the most rending character. Mr. Joseph Wells, foreman in the establishment, states that he was employed, about the above hour, in getting up an order upstairs. Whilst thus engaged he was alarmed by the cracking of the lower part of the premises, an explosion as of a squib He hastened to the staircase, when a variety of other fireworks went off Having twice asked the question whether any one was in the rooms, and having received no answer, up he sped, in faint 14 months old, and whilst attempting to descend a stifled moaning appeared to issue from the room in front of the first door. Flames at this moment rising from the lower part of the house, he was compelled to retreat through them, when he stumbled over something at the bottom of the staircase, and fell nearly suffocated in the passage He, however, picked up the child, and escaped from the premises amidst a shower of fire, proceeding from the repeated explosions By this time, the fire being observed by a person opposite, a ladder was procured, and two men attempted from the outside of the house to rescue Mrs. Hengler, who in a very excited state stood upwards of 80 years of age, and who was then crying piteously for help. A Mrs. Grainger was taken out considerably injured, but at the moment it was hoped the unfortunate old lady would have been rescued, more than were attempting to save her by the ladder were forced to make good their retreat Some time elapsed before the body could be got out of the ruins, and when done, it exhibited a frightful spectacle, the upper part of the arms, bosom, neck, and head, being deeply burned The unfortunate woman was quite dead. Mr Henderson reports the damage to the building as being serious. Both the house and its contents are much damaged. How the fire originated is not certainly known. It is supposed that it was occasioned by a boy having too sharply struck a "charge" which he was ramming into one of the cases, and that the whole of the articles in the shop were set on fire.

MORTALITY IN THE METROPOLIS.—The number of deaths during the last week was 856, showing a difference of only two from that of the previous week, while the average of five autumn was 1020. Measles still prevail to a great extent, and the deaths (97) are more than twice the average. The deaths from old age were only 28 while the average for the last five years was 74. Those from violence are numerous, amounting to 43—average 20

THE COVERDALE BIBLE AT HOLKHAM.—The statement lately published in the papers of a copy of Coverdale's Bible having been found concealed in an old chest at Holkham Hall, was incorrect. The Bible had never been lost, but was a valued treasure of the library. It is believed to be the only copy extant with a perfect title-page, for which alone a large sum has been offered by a London bookseller, but was of course refused.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The month of October opens inauspiciously for English popular field-sports, and the wane of our outdoor manly amusements has already begun. Its first day is that on which, according to act of Parliament, pheasant-shooting commences—to all intents and purposes an anti-national sport. Not only is the practice of it confined to

> "The twice two thousand that the world was made for;"

but the preserving system—so far as it is the heavy blow and great discouragement of glorious fox-hunting—is inimical for its sanguinary clauses to the delicate farmer-sportsman, to carried out, the cause of pleasure participation will be much aided. Nothing is more sure than that union is strength, and that the true way to secure the prosperity of any institution is to draw together the elements of which it is formed!

The announcement of fixtures gives herald of the commencement of the chase. It is, of course, much too soon for fox-hunting, or any hunting in an enclosed country. Blind birches, hedges in full leaf, and all the et cæteras of autumn preclude riding to hounds with anything like safety—even if a chance run should offer. But not thus is it in certain wild districts, where some of the best packs of harriers in the world are to be met with, even at this early part of the year, in full career. Foremost of these, beyond any of which we have had experience, both as regards the locality and the pack by which it is hunted, is the Brocklehurst country. Its fame is always within an hour's ride—a glorious gallop for an autumnal morning—of Brighton, and we promise any fellow sinner, with a taste for the noble science, though in pursuit of hare only, who will give it a fair, good, preliminary trial. If he wishes to ay a run with the Brocksade harriers, moreover, he will do well not to leave his best horse at home The current week has not been rife with matter of sporting account of any sort—the successor gets far better promises of a harvest than of what pretension.

On Monday the Second October Meeting at Newmarket commences—an occasion of interest with both the breeders of race-horses, those by whom race horses live, and those who live by race-horses. It gives a couple of two-year-old stake for consideration, and a capital handicap for consideration. The former are the Clearwell and the Prendergast We think we hear the reader say the Prendergast can be no great stakes in the opinion of turf authorities, for the animal that won it last year was subsequently weighted at five stone for the Cesarewitch. The Handicap of 1845. That's very true: it was an unaccountable feature in an accountable race nevertheless. The prevailing sameness of the nominations for these stakes will rob them of much of their attraction, and nothing at all will running, nothing can have a chance with Sting for the Clearwell. He has no penalty to carry as a winner, and, by his public trials, has beaten the majority of those engaged against him. He is in on better terms than it is possible for him to run for the Criterion: much better than he could or would, probably, come to the post in the Houghton—at least for his existing engagements. If he remain he should not go, let him not be backed by any friend of ours for the D—y. Should he win his autumn engagements he will be a ruinous winter favourite But the cynosure of all turfmen of enterprise at this moment is the Cesarewitch subject of handicap. Considering the short time it has been in the market, business has extended over a great range of stabling; and no wonder, for, from all present indications, a large field will go for it. Fifty horses are left in, and, as handicaps go, it is as good as any of the season, and a great deal better than many. As more than five-and-twenty nominations have been backed, it will be seen that the "parts" are sweet in a great majority of cases. As to the folly of picking out a winner of suc event as this, we would not offer the reader so poor a commentary on our value of his common sense—to say nothing of our respect—as to make a jack-pudding of our proper self. It will, however, be well most probably by a race-horse, because ye cannot find leg-rag and bobtail to stay so long a course, and as among the market loi there is a strong sprinkling of "put," those who think our view correct will know what not to back. For this cause, though the Baron has three pounds less penalty to carry for the Cambridgeshire, we fancy him better for the Cesarewitch. Last year, for example, Brems beat Folgh-a-Ballagh for the Cambridgeshire; but had it been the Cesarewitch course, does any one suppose the result would have been the same?

The Second October Meeting—looking at the gist of horses in every stable at Newmarket—must produce good and splendid sport; indeed, the list in the Book Calendar is as meagre as it is. The way thither, too, is vastly more convenient than it has ever heretofore been albeit, not perfect yet. We, therefore, will soon upon a good occasion—at all events, a better than can elsewhere be sought, or, very probably, be elsewhere found. How far this anticipation is realised, will be seen in our next article on National Sports.

MONDAY.—A very busy day at the "Corner," and horses enough backed to ensure a large, if not a good field. The investments, however, were unequal in amount, not more than £1000 out of the many hundreds noted having been invested in demand; in this case we may include the three favourites, Intrepid, Bush, and Kesberg. Wee Pet and the Goodwood horses were friendless.

INTERESTING TO LONDON ANGLERS.—The roach season being now at its height in the Thames, the river, in the vicinity of Richmond, Twickenham, and Teddington, daily exhibits a scene of animation, by reason of the great number of bank and punt anglers constantly visiting those localities. Last Sunday, at Richmond alone, in the bason and preserve, and on the bank, upwards of 1000 were assembled, to say nothing of the number of anglers who were engaged higher up the river. Several piscatorial parties, after walking to Twickenham and Teddington, found the boats and punts pre-engaged, and were obliged to return to town, without having their fill of sport. The "takes" of roach and other fish at the above-named places have, for some time past, been very numerous, fine, and heavy

THE LATE EARL OF EGREMONT.—By his will, made in the year 1842, to which are added two codicils, which were made in 1844 and 1845, the late Earl of Egremont has devised all his estates in the counties of Devon, Somerset, Wilts, and Surrey, after the decease of the Countess, to his relation, William Wyndham, Esq., and has established the estates on the Wyndham family This devise is followed by a clause, in which he most earnestly entreats of the several persons who may hereafter enter into possession of the estates, that they will preserve, and encourage the ancient and true High Conservative principles which he professed and maintained. He directs that an accumulating fund shall be formed out of his real and personal estate wherewith to purchase annuities and pay off all existing charges and incumbrances. To the Countess he leaves all his carriages, jewels, &c, absolutely, and a legacy of £6000 for immediate use; also, all plate, books, pictures, and any bequests which were in his gift. The personal estate is estimated at £70,000. The executors are the Right Hon. Jane, Countess of Egremont, the relict; J. W. Roocrte, Esq., the Rev. W. C Thompson, the Rev. J. Stone, Robert Biddulph, Esq., and Mr. Laurence Walker, the two latter are the acting executors. His Lordship died on the 2nd of April last, at the age of 89; he is described in the will as the Right Hon. George Earl of Egremont, and Baron of Cockermouth, in the county of Cumberland. a Baronet and a Captain in the Royal Navy; of Silverton Park, in the county of Devon, and of Orchard Wyndham, in the county of Somerset.

POLICE.

FORGERY UPON NEW YORK MERCHANTS.—On Monday, at BOW STREET a man, about 45 years of age, named John Constant Chisten, alias John Reed alias John Johnson, alias John Chalmers, was placed at the bar by Inspector Haynes, of the detective force, on a warrant issued by Mr. Hall, upon the authority of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, charged under the 6th and 7th Victoria, chap. 76, entitled, "An Act for facilitating execution of the treaties with France and the United States of America for the apprehension of certain offenders," with forging a certificate of deposit for 23,600 Mexican dollars, with intent to defraud Jacob Little and Co., merchants of New York. The prisoner was charged at this Court with forging the same instrument but a few days before, but discharged without going into the merits of the case, it being then considered by Mr. Jardine, before whom he was brought, that the depositions which had been taken in America were insufficient to warrant further committing, as they were not drawn up in compliance with the terms of the Act of Treaty. Mr Hall said that sufficient had been adduced to authorise him in committing the prisoner, for he saw no grounds for a remand, as there was a prima facie case laid before him to send for trial, and if he was mistaken, it would be for the Judges to decide upon a question upon which various opinions had been entertained by the Bench of Magistrates. The prisoner went back to Tothill fields Prison

MYSTERIOUS AFFAIR.—At SOUTHWARK Police office on Saturday last, a woman named Bridget Smith, was examined, on a charge of sending a parcel containing sugar, with which was mixed a quantity of oxalic acid, to Henry Smith, a charcoal dealer in the Cornwall road, Lambeth, with intent to poison him.—Mr. Hardman, the solicitor, who attended on behalf of the prisoner, placed a number of letters in the complainant's hands, and asked him if he was not the writer of them. The letters purported to have been written by the complainant to the prisoner, and were couched in language to screen the complainant said that he was the writer of only one out of the number, and that was written in a strain upbraiding her for prosecuting such unfounded reports about him.—Sarah Bryan was re-called, and she stated that she was formerly married to the complainant and the prisoner were man and wife.—The complainant stated that the prisoner was married to a man named M'Cann, in 1844, who was now living, and that she now wanted to procure a certificate of her marriage with him (complainant) in 1845, at St. John's, Paddington; but there was no truth whatever in the latter assertion.—The prisoner's solicitor said, that they admitted the accused was married in 1844 to a man who was afterwards tried for bigamy, and convicted, and that it was subsequent to that she was married to the complainant. The solicitor produced a copy of a certificate of the marriage of Patrick Henry Smith to Bridget Williams, solemnised at St. John's Church, Paddington, on Whit Monday, the 19th of May, in the present year. He added that the copy produced was procured within the last few days, on application to the complainant having torn up the former certificate, and that the most indisputable proof would be forthcoming that they were the parties named in the certificate —Mr. Cottingham (to the complainant).—Do you still maintain that you are not the person named in the certificate? Complainant.—Most certainly I do. She was married to a man of my name, and she now wants to impose upon you with as gross a falsehood as ever was uttered by woman. I can now prove that on the day she asserts we were married I was not near St. John's Church, Paddington, but in a different part of the town.—The prisoner's solicitor said that as he had not had time to obtain the evidence of any of the parties who were present at the marriage, but that if time were allowed he would do so, and that it was solemnised so recently tha the clergyman who performed the ceremony would be very likely to identify them.—Mr. Cottingham said the case was enveloped in mystery, and that if the prisoner was imposing upon him by declaring that the complainant was her husband, and producing a certificate to establish the fact, she would aggravate her offence in no slight degree. It was, however, very extraordinary that those letters of affection, which it was alleged were written to her by the complainant, should have been sent to her after she was known to have made use of the threats of poisoning him.—The Complainant declared that he had not written the letters.—Sarah Casey was then examined, and she stated that, on last Whit Monday, the complainant was at her house all day until four o'clock in the afternoon, and that he then went away, saying he was going to Wandsworth fair.—Mr. Hardy, a surgeon, of the Waterloo-road, proved that on Monday last the parcel was brought to his house by the complainant, and on submitting the contents to analysation, oxalic acid was discovered to be mixed up with the sugar.—Mr. Cottingham said that as the prisoner still persisted in the declaration that the complainant was her husband, time should, therefore, be allowed her for bringing forward the necessary witnesses who were present on the occasion. The prisoner was then remanded for the above purpose until Tuesday.—On that day the prisoner was re-examined.—Mr. James said that he should now show the falsehood of the prisoner's assertion with respect to the certificate having been made, that she had known the complainant since last Whit Monday at Paddington.—James Drake, the beadle of St. John's, Paddington, produced the register of marriages in that church, by which it appeared, that on the 19th of May, Whit Monday, a marriage was solemnised between Patrick Henry Smith and Bridget Williams. The witness was present at the marriage, but he could not undertake to identify either of the parties, though he believed the prisoner was the bride on that occasion Both the prisoners were so meanly and dirtily clad on the occasion that he (witness) and also the pew-opener refused to be witnesses to the marriage, and other persons were therefore obtained for that purpose.—Mr. Cottingham asked the prisoner whether she still adhered to her former assertion, that the complainant was her husband.—The prisoner replied that she did, and he knew what she said to be true as there was a God above.—Mr. James then called forward three persons living in Kennington-place, where the complainant lived at the time, who proved across a plain, under a sharp fire from the Fort and battery of grape and musketry; the first shot being fired by the Conway. The enemy was driven out of the battery, and the guns were spiked. The outwork or screen, which had been supposed to be the Fort itself, was stormed, and taken. They here discovered the real Fort, which is a circular one, and mounting about 30 guns, which were casemated, and in a circular gallery. The wall is about 30 feet high, and surrounded by a ditch of about the same width. Possession was kept of the top of the screen for upwards of half an hour, and a constant fire kept up. Having no means of breaching the wall, and the men falling fast, they retired, carrying off the flag, for the possession of which the French and English sailors disputed for a long time; but it was finally settled that it should be equally divided between the two parties, the one obtaining a portion with the word "Ranavala," and the other with "Manaka," inscribed.

They burnt the Guard-house, Custom house, and a considerable part of the town. The firing from the men-of-war was excellent. They landed next day and carried off all the remaining European property. The wounded were all brought off, but not the killed, whose heads were next day exposed on the beach, stuck on pikes. The men-of-war and all the merchant ships sailed from the harbour.

English.—Killed, 4 men; wounded, 1 officer and 11 men.

French.—Killed, 3 officers and 14 men; wounded, 1 officer and 42 men.

The Zelée and the Berceau lost each a topmast from the fire of the enemy; the Conway had only a few ropes cut. Nearly all their balls passed over the ships, which had anchored about 800 yards from the shore.

By the kindness of a Correspondent we are enabled to annex an engraving of the fort, from a sketch taken from the mast-head of the Conway: a, the road taken by the men on landing; b, the spot where they formed on the beach; c, boats landing; d, the spot where the Ovahs set up the heads of the enemy on pikes. The precise form and construction of the outworks and the stone fort are likewise shown; as well as the peculiar position of the flag staff. "It was shot through," says the Times Correspondent, "and it fell inside the circular fort, on the edge of which it had stood; it was then put on a lance, or something of that sort, and stuck again on the wall, in a crevice of the stones. It was shot away again, and this time it fell outwards, hanging down within a few feet of the bottom of the ditch, between the inner fort and the screen."

"It may appear incredible, but it is positively asserted that the existence of the interior fort, the keep, was not known even to the traders and people of Tamatave."

"We get all our bullocks from Madagascar, as well for draught as for the butchers, but that, though of no small importance to a foreign-fed colony of 160,000 mouths, is a very minor consideration compared with the political results, as the question of peace or war may be decided.

"Our policy of late years has been non-interference with the internal affairs of Madagascar; the French have long been desirous of a footing there, and have made some attempts, even as at Nossi Be, which however has proved too unhealthy to succeed; the French have no harbour at Bourbon. I shall here leave you to draw your own conclusions."

THE UNITED STATES, OREGON, AND TEXAS.

The accompanying Map may be regarded as an illustration of the Address—"Annexation"—upon the front page; more especially as showing the relative position of Texas and the United States. It may, however, be requisite to subjoin here a few leading details of the Oregon Territory and its extent.

On the east it skirts 630 miles along the Rocky Mountains, on the south 300 miles along the Snowy Mountains, on the west 700 miles along the Pacific Ocean, on the north 350 miles along the North American possessions of Russia and England. This area or immense valley contains 360,000 square miles—more than three times as large as Great Britain and Ireland put together—capable undoubtedly of forming seven states as large as New York or 40 states of the dimensions of Massachusetts. Some of the islands on the coast are very large—sufficient to form a state by themselves. These are situate north of the parallel of 48. Vancouver's Island, 260 miles in length and 50 in breadth, contains 12,000 square miles—an area larger than Massachusetts and Connecticut. Queen Charlotte's or rather Washington Island, too, 150 miles in length and 30 in breadth, contains 4,000 square miles. Of both of these immense islands, though they lie between the high parallels of 48 and 54 degrees, the soil is said to be well adapted to agriculture. The straits and circumjacent waters abound in fish of the finest quality. Coal of good quality, and other veins of minerals, have been found.

The tide of Emigration from the United States has already set in strongly towards the disputed territory; but a majority of the emigrants are disappointed and dissatisfied with the country, and many of them leave as soon as possible for California.

Mr. Wyld, Her Majesty's Geographer, has published with his valuable corrected Map of the Oregon District, "a Comparative Chronological Statement of the Events connected with the Rights of Great Britain and the Claims of the United States," the Summary of which very lucid Key we quote:

The Americans found their claim to the Oregon Territory—

1st—On the purchase of Louisiana from the French in 1803.

2nd—On the rights they acquired from Spain by the Florida Treaty.

3rd From the discoveries and settlements of American citizens.

I. The possession of Louisiana from the French, in 1803, can give no title to the Oregon and the district of the Columbia, as the boundaries of Louisiana never extended beyond the sources of the rivers Missouri and Mississippi, and if we give the fullest extent to the Louisiana claim, it was bounded by the Rocky Mountains See Map.)

II The region acquired from Spain by the Florida Treaty

The claim of Spain could arise only from the discoveries of her navigators. Sir Francis Drake was undoubtedly the first European who sailed along this part of the north-west continent of America. The voyages of the Spanish navigators were subsequent to Drake's voyage. Spain acknowledged the right of Great Britain to these territories by the Convention of 1790, and confirmed the Convention of 1790 by the Treaty of 1814. The American Treaty with Spain was not ratified until 1820; so that, if Spain had any rights, Great Britain had acquired them by the prior cession.

III From the discoveries and settlements of American citizens.

If priority of visitation gives the right to the territory, Sir Francis Drake visited the shores of this country in 1561, Captain Cook in 1777, Captain Meares in 1788, Vancouver and Broughton in 1791-2 The first American navigator did not appear until 1792 If exploration of the rivers and lands give the right to the territory, Captain Carver, a subject of England, had visited the source of the Oregon river in 1766. The North West Fur Company had established trading posts on the Columbia river in 1804; it was not until 1806 that Messrs Clark and Lewis, an American expedition, passed down the valley of the Columbia to its entrance into the sea. If America contends that a proprietary title has been acquired by the first visitations and explorations of her citizens, she can only be entitled to a very small portion of the territory, inasmuch as her citizens have visited but a very small portion of the country—the greater part of it having been pre-visited by the agents of the Hudson's Bay Company, who are the subjects of Great Britain Yet Law of Nations has hitherto been, that the navigators of any nation, who first visited the shores of any country, acquired for their Sovereigns whose subjects they were, not only the shores, but the rivers running into the seas they visit." Upon this principle have all the Colonial possessions of Spain, Portugal, France, England, and Russia been secured.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

FRAMLINGHAM CASTLE.

This picturesque ruin of a fortress of the Middle Ages, stands on the north side of the town of Framlingham, 18 miles north-east of Ipswich. The castle was granted by Henry I. to Hugh Bigod, and at different times held by the Bigods, the Mowbrays, the Howards, and other illustrious families. Sir Robert Hitcham having purchased the Castle and Manor of the Howard family, bequeathed them, for pious uses, to the Master and Fellows of Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, by which Society they are still possessed.

FRAMLINGHAM CASTLE.

The outer wall is standing: its form is irregular, approaching to a circle, and it is strengthened at intervals by square towers, 13 in number. The wall is 44 feet high, and 8 feet thick; the towers rise to the height of 58 feet. The principal gateway is on the south side, opposite the town, and is sculptured with the arms of the principal families which have possessed the Castle. There are some remains of the outworks. The area within the Castle walls is above an acre and a quarter; but the demolition of the interior is so complete, that very little idea can be formed of its arrangement. The Castle was defended, except where it was protected by the mere, by a double ditch.

"This Castle, considering its beauty, greatness, and strength in former ages, may reasonably be supposed to have been originally built in the time of the Heptarchy, by some of the first Saxon Kings of the East Angles."—(Loder's History of Framlingham, etc.) And to the existence of this stronghold, the town of Framlingham owed its importance in the Anglo-Saxon period.

SWINDON RAILWAY TOWN.

Swindon, on the Great Western Railway, like Wolverton, on the London and Birmingham, and Crewe, on the Grand Junction, is one of the extraordinary products of the railway enterprise of the present day. Until lately, Swindon was remarkable for nothing but heath and upland; it is now the nursery of a new community, the seat of well-ordered industry, and a colony of engineers and handicraftsmen. The total sum expended on the locomotive establishment at Swindon, including engines and carriages, is about £350,000, exclusive of the expense of engine-house, machinery, and tools, amounting to £26,500. The average half yearly expenditure in wages to engine-drivers, firemen, guards, servants, porters, clothing, &c., is £140,000 The Company manufacture their own engines at the factory, where cleaning and everything connected with constructive repair is carried on. The number of mechanics, including engine-drivers, firemen, fitters, coppersmiths, cleaners, and labourers, constantly employed, varies from 900 to 950.

Swindon consists of neat brick buildings, and is so far adjacent to the line as to be seen by the passing trains. The total population is upwards of eight hundred. A library and reading rooms have already been formed for the use of the inhabitants and servants of the Company, together with a Mechanics' Institute.

The Church, of which we annex an Engraving, has been built entirely of stone, under the superintendence of Messrs. Scott and Moffatt. It is in the decorative style of the fourteenth century, with aisles, clerestory, chancel, tower, and spire. The entire structure is 140 feet high, and will accommodate eight hundred persons, all the sittings being entirely free. The estimated cost is between £5000 and £6000. Its consecration by the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol took place on Friday, the 25th of April, St. Mark's day; and it is dedicated to this Evangelist. Adjoining the church, at the east and west, are the schools and parsonage, built in a style corresponding with the church, at a cost of £1700 On the south of the church, a spacious piece of ground has been purchased by the Great Western Company, and laid out as a park or pleasure-ground for the inhabitants.

According to the Devizes Gazette, Swindon would seem to be the "disputed railway territory," from the number of schemes now before the public proposing to have connexion with the Great Western Railway, or to pass over with independent lines. The following list will show most of the schemes which are projected:—Manchester and Southampton Railway direct (Walkinshaw's line), capital £1,500,000; Southampton, Dorchester, and Poole (Lacy's line), capital £1,500,000; Southampton, Manchester, and Oxford Junction (Parson's line), capital £900,000; Oxford, Southampton, and Portsmouth, and Didcot, with branch (Bethell's line), £500,000; Great and Midlands Junction, capital £1,380,000; West Midland, Manchester, and Southampton, and Swindon and Birmingham Junction, £1,200,000. Cheltenham, Oxford, and Brighton Junction, £1,000,000; Brighton and Cheltenham direct, £1,000,000; Salisbury and Swindon Extension of the Wilts, Somerset, and Southampton Junction, £700,000; Rugby, Swindon, and Weymouth Direct Junction, £1,800,000; Southampton and Great Western Junction. Troops of engineers and surveyors are traversing the country in the neighbourhood of Swindon in all directions, and upon almost every eminence may be seen some eminent surveyor spying out points and taking sights, whilst the fields present an appearance, from the number of flagstaffs, as if a steeple chase on a grand scale was about to be run.

THE LATE EARL SPENCER.—FROM A RECENT PHOTOGRAPH.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS, RECENTLY DECEASED.

EARL SPENCER.

John Charles Spencer, Earl Spencer, Viscount Althorp, Viscount and Baron Spencer, of Althorp, in the County of Northampton, was the son of George John, second Earl Spencer, by his wife Lavinia, eldest daughter of Charles, first Earl of Lucan; and was born on the 30th May, 1782.

The Noble Earl, who from almost the time of his birth bore the title of Lord Althorp, completed his education at Trinity College, Cambridge, and there obtained the honorary degree of M.A. At the age of twenty-one, he became Member for Okehampton, and on the death of Mr. Pitt, offered himself as a candidate for the representation of Cambridge, but lost the election by a large majority. In the same year, 1806, after a very severe struggle, he obtained his return for Northamptonshire, and during the Fox and Grenville administration, held office as a Lord of the Treasury. At the next general election, he again came into Parliament for the County of Northampton, which he continued to represent up to the year 1834. His lordship, a determined opponent of the Tory Government, accepted office under Earl Grey, on the formation of the Whig Cabinet, and became Chancellor of the Exchequer, which position he held from Nov., 1830, until Nov., 1834, at which latter date he took his seat in the Upper House as Earl Spencer, on the decease of his father.

Earl Spencer felt great interest in agricultural pursuits, and up to a recent period held the office of President of the Royal Agricultural Society. His lordship was celebrated for the pure breeds of cattle he possessed, and was frequently a successful competitor at the exhibitions of the Smithfield Club, the presidency of which becomes vacant by his death.

The noble Earl married on the 14th April, 1814, Esther, only daughter and heiress of Richard Acklom, Esq., of Wiston Hall, Nottinghamshire by whom (who died the 11th June, 1818) he had no issue. After an illness of little more than a fortnight's duration, Earl Spencer departed this life on the 1st instant, at his seat, Wiston Hall, Nottinghamshire, in the 64th year of his age. He is succeeded in his honours by his next surviving brother, Frederick, a Captain in the Royal Navy and a Knight of St. Louis, and of St. Anne of Russia, now fourth Earl Spencer. The present Earl married the 23rd February, 1830, Elizabeth Georgiana, second daughter of William Stephen Poyntz, Esq., of Cowdray Park, Sussex, and has issue two daughters, and a son now in the tenth year of his age. The next brother in succession to the late and present Earl is the Hon. and Rev. George Spencer, a Catholic clergyman and one of the Professors at Oscott College.

The Spencers, Viscounts Althorp and Earls Spencer, are a branch of the house of Spencer, Earls of Sunderland, now Dukes of Marlborough, springing from the Hon. John Spencer, youngest son of Charles, third

NEW CHURCH AT SWINDON, ON THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY

Earl of Sunderland, by Anne, daughter and co-heiress of the renowned John Churchill, first Duke of Marlborough. The Hon. John Spencer represented Woodstock in Parliament from 1761 to the time of his decease in 1765. He was also Ranger of the Great Park at Windsor, to which he was appointed at the demise of his grandmother, Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough, the only place he was allowed, by her Grace's will, to accept. He also inherited a very considerable property from the Duchess. He married Georgiana, third daughter of John Carteret, Earl Granville, and was succeeded by his only son, John Spencer, who was created, the 3rd April, 1761, Baron Spencer of Althorp, in the county of Northampton, and Viscount Spencer, and was advanced, the 1st Nov., 1765, to the Viscounty of Althorp and Earldom of Spencer. His lordship was father of the celebrated Duchess of Devonshire, of the late Countess of Bessborough, and of George John, second Earl Spencer, whose eldest son was John Charles, the late Earl, whose death we here record, and regret.

We can but glance at the public services of the late Earl, who was a Privy Councillor and a Fellow of the Royal Society.

Lord Althorp was long in the House of Commons without making any display, or attracting attention. His abilities were solid, not showy; he rather shrank from than courted notice; and his moral courage, integrity, goodness of heart, and genial kindliness, were long unknown to all but the circle of his immediate friends. Years, therefore, elapsed before he became recognised as one of the leaders of that Liberal party to which is owing the removal of the disabilities of the Dissenters, the carrying of the act of Roman Catholic Emancipation, the Reform Act, and all the other measures which have flowed from them. Even when he took up the position which he afterwards filled with so much credit, he was more driven into it by the force of circumstances than impelled by his own ambition; he entered on official duties with great reluctance, and relinquished them with satisfaction, though inheriting his father's assiduity in business, and energy in mastering and discharging the minutest details.

As the "Leader of the House of Commons," during several years of violent excitement and restless agitation, he displayed a courage, firmness, command of temper, and bonhomie, which secured for him general esteem, and invested his authority with a charm which few could resist.

We have no space to record the numerous occasions on which Lord Althorp, by virtue of his office and position, took formal part in discussions—in the renewal of the Charter of the Bank of England he took a leading and initial share. Though no orator, his unfailing good humour, solid sense, and acknowledged integrity, carried conviction with his words.

Earl Grey, in the speech detailing the circumstances of his retirement from office, termed Lord Althorp "the leading member of Government in the Commons, on whom his whole confidence rested, whom he considered as the right arm of the Government, and without whom he felt it was impossible that the Government could go on."

From the moment of his succession to the peerage, Earl Spencer retired into private life. "The practical statesman" (says the Morning Chronicle) "became the practical farmer; and he who so recently was noted for his skill in managing the House of Commons, became as noted for the rearing of short-horns. In 1839, he accepted the challenge of a celebrated Sussex breeder, given at the Oxford Agricultural Show, and carried off the judges' awards for the best hundred beasts. His connection with the Smithfield Cattle Club, and his presidency of the Royal Agricultural Society of England, are recent and familiar feats. Most readers, too, have been made acquainted with his scientific acquirements, through Lord Brougham's 'Dialogues on Instinct,' given in 'Knight's Weekly Volume.' He was Vice-Chairman of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge; and to him Lord Brougham dedicated his 'Discourse on Natural Theology,' informing his readers that Earl Spencer had devoted much of his time to such inquiries—was, beyond most men, sensible of their importance, and had even formed the design of giving to the world his thoughts on the subject. But, though thus usefully living in the retirement which he had sought, he forgot not his friends or old principles. At the assembling of the present Parliament, in August, 1841, he moved the Address, in the House of Lords, in answer to the Royal Speech; and at Northampton, on the 28th of November, 1843, he made a speech which created no little sensation at the time. For his advocacy of free-trade principles, an attempt was made to eject him from the Presidency of the Royal Agricultural Society; but it was put down by the weight of his character, and the good sense of the majority of the members. We can add no more than that he was an even-tempered, deep, cool-headed man, with sound acquirements, but no dazzling abilities; useful in public and private life, who lived well, and dies universally regretted."

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 11, 1845.

THE Emperor of Russia seems to dissipate the exasperation caused by his repeated military defeats in the Caucasus, by increasing the extent and degree of his religious persecution in Poland. Death, exile, the dungeon, and unremitting espionage, have rendered political offences almost impossible; but even the small degree of independence of thought indicated by a difference of religion is enough to enrage the Czar, each of whose acts appears worse than the former; they will at last compel Europe to palliate them by the charitable supposition of madness—inherent, it is said, in the whole line of Romanoff. As wretched minds be the ruler as the ruled, in a state of society which permits such unlimited power to one weak and erring mortal. The religion of Russia is that of the Greek Church, of which the Pope is at St. Petersburg in the person of the Emperor, not at Rome. That he should favour the worship of his subjects is not surprising; but his constant persecution of the Roman Catholics of Poland is unaccountable, as it now has not even the pretence of political disaffection. Few in numbers weak, poor, their nobility rooted out, the people crushed, their cities in the occupation of the Russian army, the least that could be left to his victims was the enjoyment of their religion. But there was too much independence even in this; and the Catholicism of Poland is to be crushed and destroyed. All attempts to mould the religious belief of many to the creed of one, have always failed: Louis XIV., in the height of his power, endeavoured by force to extirpate Protestantism from France, and not only failed, but ruined his kingdom, and laid the foundation of the commercial greatness of his rival by the Edict of Nantes. Three Monarchs of England tried to enforce uniformity of belief on their subjects; one died despised and execrated—one perished on the scaffold—the third an outcast, an exile, and a dependent on the charity of a foreign Court.

If Nicholas, then, is actuated by anything like a scheme of policy, he has all history as a witness against the chance of its success. But it is much more likely to be the caprice of a despot, intoxicated with power, and determined that his will shall in all things be the law of his empire, even in matters beyond human control. It is quite in keeping with the impiety of the Catechism taught in the Russian schools, in which the worship of the Emperor, as a divine power, is inculcated! The papers have given an account of the cruelties practised on a convent of Nuns at Minsk, who also discharged among the people the functions of the Sisters of Charity in France, Belgium, and other Catholic countries. But the sequel is worse than the main narrative; by a letter in the Constitutionnel, it appears that of three of the sisters sentenced to the knout, one expired at the thirtieth blow; but, as everything that is ordered in Russia must be performed, the remaining twenty stripes were inflicted on the dead body! The two others expired soon after the infliction of the punishment! This exemplifies a piece of hypocrisy, peculiar, we believe, to the Russian Government. A sentence of death is never pronounced; but the punishment of the knout can be so varied in the degree of its severity, that no one whose death is directed by the authorities (he is never sentenced by the law) survives! This appears to have been the case in the present instance. The whole persecution looks more like an ebullition of revenge than a measure of policy. Anything that differs from the Autocrat's standard is crushed with all the terrific amount of power at his command. A short time ago it was the Jews, who, in hundreds, were exiled from their homes, and driven out to perish amid the snows of a Lithuanian winter. Now his hatred has turned against the Christians. Truly the Poles, who, in the too celebrated partition of their country, fell to the paternal care of Russia, are much to be pitied. Those subjected to Austria and Prussia live under despotisms also; but some degree of worldly wisdom mingles with their counsels. The Emperor of Austria is luckily an imbecile, without any will of his own; and Metternich has a sound mind, that does not like causeless persecution: provided the people do not talk politics, or dream of liberty, they are protected in all their material interests: impugn the Government and its policy, and he is without mercy; on theological ground they are safe. In Prussia, the Government is tinctured with the rationalist doctrines of the day, and tolerates each religion with a kind of Ministerial and official contempt for all; if it has any aversion, it is to the bold-speaking, inquiring, arguing Lutherans—who, strange to say, under a Protestant Monarchy, have been the only sect positively and openly persecuted. But as far as the people of Poland are concerned, each of these Powers is a far better master than Russia, which looks on all her subjects as portions of a great army, to be moved as its commander pleases, he being one to whom toleration, wisdom, and mercy are alike unknown.

The countrymen of Machiavelli have inherited nothing of the cold, deep, and passionless calculation of that great master of statecraft—in the worst sense of the term. The discontent in the Roman States is general; that it should manifest itself occasionally, is not surprising; but that those who play the part of patriots should exhibit such childish folly in their attempts against the Government is wonderful. The affair of the Bandieras is not yet forgotten: the facility with which they fell into the snare laid for them by the Government showed very little of that caution necessary to men who engage in the desperate game of rebellion. The folly of their landing on the coast of Italy was only exceeded by the insanity that prompted the gasconade of Prince Louis Napoleon, on the beach of Boulogne. In both these cases, the punishment of death and perpetual imprisonment was greatly disproportioned to the offence, for such attempts any settled Government can afford to despise.

Another rising has just occurred in the Roman States, as ill-advised and rash as the former. So utterly do the leaders of the Italian Liberals set all prudence at defiance, that it is almost impossible to avoid a suspicion that they are really but the tools of the Government itself. The movement has failed—and well it might, when the following is given as the mode in which it was got up:—

For the last three months it has been publicly reported in France that upon a certain day an insurrection would break out in the legations; and there are cafés in Paris and Marseilles in which the chiefs were publicly mentioned, and where the day of action, the assistance which they hoped to meet with from the garrisons of certain towns of Romagna, were the common topics of conversation. As if these reports, propagated everywhere, were insufficient to put the Government upon the alert, they have been published in the French, German, and English journals; and we saw, by a coincidence which must have sunk everybody, the Chief of Young Italy a refugee in London, publishing in one a work in which, after having set forth the grievances of the Italians, and deavouring to establish the legality of the insurrection, he concluded with these words:—"If we succeed, we shall gain friends and allies; if we fail, we shall be pitied and admired!"

And so they rush upon the destruction they take every means to prepare,—the dream of liberty ending only in the military commission and the file of muskets that confers political martyrdom, without even the useless pity and admiration of which they seem so ambitious, for absolute fatuity does not deserve either. Old Italy produced men of very different stuff from this; and, till Young Italy get rid of such weakness and drivelling, they will do nothing towards securing the liberty of their country. They must descend to the calculation of human means and human powers, deal less in hopes and more in certainties—must not so generously admit their opponents into their confidence; and, above all, remember that for everything there is a time. The power of Austria—on which all the States of Italy rely for support—is as yet too strong to be shaken.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR, THURSDAY EVENING.—[From our own Correspondent.]—The unfavourable state of the weather having continued from an early hour in the morning during nearly the whole of the day, has prevented her Majesty and the Prince Consort, and the infant Royal Family, from taking their usual equestrian exercise. It was the intention of his Royal Highness Prince Albert to have shot this morning over the Royal preserves at Flemish Farm; the arrangements were, however, countermanded, in consequence of the rain. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, attended by Lady Anna Maria Dawson and the Baroness de Spaeth, will have the honour of joining the Royal dinner party this evening. The Band of the 2nd Life Guards will perform during dinner; and the Queen's Private Band will be in attendance the remainder of the evening.

THE EARL OF VERULAM.—We regret to state that the Earl of Verulam continues much indisposed at Gorhambury. Earl and Countess Craven are still at Gorhambury. Lord and Lady Grimston have left the noble earl's seat on a short visit to Major Weyland and Lady Johnstone, at Woodeaton, Oxfordshire.

THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.—Yesterday week the curiosity of the good people of Eastbourne was in no slight degree excited by the rumour that the Duke of Wellington had passed through the town on his way to Seaford. The report proved true, and it subsequently appeared that his Grace had passed the night at Seaford, and next morning, after an early walk before breakfast, had returned to Eastbourne. On his arrival, his Grace visited the redoubt, a fragment Conjuat having been summoned to attend and "do it the honours." The Duke, after leaving the redoubt, mounted his horse and rode towards Hastings by Pevensey Bay. Here a carriage was in waiting, entering which, the Duke proceeded on his journey. This visit has given rise to numberless speculations as to its immediate object. The Harbour of Refuge, and the defence of the coast, afford ready subjects for such speculations.

MARRIAGE OF MR. BARON ROLFE.—The Hon. Mr. Baron Rolfe was on Thursday morning married to Miss Carr, of Great George-street, Westminster.

FASHIONABLE MOVEMENTS AT BRIGHTON. Brighton was never so full of company as at the present moment. The arrivals far outnumber the departures, and the drives and promenades present a gay and animated appearance. Several fashionable visitors are unable to obtain first-class houses.

DEATH OF SIR W. PEPYS.—Sir W. Weller Pepys, Bart., expired on Sunday last after a short illness, at Stapleford Abbots, Essex, the seat of the deceased baronet, who was eldest son of Sir William Weller Pepys, by Elizabeth, daughter of the Right Hon William Dowdeswell, was born on the 4th of May, 1778, and lived therefore in his 68th year. He was unmarried, and is succeeded in the baronetcy by his next brother, Lord Cottenham.

DANGEROUS ILLNESS OF THE HON. CAPTAIN LEICESTER.—Windsor, Thursday evening.—We regret to state that Captain the Hon. W. H. Leicester, only brother to Lord de Tabley, who burst a blood vessel while out with his regiment, the Grenadier Guards, in the Great Park, on Monday last, is not expected to survive but a very few hours. Lord de Tabley arrived at the Infantry Barracks yesterday from London, and has remained ever since in attendance upon his brother. An immense discharge of blood from the ruptured vessel took place this afternoon. An express by means of the electric telegraph at Slough, was immediately dispatched to London for further medical advice, and also for the attendance of those branches of Lord de Tabley's family now in town. Captain Leicester, who has been in the Grenadier Guards for upwards of fifteen years, is highly respected throughout the regiment.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE LORD MAYOR ELECT.—The Lord Chancellor has appointed Monday, the 3rd day of November (the first day of Michaelmas Term, the 2nd falling on Sunday), to receive at his lordship's residence, in George-street, Hanover-square, at 11 o'clock in the forenoon, Mr. Alderman John Johnson, Lord Mayor Elect, and the Members of the Corporation, for the purpose of signifying her Majesty's approbation of the choice which the citizens of London have made of Chief Magistrate for the year ensuing.

THE NEW HALL IN LINCOLN'S INN.—Her Majesty is expected to grace with her presence the opening of the New Hall in Lincoln's Inn. The benchers are awaiting the answer of the Queen, who will of course, in the event of accepting the invitation, fix the day for its celebration. The Hall will be opened before the commencement of Michaelmas Term.

METROPOLITAN IMPROVEMENTS.—The new street from Whitechapel to Spitalfields Church, in connexion with that from the London Docks, is named Commercial-street, Shadwell, and the whole line has been agreed up by the Commissioners of Woods and Forests. Although the sites for building upon have been advertised for some time, speculation is not very rife in that district as some have been disposed of.

CITY IMPROVEMENTS.—In consequence of the new improvements in the City, the parish church of St. Benetlink, in Threadneedle-street, is about to be pulled down. It has been determined that the work of demolition should be immediately commenced, but in consequence of the church of the adjoining parish (to which St. Be. etlink is thereafter to be united) being closed for repairs, the City authorities have arranged that the inhabitants of both parishes may not be deprived of the means of divine worship at one time, have allowed the sacred edifice to remain for a month longer.

ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.—For some time past a number of workmen have been employed in gilding the railings of the circular gallery which surmounts the top of the dome. The work having been completed, the gallery presents a splendid appearance, and greatly improves the exterior view of the magnificent pile, in consequence of its harmonising with the large gilt ball and cross at the top of the Cathedral.

COUNTRY NEWS.

SERIOUS RAILWAY ACCIDENT.

On Saturday night last an accident of a very serious kind took place on the Great North of England Railway, about four miles on the York side of Darlington. It appears, that at the York station, on Saturday night, considerable surprise was manifested at the arrival of the engine of the mail train, then overdue, bearing the letter-bags, but without the Post-office travelling and passenger carriages

Upon inquiry, it was found that the outer tire of the wheel, to which the flange is attached, broke, near the nut by which it was fastened to the inner tire. After breaking across at the nut, the outer tire rose, and the tire broke a second time at the next nut, and then a portion of the tire and flange came off the wheel, bearing the latter-bags, but without the Post-office travelling and passenger carriages

Upon inquiry, it was found that the outer tire of the wheel, to which the flange is attached, broke, near the nut by which it was fastened to the inner tire. After breaking across at the nut, the outer tire rose, and the tire broke a second time at the next nut, and then a portion of the tire and flange came off the wheel, bearing the let was with difficulty removed from the shattered timbers of the carriage, and borne on one of the doors to a neighbouring farm-house, where surgical assistance was, of course, promptly procured.

Mr Whitehead, who was in the same compartment with his wife, sustained no serious personal injury, but his feelings were, of course, much excited by the situation of the unfortunate lady. The passengers in the second carriage were buried under the coupé of the first one, which was also fillec and some delay took place in extricating them from their perilous situation; but when that was effected, it was happily found that none of them had sustained any injury beyond a few slight blows and scratches

The situation of Mrs. Whitehead was peculiarly distressing, but she bore her sufferings with a degree of fortitude that was quite astonishing. Mr Chapman, of Dalton, who occupies a farm near where the accident occurred was soon upon the spot, and kindly offered the use of his house, and Mrs Whitehead was conveyed thither on a door, supported by cushions taken from the carriages, and borne by six men.

The wheels that had been so completely detached from the carriage truck were found between two and three hundred yards along the line from the carriages, one pair broken

On Mrs Whitehead being removed to the home of Mr. Chapman, medica aid was procured, but the last accounts leave little hopes of the lady's re covery.

It is due to the servants of the Company to state that everything in the power was done to alleviate the feelings of the sufferers.

WOODSTOCK ELECTION.—Thomas Thornhill, Esq., of Woodleys, it is rumoured, will oppose the Duke of Marlborough's interest in that borough at the forthcoming election. Lord Alan Churchill, second son of the Duke of Marlborough, will, it is understood, be the other candidate.

WINDSOR ELECTION.—WINDSOR, Thursday Evening.—The intelligence of the death of Mr. Hamilton Rankeilor, which has been daily expected during the last fortnight, reached Windsor this morning; and, within a very short period afterwards, the following handbill was posted throughout the town:

"Sir John de Beauvoir for ever!—Free and Independent Electors of Windsor! Keep your powder dry. Your old friend, Sir John de Beauvoir takes the field for the fifth time, and, with the blessing of God on his and you united exertions, he hopes to obtain a great and glorious victory!!! " No other candidate, up to this evening, has publicly announced himself. The following are spoken of—Col. Reid, of the 2nd Life Guards; Mr John Walter Bearcroft; Captain William Bulkeley, 1st Life Guards; Mr Jeremiah Pilcher Southwark; Mr East Clayton; one of the sons of Lord Delaware; and Mr J E Arbon, private secretary to Prince Albert. The contest, however, is expected to be between Sir John de Beauvoir, Mr Walter, and Colonel Reid. It is stated that Colonel Reid will come forward on the Government and Castle interest; and that, under these circumstances, Captain Bulkeley will not muffer himself. A Mr. Miller, of Brighton, who was formerly resident at Windsor, arrived yesterday, and sounded several of the voters, with reference to their feelings towards Mr. Rowland Hill (of penny postage celebrity); but, from the ill success which attended his canvass, there is no probability of that gentleman offering himself.

DANGEROUS FLOODS IN THE NORTH.—There was a great quantity of rain in the neighbourhood of Newcastle upon-Tyne last week, which has swollen the rivers, and done considerable damage to property on their margins. On Thursday week the rain descended in torrents all day, and the Tyne, at high water, in the afternoon, overflowed its banks for several miles covering all the low grounds near Hexham and Newburn, carrying away the corn produce of several fields in stook, and doing serious injury to the potato and turnip crops. The quay at Newcastle was covered with water, and the cellars in the neighbourhood completely inundated During the ebb tide, the current was so strong as to carry away several vessels from their moorings, and the damage done among the shipping in the harbour is very extensive. The Ocean brig was driven on the Herd sands. The Dane, of Yarmouth, had her mainmast carried away, and the Dove steamer lost her foremast. The mate of the Atlantic, of Shields, was killed by the breaking of a warp, and the Blossom steamer was driven against the brig John in such violence as to stove in her quarter, and she was only kept from sinking with the greatest difficulty, her funnel being also carried away. The harbour was a complete scene of confusion, from the vessels adrift several wherries were sunk, and, indeed, it was impossible for a small boat "to live" The police boat had a narrow escape, having just got out between two vessels, when they were driven together with great violence The Blaydon station of the Newcastle and Carlisle Railway was knee deep in water, and the line, for several miles, was covered. The garden property about Hexham are still under water, and it is feared that the entire potato crop in those places will be destroyed. In the counties of Cumberland and Westmorland the rivers and streams overflowed their banks, and much damage of property ensued.

FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE SHEFFIELD, ASHTON UNDER-LYNE, AND MANCHESTER RAILWAY.—On Tuesday afternoon an inquest was held at the George and Dragon Inn, Charlsworth, on the body of a young man, aged nineteen years, named George Holt, who came by his death in consequence of being run by a train on the above line of railway, on the 17th of June evening previous. Wm Proctor deposed, that he was a stonemason, and was employed in erecting the new station house at Hadfield. Deceased was also employed as a stonemason along with him. He, in company with deceased and Robert Huntington, were returning from work on Friday evening, between six and seven o'clock, along the railway, when, between Dinting and Hadfield stations, the Manchester and Glossop came up behind and they lost sight of him. The train having passed, they found that he had been knocked down, and that one of his legs was taken off below the knee. He had also several wounds on the back part of the head, which was otherwise injured. He was quite dead when they got up to where he lay In answer to questions put by Superintendent Gretton, who was in attendance on the part of the railway company, the witness, Proctor, further stated that they had frequently been warned not to walk along the line. The jury deprecated in strong terms the conduct of those parties who risked their lives by continuing, in defiance of all warning to the contrary, to walk on the railway. A verdict of Accidental Death was returned.

INSURANCE IN SUFFOLK.—We regret to state that another fire took place on Monday night last week, on the farm of Mr Fairclough, at Belstead, Suffolk, by which the whole of the farm buildings, the wheat crop, excepted were destroyed, together with the commodious house and premises, which, it appears, were also insured in the Suffolk, and the property saved. The cause was evidently that of wilful incendiarism. Mr Cooke was present from some of the Offices. Of the origin of the fire there is, unhappily, no doubt. The buildings were insured in the Phœnix Fire-office, and the produce is amply protected by the Suffolk Fire-office.

SUICIDE OF A YOUNG LADY IN THE SERPENTINE.—On Saturday a protracted inquiry was held before Mr. Bedford, the Coroner, and a highly respectable jury, at the Malpas Arms Tavern, Charles street, Grosvenor square, touching the death of a female, apparently about eighteen years of age, whose body was found in the Serpentine River, under the following circumstances.—The jury, having been sworn, proceeded, with the Coroner, to the dead-house of St George's Workhouse, in Mount street, to view the body, which was that of a fine made young woman, and dressed as follows:—White straw bonnet, trimmed with pink and white ribbon; a drab shawl, with red figured border; black-coloured gown; her linen was marked "M. A. E." She had a mole on her left cheek, dark hair, and hazel eyes. The jury, having viewed the body, returned to the inquest-room, when the following evidence was adduced:—Robert Sinclair, a boatman belonging to the Royal Humane Society, deposed, that on Friday afternoon about half past six o'clock, whilst he was proceeding along the northern side of the Serpentine River, to attend to the bathers, he saw a bonnet and shawl lying on one of the seats. Witness went on to the spot, examined the dress, and commenced dragging near the spot, and after about two minutes succeeded in finding the body of the deceased. Witness rowed to the mansion-house with the body, and gave it in charge to Mr. Wilkinson, the Superintendent Witness had since searched the place where the bonnet and shawl were found, but could not find anything to lead to her identity. A verdict of "Found Drowned" was ultimately recorded. The body lies at St. George's Workhouse, Mount street, Grosvenor-square, for identification.

WHY THE ANCIENTS HAD NO PRINTED BOOKS.—What was the reason that the Greeks and Romans had not the advantage of printed books. The answer will be, from 99 persons in 100—because the mystery of printing was not then discovered. But this is altogether a mistake. The secret of printing must have been discovered many thousands of times before it was used, or could be used. The inventive powers of man are divine; and also his stupidity is divine—as Cowper so playfully illustrates in the slow development of the art, through successive generations of immortal dunces. It took centuries or blockheads to raise a joint stool into a chair; and it required something like a miracle of genius, in the estimate of elder generations, to reveal the possibility of toughening a chair into a chaise-longue, or a sofa. Yet, these were inventions that cost mighty throes of intellectual power But still, as respects printing, admirable is the stupidity of man, it was really not quite equal to the task of evading an object which stared him in the face with so broad a gaze. It did not require an Athenian intellect to read the main secret of printing in many scores of processes which the ordinary uses of life were daily repeating. To any intelligent observer of the artisans amongst various mechanic artisans, all that is essential in printing must have been known to every nation that struck coins and medals. Not, therefore, any want of a printing art—that is, of an art for multiplying impressions—but the want of a cheap material for receiving such impressions, was the obstacle to an introduction of printed books even as early as Plautus. The ancients did apply printing to records of silver and gold; to marble, and many other substances cheaper than gold and silver, they did not, since each monument required a separate effort of inscription. Simply this defect it was of a cheap material for receiving impresses, which from its very fountains the early resources of printing. Some twenty years ago, this view of the case was luminously expounded by Dr. Whately, the present Archbishop of Dublin, and with the merit, I believe, of having first suggested it Since then, this theory has received indirect confirmation. - Blackwood's Magazine.

POSTSCRIPT.

THE ARRIVAL OF M. THIERS.—In our first impression, we announced exclusively the arrival of M. Thiers in London. He came to Southampton from Gibraltar by the Queen, Oriental and Peninsular steam-ship, Captain Russell, which arrived on Thursday afternoon, at half-past four o'clock, with the usual mails and about twenty four passengers. He was accompanied by Count —, a natural son of Napoleon. Captain Sir G. Sartorius was also a passenger: he embarked at Lisbon. The Queen had an exceedingly rough passage, especially in the Bay of Biscay, where it blew a complete hurricane. This accounts for her being a short time overdue. She left Gibraltar on the 28th of September: Cadiz, Oct. 1st; Lisbon, the 4th; Oporto, the 6th; Vigo, the 8th; and Corunna, the 9th. On the 10th, at 9 o'clock, p.m., the Queen passed a large steamer showing blue lights, supposed to be the Tarus, outward bound. The Queen brings a full cargo of fruits, consisting principally of oranges, grapes, &c.

CENTRAL RAILWAY STATIONS.—At the Court of Common Council, yesterday, a petition was presented by the Lord Mayor Elect from the directors of the Direct London and Manchester Railway Company (Hastrick's line) for leave to purchase the site of Farringdon-market for a passenger station. The proposal excited considerable discussion; but, ultimately, a motion for referring the petition to the Improvement Committee was carried by a large majority. Mr. Lambert Jones then presented a petition from the London and Birmingham Railway Company. Mr. Creed, the secretary of the company, stated, in answer to questions, that it would pass under Skinner street, by the properties of Messrs. Wood and Gilbarts, at the surface. Neither Skinner street, Aldersgate street, nor Smithfield would be touched. Mr. Harrison observed that it should be understood that the petition was merely referred to the committee for inquiry alone, and that if any other petitions were presented they would be similarly referred. The petition was then ordered to be referred to the Committee

THE REPEAL DEMONSTRATION AT LIMERICK.—The demonstration in favour of a Repeal of the Union, and the first which has occurred in Killarney since the commencement of the agitation, took place on Monday, at which at least 50,000 persons were present. The place selected for the meeting was a field on the borders of the lower lake. Mr. O'Connell, who arrived, accompanied by Mr. S. O'Brien, Mr. J. H Dunne, jun., and Mr Primrose, about three, and was accompanied to the place of meeting by the trades of Tralee and Killarney, who formed themselves into a procession, and with bands and banners met him about a mile from the town, from whence they proceeded in the same order to the meeting. The procession arrived on the ground a about four o'clock, immediately after which the chair was taken by Kean Mahony, Esq. The first resolution was then proposed by Mr. M. J. O'Connell, M.P., and seconded by the Rev. R. O'Connor. Mr. D Mahony, of Dunloe, J.P., having expressed a desire to oppose the resolution, and to declare his reasons for disapproving of the Repeal agitation, then addressed the meeting. He said he came there to pay every respect in his power to the Liberator of his country, for, differing as he did on the Repeal of the Union, he yet entertained the highest regard for him, and believed he was thoroughly determined to promote the welfare of his country There were two modes adopted of putting down Repeal agitation, of which he did not approve, namely, prosecution and persecution, for he believed the only means of putting down agitation was agitation alone. Their object, of course, was to get a Repeal of the Union, but if that took place there should be a reform in the Irish House of Commons according to the increased population, but that was not necessary. He maintained that a Repeal of the Union would bring about a collision between the two countries unless the terms of the contract were previously arranged; and he looked on, in any of the speeches in the Conciliation Hall, or elsewhere, for any plan in which such terms were proposed. He would not trespass further on their attention, but to thank them for the kindness they evinced towards him, and the patience with which they listened to his observations - Mr. O'Connell then said that he was always proud of the men of Kerry, but he was that day doubly proud of them it had been said—and he believed he would not be mistaken—these banquets or meetings of the people which took place in so many parts of Ireland, no one who differed in opinion with them would have any chance of being heard. That was calculated to injure the press; but that was not the case. A time or a moment was given that day He would say that haughty England, and all those who opposed the legislative rights of Ireland that they were liars and prevaricators, and that the people were prepared to listen to the arguments of those opposed to them with patience and courtesy, who spoke sentiments directly at variance with their own. They had contradictors, that day, present, and they were in the midst of harmony Mr. O'Connell proceeded to combat the arguments of that gentleman, and after impressing on the minds of the people the necessity of preparing for the registries, as an event which appears for the county, concluded by moving the resolution those who heard him the necessity of registering their votes, in order to give their suffrages for a representative who would represent the feelings of the people. The resolution was then put and carried unanimously and adopted, after which the meeting separated, and the vast assemblage returned to their own homes without the slightest disturbance. A dinner took place in the evening at Killarney, at which Mr. O'Connell, M.P., was taken by Mr Denis Scane Lalor, at whose right sat Mr. O'Connell, Mr. Smith O'Brien, Mr. Maurice O'Connell, Mr Reidy, M P. for Limerick, and Mr. Ray, M.P. for Kerry, at the end of the table. Among those present was the Mayor of Limerick, J. H. Dwyer, jun., of Dublin, F. T. Meagher, Esq., J. Primrose, Esq., &c. Shortly after eleven the assembly separated quietly.

THE REVENUE.—The Revenue for the present quarter exhibits only made up last evening; we understand, as compared with the corresponding quarter of last year, it will exhibit a decrease. Considering, however, the great reductions which have been made in the duty on various articles, it is considered favourable. In the Customs, we believe there will be a large deficiency, amounting to about £1,000,000, but this is easily accounted for by the reduction in the duty on sugars, and the small introduction of foreign corn during the last quarter as compared with the corresponding quarter of last year. The Excise, on the contrary, notwithstanding the large reduction of the duty on many articles, will present an increase on the quarter estimated at £50,000. In the Post Office there will be an increase, but not to so great an extent as might have been expected, as the increasing extent of business has necessitated a corresponding with it a heavy expenditure. In Stamps and Taxes there will be an increase, and also in the Miscellaneous; but in the latter is included money received from China, amounting to about £ 50,000. The Property Tax will exhibit a small increase, arising from the postponement of the dividends by the Act of last session. In the other branches of the Revenue there is little alteration. On the whole, we understand that the Quarter's Revenue will exhibit a decrease on the corresponding quarter of last year, will show a decrease of about £300,000.

PORTUGAL.—We have letters from Lisbon to the 3rd ult. They state that the vintage, which just commenced, promises to be very abundant. The wine in Portugal for the last two years. Owing to the great quantity of rain that has fallen during the summer the grapes are very watery, and, while some are rotten, others are quite unripe. This evil, unfortunately, is not local, but extends throughout the whole country. Although, according to the last statement laid by the Government before the Cortes, the deficit had been converted into a surplus of thirty nine contos for the current year, the Portuguese finances seem to be gradually falling back into their former disorder, for the public employés are already some months in arrears of their pay; and the Government, besides anticipating the monthly instalments payable by the tobacco contractors up to May next, has been obliged to raise a loan of 300 contos, and, it is said, is endeavouring to obtain a further accommodation to a still greater amount The new steamer, Conde da Tojus, lately purchased in England, for the service of the tobacco contractors, has captured a smuggling schooner on the coast of Algarve, laden with tobacco and tea, and sailing under Portuguese colours.

"THE ECLAIR" STEAMER.

In our Journal of last week, we detailed the frightful mortality on board the Eclair steam sloop, and her arrival at the Motherbank, with the yellow flag, with a black ball in its centre, flying from her mainmast head, emblematical of death on board. We now annex a representation of the ill-fated vessel; with the relative positions of the Lazarette, and a foreign ship at the Motherbank, performing quarantine. The calamity has been officially investigated, and we annex the Report :—

The quarantine papers reached this office on the afternoon of Monday, the 29th ult., when the Superintendent-General of Quarantine was immediately sent for. He happened to be out of town at the moment, but early the following morning (Tuesday, the 30th) he proceeded, together with Mr. Arnott, to the Motherbank; and enclosed is their report upon the whole case, by which it will be seen that no time was lost in affording every possible relief to both the sick and the healthy, and that the vessel was all along provided with ample medical assistance, two surgeons being on board.

Council Office, Oct. 4. C. C. F. GREVILLE.

"TO C. C. F. GREVILLE, ESQ. "October 3, 1845.

"SIR,—Agreeably to instructions from the Lords of her Majesty's Council, we proceeded to the quarantine station at the Motherbank early on the morning of the 30th, to inquire into the particulars connected with the mortality and the prevalence of a malignant fever on board her Majesty's steamer Eclair, which arrived on the evening of the 28th ult., from the coast of Africa. Having come alongside and interrogated the Commander Harston and Surgeon Bernard, the following is the result of our inquiries.—

"L'Eclair sailed from Devonport in November last, having aarew of 146 officers and men, for the coast of Africa, on which station she remained until the 23rd of July last, up to which period she had lost nine men from the common coast fever. Four days after sailing from Sierra Leone, one man died with fever and black vomit, the first case of the kind which had taken place; this man had been brought on board on the morning of the 23d, having been the three previous days on shore. During her voyage to Gambia and to Cape Buena Vista, where she arrived on the 21st of August, eighteen were attacked with the same fever, with black vomit, of which number thirteen died. At Buena Vista, the disease continued to spread rapidly amongst the crew, when permission having been obtained from the Portuguese Governor, it was determined to land the crew, sick and well, and purify the vessel. A fort was appropriated for the accommodation of the seamen and sick, and the officers obtained lodgings in the town. Every measure was taken to purify the ship by washing and whitewashing, fumigation, &c., all the Kroomen remaining on board with the exception of six employed in attendance upon the sick. The disease, however, continued to prevail amongst the officers and men on shore, thirty-one men having died between the 21st of August and the 5th of September.

"Under these circumstances a consultation was held by three naval surgeons, and upon their report and recommendation it was determined that the steamer and crew should proceed to England. The ship's company were in consequence re-embarked, and sailed on the 8th of September. Captain Escourt, having been taken ill the day before leaving Buena Vista, died on the 16th. At Buena Vista, the assistant surgeon Hurte, of the Eclair, died, when Mr. Maclure, a naval surgeon, passenger in the Growler, and Mr. Coffy, assistant-surgeon of the Growler, volunteered their services on board; here also seven seamen volunteered from the Growler Dr. Maclure died on the voyage to Madeira, and one of the volunteer seamen was taken ill of the fever and recovered

"Upon the arrival of the steamer at Madeira, the authorities refused permission to communicate with the shore, as had been previously done by the French at Goree; but at this island Mr. Bernard, a naval surgeon, volunteered his services, and was received on board, with two seamen. From the day of her leaving from Madeira, the 21st of September, up to this date, the 30th, seven deaths have taken place from the fever, and eight new cases have occurred, viz.:—

"The last case, [speaking on board, the first measure deemed necessary was that the ship should be kept in strict quarantine.

"It was that the healthy should be separated from the sick. The steamer was therefore ordered to the Foul Bill Quarantine Station at Stangate creek; and an arrangement having been made with the Lords of the Admiralty, by which two ships in ordinary, with a proper supply of bedding, &c., were ordered to be fitted out for the reception of the Superintendent of Quarantine at Stangate, with the view of personally superintending the arrangements, we proceeded to Stangate creek, and having ascertained the number of officers and men who had adhered except in attack of the fever viz., forty-one, they were directed to be immediately transferred to the Revenge, having first undergone the operation of ablution, and afterwards provided with clean clothing and bedding. All those who had recovered from the fever, together with such number of convalescents as were in a state to be moved, were directed to be transferred to the Benbow, leaving with the Revenge the sick, and such other persons as the surgeon and the commander might think necessary; the Kroomen also to remain on board with one of whom had been attacked with fever), excepting such number as might be thought necessary to assist on board the Revenge or B

"Since the 30th ult., three seamen have died, but we are happy to state that no fresh cases of fever has occurred since the 29th ult., and that at present there are only two men confined to bed with the fever, and eleven convalescents under the care of the two medical officers, a surgeon and assistant-surgeon, who have been on board ever since the Eclair sailed from Madeira; and we have a confident hope, from the present state of the crew and the measures adopted, that the progress of the disease is arrested.

"We have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient servants,

"W. PUIN, Superintendent General of Quarantine

"JAMES M ARNOTT."

The Eclair is moored right in the middle of the Medway, off Stangate Creek, while the Revenge and Benbow are at their usual moorings, close on the opposite shore. From the direction the wind has been in since her arrival, they have been able as yet to keep well to windward of her. She has the yellow flag, with a black ball in the centre, flying, and her rigging is crowded with hammocks and bedding. It is no wonder, then, that they should have been able as yet to keep well to windward of her. Thomas Pym, the Superintendent General of the Quarantine Service, has been down, and, with Captain Loch, the Captain-Superintendent of the Stangate Creek station, has been personally superintending the arrangements.

The medical officer doing duty on board the Eclair has also been attacked with fever. Dr. W Rogers, assistant surgeon of the Ocean, in pursuance of orders from the Admiralty, proceeded to take his medical charge on Sunday last. The sick occupy one hulk, the healthy whites and the convalescents another.

The last marine artillery man, who took the fever on board the Eclair, died on Tuesday, and was buried in the quarantine ground.

A correspondent of the Times says :—"The sick have not yet been removed from the Eclair. A number had been transferred to the medical charge on Sunday last. The sick occupy one hulk, the healthy whites and the convalescents another.

THE ACCIDENT AT THE SUSPENSION BRIDGE, YARMOUTH.—An important question has arisen as to the coasts of the injured on the bodies of the unfortunate persons who met their deaths by the falling of the Yarmouth Suspension Bridge some months ago. It appears that the coroner, contrary to precedent in many lives are lost, has charged for seventy nine inquisitions coroner's fees, 2l 8s. 8d. each, and jurymen's and officers' fees By the 7th Will 4, and 1st Vic. c. 68, the coroner is required, immediately after the inquest, to pay all fees and charges before he can make out a bill to the county, &c. In the present case the coroner, after the verdict was returned adjourned the case sine die, in order to adjust the claims for finding the bodies, jurymen's fees, &c. (the last alone amounting to 25l.); they have, however, never been recalled. It has been said that Mr. Baron Alderson has expressly held that the authority of the coroner ceases after such an adjournment. The coroner, therefore, in making out his bill to the Act of Parliament, will have his charges considerably curtailed, as the council cannot, on that ground, even were they disposed, grant the extra 6s. 8d. and the question of the 2l for each will be decided at the quarter sessions

NEW PHYSICIANS' HALL, EDINBURGH.

"The practice of physic," saith Maitland, the venerable historian, "having been greatly abused in Edinburgh by foreign impostors, [illegible] ignorant persons, both men and women, who, without the least knowledge of that learned science, audaciously presumed to practise as Physicians, not only to the scandal of that noble art, but to the great danger and destruction of the health and lives of his Majesty's subjects; the considerations whereof induced the King, by his letters patent of the twenty-ninth of November, anno, 1681, to erect certain Physicians in Edinburgh, and their successors, into a body politic and corporate, to have perpetual succession by the name, style, and title, of 'The President and Royal College of Physicians at Edinburgh.'"

This charter excluded any but licentiates from practising medicine under a penalty of forty shillings, scarcely the amount of two modern fees; a lenient penalty, which successive acts have repealed. The College also had the unenviable privilege of searching and inspecting, twice in every year, "all drugs and medicine within the jurisdictions of Edinburgh and Leith; and such as shall be found bad and unwholesome shall be thrown into the streets and destroyed." Probably, from the unpleasant nature of a duty, which involved the emptying of such slops as apothecaries of old dealt in, the learned body have for a long time discontinued the exercise of this privilege.

The College first held its meetings in the Erogate; but the building becoming ruinous, they erected, towards the end of the last century, a large and handsome edifice in George-street, which lost much of its effect from receding too much from the main line of street. It was situated immediately opposite to St. Andrew's Church, which has the opposite fault of protruding unduly upon the footpath. This drew from a sensible traveller the remark, that "the forwardness of the Clergy, and the modesty of the Physicians, had spoiled one of the finest streets in Europe." The old Hall, besides being a good architectural object outside, was a well-fitted and commodious one within, and quite adequate to the wants of the learned body. But the site on which it stood was coveted by the managers of the Commercial Bank, and they made a tempting offer for its purchase. Instead of adapting the Hall to the purposes of a bank, the affluent buyers have pulled down every stone of it, and are erecting upon its site one of the handsomest banking houses in Scotland.

The Physicians then removed to Queen-street, which runs parallel to George-street, and also (though at some two miles distance) to the Frith of Forth, of which a view is commanded by the inhabitants from the upper windows of their houses. Of the new Hall, we present our readers with a sketch. The top figure of the façade is that of Hygeia, the Goddess of Health. The other two represent Æsculapius and Hippocrates. They are sculptured by Mr. Alexander Ritchie, a pupil of Thorwaldsen. The building forms a pleasing ornament to the street, but is a pretty, rather than an imposing structure.

The Edinburgh College of Physicians consists, at present, of Dr. Wm. Beilby, president, Dr. R. Renton, vice-president, with forty resident fellows, and ninety three who do not reside in the city. The forty form but a proportion of the rest of the faculty settled in the metropolis of the North, which may be designated

A place where Physicians most do congregate.

We question if there be a city in the world where so many of the inhabitants, as those of Edinburgh, are entitled to write M.D. after their names. The fellows of the College, however, form the élite of the local practitioners of Edinburgh.

JENNY LIND.

"So veiled beneath the simplest guise,
Thy radiant genius shone."

Thanks to our Frankfort correspondent we are enabled to publish an accurate likeness of the "Schwedische Nachtigall," as the fair Jenny Lind is called in Germany, and as she is likely to be designated wherever this Swedish nightingale shall be heard. The fame of the sunny sky of Italy for singers is doomed to be rivalled in northern regions. Russia sent us a tenor with a beautiful organ in Ivanoff; Norway has produced an Ole Bull, the child of passion on the violin Sweden exported to Paris a Sylphide in Lucile Grahn, who, by the side of Taglioni, has won plaudits; and the habitués of the Italian Opera, in the French capital, were one day startled by hearing a Swedish prima donna, the Fraulein Nissen, sing with Grisi, and participate in the ovations bestowed on the Diva. But, wonder upon wonder! Meyerbeer, the celebrated composer—who, since the decay of the gifted Falcon's voice, has been on the search for years for a prima donna, and who, by some musical wags, has been pronounced to be the real "Wandering Jew"—selects a Stockholm singer to fill the void left by Falcon and Malibran; and the thrones which Grisi undisturbed had filled for such a lengthened period, in Paris and London, is to be disputed by this northern nightingale. And there is the famed Jenny Lind before you. Look at her well. You cannot pronounce those features to be beautiful; nay, ungallant critics might call her plain; and yet, beneath that "simple guise" a "radiant genius" may indeed be recognised. Rather above the middle height, Jenny Lind is slender, but particularly graceful in figure and action. She ...

very fair, with a profusion of beautiful auburn tresses, but it is entirely in the expression of her eyes, that the truly great artiste will be identified: the feeling and intelligence of these bright orbs are unmistakeable. Jenny Lind was born at Stockholm, on the 8th of February, 1820. Her parents were poor, and kept a school. From an early age the beauty of Jenny's voice was remarked. A composition once heard was retained in her memory, and she could sing it off note by note. A musical teacher of the name of Croelius introduced her to Count Packe, the Director of the Court Theatre, and through this introduction she became a pupil of the Stockholm Conservatorium, where her progress was astonishing. Her memorable début in Agatha in Weber's "Der Freischutz," will never be forgotten in the Stockholm theatrical annals. In Weber's "Euryantha," and as Alice in Meyerbeer's "Robert le Diable," her triumph was equally signal. Resolved to pursue her musical studies, she went to Paris, for the advantage of taking lessons of Manuel Garcia. She was thunderstruck at her first interview with that maestro, when he told her, "Mon enfant, vous n'avez plus de voix." The fact was, that the organ, from overwork, had been weakened in volume. Garcia recommended her to abstain for three months from practice to recover from the fatigue. Subsequently she was introduced to Meyerbeer, who heard her sing, at a trial with a full orchestra at the Grand Opera, three scenas from "Norma," "Robert," and "Der Freischutz." Meyerbeer was in raptures, and immediately engaged her for the Berlin Opera. In less than two months she studied and acquired the German language, as evidence of the facility with which she can master foreign tongues. She made her début in 1844, in "Norma," and at once took her position as a first rate artiste. The only original part she has yet sustained has been in Meyerbeer's "Camp of Silesia." Since that period it has been one continued career of successes wherever she has been heard. The Lessee of Drury Lane Theatre went expressly to Berlin, to engage her, and she signed an agreement with Mr. Bunn, for twenty performances, either for last May, or the present month of October. The delay was specified, to enable her to learn the English language. We have not the slightest doubt but that she will honourably keep faith with Mr. Bunn; but the precise period of her début will be delayed, inasmuch as, through the intervention of the King of Prussia, she has entered into a fresh engagement, from the 1st of November next, for three years, at terms little short of £4000 per annum, with two months' congé during the year—which leave of absence may be purchased by the Berlin Director for £240.

Most liberal offers have been also tendered to her by Mr. Lumley's agents, for her Majesty's Theatre; but we repeat the expression of our belief, that, whenever her début takes place in this country, it will be on the Drury Lane boards: the high character Jenny Lind bears forbidding the belief that she will depart from a written contract, signed in presence of the Earl of Westmoreland, our Ambassador in Berlin, one of her best patrons.

The writer of this little narrative of Jenny Lind had the good fortune to hear her at Frankfort last month, in Bellini's "Sonnambula." The house was crowded to excess, and even the side scenes were filled with auditors, disappointed of places in front of the curtain. The sensation that she created in the part of Amina can only be compared to that which was wont to attend the delineations of Malibran in the same part, and that is awarding the highest possible praise to the Swedish Syren.

Jenny Lind has a voice of extraordinary compass, the only defect in which is a deficiency of volume in the medium portion of the register. Her upper notes are delicious, as clear as a bell, and she warbles with the facility of a nightingale. Whilst her execution is of the most brilliant kind, nothing can approach the exquisite propriety and aptness of her cadenzas; they always come in at the happy moment; she never sacrifices sense to sound. Her simplicity of style is indeed most rigid; but this charming naturalness it is which goes so home to the hearts of her hearers. Her shake is perfect—truly marvellous—proving that she must have an intuitive knowledge of her art, as well as the best culture. Her style is full of impulse; or, as the French have it, of abandon. In the absence of all stage trickery or conventionalism may be distinguished this child of genius. Her opening cavatina in the presence of Amina's friends, and her finale were contrasted with the highest skill. In the first, was the modest, subdued expression of joy—in the last, the triumphal outbreak of rapture at being restored to Elvino. The untiring energy of this last vocal display, after two encores, electrified the band as well as the audience. Never shall we forget the energy of the conductor, Professor Guhr, a first-rate musician—he, throwing away his bâton, clapped his hands furiously over the stage lamps after the exhibition of wondrous power on the part of Jenny Lind.

NEW BETTING ROOM, NEWMARKET.

NEW BETTING ROOM, NEWMARKET.

The New Betting Room was instituted in the autumn of last year for the accommodation of those visitors to Newmarket who had previously, and with good reason, made loud complaint of the absence of such a desideratum. The New Betting Room stands on the site of Messrs. Weatherby's old offices, which was adapted to its present purpose by Mr. George Tatter sall, of Pall-mall. It immediately adjoins the Jockey Club Rooms (which were given by mistake for this locality in a former number), and is attended by all the visitors to Newmarket—habitual and casual—due care being taken by a responsible committee to exclude the black sheep from the fold.

O YOU think, Sir, it's safe to venture a little upon Railroads, for I get quite savage to see every body making hundreds and thousands every day close under my nose, as the saying is, whilst I am shilly shallying and letting all the show go by; why, would you believe it, Sir, I curled our Baker's man's hair the other day to make a Referee of him! Thus spoke my most sapient Hair-dresser, who had got inoculated with the Railroad disorder, and showed the foregoing symptoms of the present plague. At every turn do you meet with excited victims brimful of wondrous tales of somebody with nothing yesterday and to day rolling in thousands, how, they dont exactly know, but that he has done the right thing. You walk quietly into your Butcher's, on your way to town, with your mind, that is the mind of your stomach, nicely balanced between a loin or a leg for the morrow's dinner, when the hitherto quiet obese slaughterer leaves with the most alarming vivacity a half dismembered leg of mutton, taking no heed of the servant girl who has been told to make haste, and who taps the blue dish with the street-door key, unmindful of all except the young man with the hammy face and blue blouse, (who amuses himself with giving killing looks at her, and killing slaps at the blue bottles); all these are as nothing to him, he leaves them to take care of themselves, and takes you by the button into his back parlour, and asks you as a man of business which is the line that is sure to tell, as he will upon your word write for five hundred shares; for the man at the little cag-mag shop round the corner, wrote for a bushel of shares that went up ever so much, and nobody knows what he has made.

Even your Baker, a careful Scotchmen, apologises for intruding upon you, but begs you to inform him where some crack-jaw named Line either in Wales or the Continent, is situated, as he has paid his first deposit, and should like to have some better security for his money than the zinc plate against some doorway in the City which has the aforesaid "out-of-the-way" name upon it.

A little apple faced Government clerk, a most simple-minded cultivator of bulbous roots, who only cares in his blue bag, which he daily carried empty or full to the office and back, met me the other evening, but the smile had passed from his face and his brow was clouded. Here's times, said he, this is a land of freedom? gammon! Every man's house his castle? pooh! You know my garden? the rubps, the dahlias, the little fountain, the never-mind! its all up with me and with them, the railroad is coming to destroy that which has taken my life to perfect; they promise remuneration; what can they give me; is it to be supposed that I can shave at my window, with a roaring snorting engine and train whisking by, within a foot of my nose, or that an decent woman can lay in bed, with the world rushing by on a line with her bedroom window.

They got over my garden wall the other night; I heard them; I lifted my window slowly and mistook them for thieves; I was not to know; I fired bang! something fell with a thump and away scampered the lot. I bustled into the garden to catch the wounded bird, and found that I had shot a Theodolite. The next day a polite note came to say that they had got all they wanted and that I might keep the Theodolite to see how far it was into the middle of next week—ruffians, Sir. I wish you a good morning, Sir! and he departed grumbling on his way.

The poor Country! Everybody's brain is turned; trade is topsyturvy; the cobbler no longer sticks to his last, and every man gets into a new line. It seems settled that the face of nature shall only be seen through a grille, that we shall only travel by steam, and the only thing now to avoid, in your choice of a Line, is jostling against a rival sanctioned by Parliament, which will not long be possible. How is this wonderful revolution managed? Simply enough—more simply than the majority of dabblers imagine. Some speculative young gentleman unfolds his scheme to a few friends with compasses on their legs, dips his pen in red ink, and marks out a Line—no matter where to, so that it is not across the Channel—this would be too much, at present, for there Nature gives them a positive cut: he is the projector! He then takes a Street Directory, and, amidst Bankers, Merchants, and Baronets, if possible, seeks for his Directors. This, well seasoned with a few Cheltenham superannuated Majors and Colonels, does very well, but much better if he can book a Lord or two; but this is now becoming easier every day, for they do condescend to nibble, and, at the same time, allow their Right Honourable Ladies to dabble pretty largely—indeed it has almost entirely superseded Cards. He then boldly sketches out some provisionally-registered North Nibble'em, or any other name that strikes his fancy, with branches everywhere; capital, £8,000,000, in shares of £25 each; deposit, £2 12s. 6d. per share; with power to decrease the capital to £1,000,000, should the branches be carried out by auxiliary companies. The prospectus is soon filled with the Engineers, Solicitors, Interim Secretary, Bankers, &c., who all equally neglect their legitimate business, to go it by steam. This slight arrangement makes the projector, or Frankenstein, of the Demon:

As soon as this is completed, the newspaper swells with the mighty scheme, and bangs out an advertisement longer than anybody ever read, stating the advantages to be superior to those of any other Line—in fact, it palpably shows that you can actually coin money without being called to an account for it. There is found at the conclusion of it a delicate hint as to the form of the Letter of Application, showing the timid and the ignorant how to apply for the aforesaid valuable scrip, and, at the same time, stating that, after the —— of ——, all applications for shares, even from their own respected mothers, or bosom friends, must be refused. Away rush all the timid, the lovely, the respectable, and the tag-rag and bob-tail; they watch, they pant, tortured with apprehension; at last the Letter of Allotment arrives, the Company being satisfied of the high respectability of the party applying, from the reference, who, in nine cases out of ten, is a respectable-looking old vagabond, with powdered hair and spectacles, who does the reference business at 2s. 6d. per head, which enables him to lodge in a respectable house, and better to carry on the dodge. This difficulty got over, the fortunate holder of the letter turns his hungry eyes about for a victim. He rushes to the Lane, which swarms with the best speculators; the hum of many voices proclaims the temple of the Gods, which not ladylike a young woman as to supposed, if the Gods are there, to be found in such a place, so full of cabs, and numbers the footpath at the entrance with their squabbling. Here frets and fumes the millionaire, and the man with nothing but a hard egg in his pocket and his letter of promise; they are up at one premium; the letter is sold by a broker, who retains the seller to a memorandum of parliamentary document, as having accepted those shares of the Company. He seizes the difference (one pound profit on each share), buys himself a suit of clothes, and becomes respectable—outside. Then, with all the effrontery that a new coat gives him, and with the aid of a real dinner, he dashes at each new call, as it is announced—sells his Letter at any premium—and is deaf to any future call.

There is a curious animal among the speculators called a Stag, who works the oracle with immense perseverance; he not only writes in his own name, but in fifty others for shares in everything and anything. Proteus-like, he is either the applicant or the referee, gives himself an excellent character to all inquirers, and changes his dress as often as his Railroads—signs Jack Robinson in a broad-brimmed hat, and John Nokes in a narrow-brimmed gossamer. In fact, he flies who leads forging with the greatest gravity and decorum. One or two of these animals have been caught and kept for public view; but there is a number yet undiscovered, who hide their horns amidst the rush and press of the insane multitude of speculators.

Every available doorway is crowded with flaming zinc plates from the scraper to the fan-light, and covered with names of Railways, from Shoreditch to Whitechapel; from the Elephant and Castle to the Pyramids. Die-sinkers and engravers are driven to the verge of desperation by excited projectors and directors, who all want their plates at a Railroad pace—penny-a-liners, and reporters are out of their wits; even the colossal advertisemements of Railways have completely jammed the news into a contemptible corner. Papers entirely devoted to the mania of the times have started into existence and flourished beyond precedent. Friends no longer meet you with the kind inquiry of "How's your family?" but with eager grasp ask "Have you no Railway?" The out-of-town of 1843 is no longer out of Town, instead of omnibus distance. It is now Railroad distance; a man talks of going thirty miles home to dinner with perfect nonchalance; nor does it create surprise for a friend to be talking to you of a mid-day in Cornhill and supper in bed in Birmingham that morning as he sat at breakfast. "Slow and sure," the adage of our grandmothers, has exploded.—"The rapids are near;" he who can't "go along, keep moving," had better be buried. Every study is put aside for the study of locomotion. Boys to be available must be engineers, to walk about with medallotes and magnified dogchains, for nothing will be attended to until we have lined the globe into a Railroad cage. That word line has become the staple one of the language: the world is mad upon it, so much so, that a country friend wrote to me the other day to buy him fifty shares in the Equinoctial Line.

FUNERAL OF THE LATE EARL SPENCER.—The late Earl Spencer's remains were removed from Wretton Hall, near Brandon, yesterday (Friday), and were conveyed by railway, by a special train to Weedon, where the funeral carriage was formed; the deceased Earl's remains, by his express wish, being placed in the family vault in the village church of Brington, near Althorp, so that not the least unnecessary parade might be occasioned at the hall. The body was removed direct to the place of interment. All the arrangements were conducted with the greatest order and unanimity, agreeably to the late Earl's desire. Earl Spencer was present as chief mourner at the funeral of his venerated brother. The Hon. and Rev. George Spencer was also present.

SCIENTIFIC EXPEDITION.—Mr. Hartway, who has for some years been employed by the Horticultural Society in making collections for their gardens at Mexico and Guatemala, has just been sent to California which was explored for the same purpose some years since by the late Mr. Douglas. The fate of this last traveler was very tragical, for on his return home by way of the Sandwich Islands, he there fell into a pit dug for catching wild bulls, in which there happened to be one, when the infuriated animal gored him to death.

FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE RIVER.—On Sunday evening, about twelve o'clock as the Citizen C steamer, without passengers, was running down to her moorings, she came into collision with the ferry boat plying between the Red house, Batteries, and the White house, Pimlico The boat was upset, and Mr Power, landlord of the Grenadier Tavern, Chester-mews, Chester-square, was unfortunately drowned.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

THE THEATRES.

The theatres have little to complain of, on the score of patronage during the past week, as they have all been very well attended. At DRURY-LANE, the ballet of "The Marble Maiden" having been judiciously curtailed, bids fair to become popular, and will do good service to the treasury until some of the underlined novelties are produced. There is a report that COVENT-GARDEN has been taken by Mr Spicer, a gentleman of fortune, whose play of "Honesty," produced at this house, we noticed at some length in No 144 of the ILLUSTRATED NEWS. It is said he will open the theatre after Christmas, and make the legitimate drama the principal feature of his management. At the ADELPHI, the last farce of "Seeing Wright" keeps the house in a continuous roar of laughter. The "Green Bushes" will be revived next week, upon the return of Mrs. Fitzwilliam; and the new burletta will be a dramatic adaptation, by Mr. Selby, of the ballet "Le Diable a Quatre," now so popular in Paris. We understand there will be no recess before Christmas at the LYCEUM, "Next Door" still, as we predicted, have a long run. The theatre will close towards the end of November, to which time it is calculated that the revival of "Aladdin," on Monday, will carry it on. The PRINCESS' manager has, at last, engaged Madame Vestris and Mr. Charles Mathews as leading novelties, in every department of dramatic writing, are undelined, and Mr Macready appears as Hamlet on Monday. The HAYMARKET and SADLER'S WELLS have been alike supporting the national interests by their varied, and the legitimate drama; and on the opening night at the OLYMPIC we were unable to find even standing room some little time before the performances commenced. M. Philippe's wonderful powers, as a pantomimist, have been also capitally attended, as the carriages waiting there at night testify.

We will now proceed to notice the novelties of the week.

PRINCESS'.

This elegant theatre opened for the season on Monday evening, and, if the announcements are carried out to the full, with every prospect of a most successful campaign The present novelties, an attendant the more important productions, were confined to two slight farces, which were both successful, and backed by "Katherine and Petruchio," "The Brigand," and "A Court Ball," made up an agreeable, if not a very remarkable programme. The first of these, "Advice to Husbands," was admirably played by Mrs. Stirling and Mr James Vining. The plot is too simple even for description, turning on the reconciliation of Frank Trevor to his wife, from whom he had been some time separated, through false suspicions, going to India in the mean while, and not being reconciled by Mrs Trevor on his return. Both the writing and construction were exceedingly neat, and the applause at the fall of the curtain was unqualified. The second novelty was a farce, entitled "A Man Without a Head," in which Mr. Compton played Mr. Obinous Top, an absent gentleman, who gets into all sorts of dilemmas, from his total forgetfulness of everything that he has done, or in which he has been concerned. There is a quiet drollery in Mr. Compton's acting which is irresistibly ludicrous, and so the audience appeared to think. The piece introduced Mr. Robert Roxby to us, of whom, as a high comedian, we have before had occasion to speak in commendatory terms, being a lively, bustling, and gentlemanly actor. He is, we believe, the brother of Mr W. Beverley, the scenic artist of the theatre; and different members of his family have long been connected with the profession in the provinces. He bids fair to prove an acquisition to the excellent corps of this house.

OLYMPIC.

Some months back, when we first saw the announcement of Miss Kate Howard's intended direction of this theatre, with her determination to restore it to the position it held under the Vestris' management, we expressed our doubts upon the probability of getting together a company of sufficient excellence to carry out these intentions, however earnest might have been the wish. And the result has proved that these doubts were not without foundation. The season commenced on Monday, and its inauguration was not accompanied by any very remarkable success. Some great improvements have, however, been made in the house: the pit has been rendered exceedingly comfortable, each seat being covered, and backed; the lower rows of the box seats have been separated from the upper ones, by a division similar to that at the Adelphi; and the interior has been entirely re-decorated.

The first piece was a drama entitled "The Queen of Bohemia, or London in 1664," written by Mr. E. L. Blanchard, to whose industrious pen the theatre has been indebted for "Child of Life," "The Artful Dodge," "Angels and Lucifers," and many more of its most popular productions. The present drama turns upon the fortunes of the hapless Elizabeth, Queen of Bohemia, and daughter of James the First, and wife of the unfortunate Elector Palatine, and was grandmother to George I. A lively picture of the rural tableaux of London at that period has been drawn by the dramatist, but the action was in some parts rather indistinct and complicated. The company of the gallery appeared to want the "Jolly Dicks" and "Jacks-in-the-Water" of former days, albeit the "Queen of Bohemia" was a praiseworthy attempt to raise their taste in this respect. After the scene the ominous farce of "Frightened to Death"—a piece entirely of the old school, produced some thirty years ago at Drury-lane, when Harley, Munden, and Knight performed the principal characters. The present occasion, Mr. J. Browne, as Jack Phantom, kept the audience in a state of constant laughter, and played with great spirit. But this kind of piece is entirely passé; and we must protest against the farce's buff trousers with broad black stripe down the sides, which did not strike us as befitting the toilet of a rattling man-about-town. When will the stage shake conventionality?

The new extravaganza, by Mr. Leman Rede, is called "The Boyhood of Bacchus," and is written after the model of the old Olympic mythological burlesques. But it was, evidently, a little above the capacities of the performers, who appeared as much out of their element as they were unequal to the task had been performing a Greek drama by rote; and the audience, whose acquaintance with Lemprière was somewhat limited, did not seem to comprehend the allusions, which were plentifully scattered through the piece. Rhyme was at a defiance, and metre entirely overlooked, so that most of the points fell flat Burlesque verse requires the nicest care and emphasis to make it tell: if this is not brought on it, it becomes but dreadful stuff indeed to listen to that can well be imagined. We do not remember to have seen a more utter absence of intention, than in this representation, on the part of the actors. From this condemnation we would, however, except Miss Rainer, who performed Mercury very gracefully, and with much care and intelligence.

MUSIC.

DRURY-LANE THEATRE.

Amateurs are in anxious expectation of some operatic novelty. The "Enchantress" and "Bohemian Girl," the former Miss Romer and the latter Miss Rainforth, are now only attractive for the provincial visitors. The town habitués have now acquired perfect familiarity with every scene in these operas of Balfe, and the organ-grinders take care that "Woman's Heart" and "I Dreamt that I Dwelt in Marble Halls" shall not be forgotten. With a passionate love for Weber's melodies we cannot conscientiously sit out "Der Freyschutz" as now interpreted at Drury-lane; but the incantation scene and the yagar chorus still suffice for the gaping multitude. Donizetti's "Lucia" is better adapted for the powers of our English singers, although a Frenchwoman, Madame Eugenie Garcia, enacts the heroine. A clever artiste is this sister-in-law of Malibran; she exhibits wonderful tact in the management of a very defective organ What a singer Madame Garcia would make with Miss Romer's fine voice. The one has a noble organ and knows not how to use it; the other has little or no voice and manages it marvellously. It is astonishing to listen to Madame Garcia when she becomes really excited; and then tempted to exclaim, "Would she did oftener excite!" Allen is another instance of an admirable musician struggling with a weak voice. He is an excellent actor, and full of dramatic impulse, and, take him altogether, he is an operatic singer of no mean order. We did good service in the concerted pieces, and Burdini is a painstaking singer, whose voice has been overworked.

We must record a protest against the Chorus—not for their singing, which is decidedly improving, but for their inattention to the business of the scene. It is too bad, during the exciting finale of the second act and the mad scene of Lucia, that the efforts are intended to sustain the harmony, and not to divert it. Nothing can be more un-artist-like than his style of beating with such sound and fury. Is Artot, who played in the band of the Brussels Company last season, so soon forgotten? The conductor must insist upon his instructions down, and try and "pull out" some tone from the stringed instruments, if he wishes to improve the orchestra. The music of Adolphe Adam, in the "Marble Maiden," gains on every hearing; it is extremely pretty.

An émeute of an extraordinary nature took place on Thursday night, on the production of a "new grand divertissement," called "Une Fête Venitienne." The was announced to be composed by, and produced under the direction of M. Pitchar, Maître de Ballet," according to the bills. The divertissement consisted of an old scene of St. Mark, at Venice, painted by Stanfield, and a number of very old dances, executed by the Lumley corps de ballet. We can only condemn. Certainly not a sixpence could have been expended in the mise en scène. The audience soon found out this fact, and, after a pas de deux by Mdlle. Adele and Mr. Perrot, a cry was raised, "Let us have singing instead!" This dissatisfaction was loudly expressed at a pas Chenois by Mr. W. H. Payne and Miss A. Payne, which had gone the round of the minor theatres some years since, but it was not until the appearance of Mr. Perrot, with a pas des Folies, and a Polka followed by M. Delfarier and Mdlle Louise, at the end of which, to the amazement of the audience, the curtain dropped, the stage lights were put out, and the orchestra departed. At first there was a burst of laughter, but then succeeded a storm of hissing, especially from the half-price visitors, who, arriving at nine o'clock, did not like the notion of being ejected at twenty minutes past ten o'clock. The yells became frightful, and there was that beating of the benches which portended their breaking up for missiles. After some delay, the wage-lights were seen to shine again, and the band returned one by one amidst shouts of derision. Mr. Bunn and Mr. Harley were in turn demanded. Eventually, the latter came forward amidst decordant noises, and spoke to the following effect:—"Ladies and gentlemen—(roars and yells),—will you hear me? (Cries of 'No, no!' 'yes, yes!') Let me explain. (Hisses.) I assure you on my honour—(Humbug!) that the fall of the curtain was entirely a mistake. (Shouts of 'No, no!' and 'Humbug!') If you wish for the Polka again, you shall have it. (Yells and cries of 'No, no.') After that the 'Tarantelle,' which is announced in the bills, shall be danced." Mr Harley suddenly retired at this period, amidst conflicting cries, in the midst of which the Polka was again danced by the above-mentioned artists, amidst an obligato accompaniment of sticks and thumping of the benches. The "Tarantelle" was gone through in the midst of a complete hurricane of disapprobation; and as the green curtain descended for the second time, at twenty minutes to eleven o'clock, three successive groans were given, by way of finale; but, as the lights were extinguished, the audience departed, muttering their discontent.

DRAMATICAL AND MUSICAL CHIT CHAT.

EISTEDDFOD.—The town of Aberganwny, on the 15th and 16th inst., will be the scene of much Welsh excitement, as the Eisteddfod, or Bardic Meeting, or Rutteddfod, takes place on those days. The demand for lodgings is already great, as a number of distinguished persons as well as literati are expected at the present assemblage, which is anticipated to excel all former ones. The Committee will give no less than thirty prizes for music, chiefly for competitions on the harp Seven prize ..ps have been made for the occasion. Amongst the literary prizes will be one of eighty guineas for the best Essay on the Literature of Wales. Mr. H. B. Richards, the pianist and composer, and formerly pupil of the Royal Academy of Music, is appointed Musical Judge A new Cwmrygyshon Hall, 130 feet in length and breadth, and 30 and 40 in breadth, has been erected by Mr E. Lewis. There is an extensive gallery for harpers and singers, and a platform for the President and friends. A statue of Taliesen, the ancient poet of Wales, executed in London by Mr. W. Jones, will be placed in the Hall. Lady Morgan, who has described the Bards of Erin, will attend, to make acquaintance with the Bards of Wales Dwarkanauth Tagore, the Indian, will also be present at this national festival.—Our artist will attend the meeting, and we shall publish illustrations in our forthcoming numbers.

MISS DOLBY.—This accomplished vocalist has quitted England for Germany, having been engaged by Mendelssohn to sing at the Leipsic concerts. Miss Dolby will visit Berlin, Dresden, and Vienna; and return to London next February

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—The amateurs of sacred music will be rejoiced to learn that the performances at Exeter Hall commence on the 7th of November.

SOCIETY OF BRITISH MUSICIANS.—We are glad to learn that it is in contemplation to give some concerts on a large scale during the season for the performance of British compositions, overtures, &c., composed by English professors. The Chamber Concerts are announced for October 13, 27; November 11, 24; December 8 and 22. The Committee of Management this year consists of Messrs. J Clinton, H. Graves, C. E. Horsley, J. Jay, H. F. Richards, C. E. Stephens, J. W. Thirlwall, J. A. Tutton, and H. Westrop. Mr Baker is secretary, and Mr. J. Eyre treasurer. At the Harp Saloon of the latter, in Berners-street, the quarters are to be given. The Society now consists of 83 Members and 75 Associates. It was formed in 1834; and the main object is to enable the British artist to have the opportunity of producing his works. Six hundred new compositions have been thus heard since 1834. We shall be rejoiced to find that the public performances with full band are resumed

NEW MUSIC.

THE MUSICAL TREASURY, Parts 30, 31, and 32. G. H. DAVISON.

This work appears to progress steadily in public estimation. Part 30 contains gleanings from Beethoven's "Fidelio," with English words, by Mr Scane We should prefer that every part of the opera had preserved its original form, although some tact has been certainly evinced in omitting the less pleasing movements with which the songs in their primitive state are intersected. We do not like the last movement of the trio "Vous dont la tendre bienfaisance" made into a song of two verses. No. 31 contains the music of the Queen's Bal Costumé. Here we have the celebrated "Minuet de la Cour," with the Gavotte of Vestris, for some unknown reason, transposed from the key in which they have been hitherto invariably before published. The "Court Polonaise" is pleasing, albeit the same subject is to be found in one of Viotti's concertos, so well known to violin players. The remarks we have applied to "Fidelio," equally may be said of part 32, with Mr. Scane's words to Rossini's "Sebal Maier." The work is well got up, and certainly cheap, but little respect is manifested for the great masters, in mangling their productions for a popular purpose.

THE MUSICAL BOUQUET. J. Bingley.

This work is similar to the "Treasury" in design, and published at the same price, only that pictorial illustrations are appended.

I DREAMT I LIV'D IN FAIRY CLIMES. CROUCH.—"I HAVE NAEBODY NOW."

The first of these ballads, in two flats, is a pleasing, unpretending melody, founded on the Balfe school—that is, not remarkable for its originality. The words are by Mr. Hayden, and the music by Mr F Rosenberg. The second is a Scotch ballad, composed by Mr. Simpson, in three flats—three-eight time.

LITERATURE.

REVELATIONS OF SPAIN. By T. M. HUGHES, Esq.

This is the second edition of a work published some time since, in which the author has introduced some interesting new matter. Numerous as have been the recent works upon Spain, we have found it necessary, from reference to this, because, having a knowledge of the country ourselves, we believe these volumes contain a true picture of its political and social condition. Some recent tourists appear to have been rather disposed to throw an air of romance about Spain, if not at the expence of truth, at least with a view to amusement. In the present work the aim appears to have been to speak of things as they are. "Nothing extenuate, nor set down aught in malice," was evidently the principle upon which Mr. Hughes proceeded. The work throws very considerable light upon the political events of the last two or three years, and the fall of Espartero astonished even those who had watched events in Spain very minutely, and the great increase in the power of Narvaez was equally inexplicable. In this work, however, there is a succinct, impartial, and evidently authentic explanation of the incidents which led to the overthrow of the Duke de Victory. The calculations in regard to the duration of the power and influence of Narvaez are equally worthy of consideration. Let it not be supposed, however, that this is a mere dull political record. On the contrary, Mr. Hughes seems to have been at great pains to illustrate the manners and customs of the inhabitants of Spain, and the general condition of the country; and he has done so in a pleasant, impartial, and graphic vein. We can cordially recommend these two agreeable volumes.

HOW TO SPEAK FRENCH. By ACHILLE ALBITES, A.B., &c. Hamilton, Adams, and Co.

This Manual promises to teach the student how to speak French in Forty Conversations in Paris, divided into Four Days; and containing, besides the sentences relative to the ordinary circumstances of Life, and the principal idioms of the French language, some notions on the country and its condition. Appended to the Conversations are Notes, which the author considers as a Treatise on Parisian Pronunciation and French Grammar. Here is much to achieve within 180 pages; but, as a manual for the visitor to Paris, the little volume appears to be peculiarly well adapted.

FINE ARTS.

MEDAL OF LOUIS PHILIPPE.

The King of the French has just presented to Mr. F. Catherwood a large gold medal, in acknowledgment of a copy of that gentleman's spendid "Views of Ancient Monuments in Central America, Chiapas, and Yucatan." The medal is seven inches in circumference: on the obverse, it bears the profile of Louis Philippe in bold relief, properly corresponding with the medallion portrait lately engraved in our Journal; on the reverse is inscribed, "Donné par Le Roi à M Catherwood, 1845." The Regal acknowledgment is a fine production of medallic art, and Mr. Catherwood's superb work is comparatively meritorious as a work of graphic excellence; so that both are equally worthy of commendation.

THE LONDON ART-UNION PRIZE ANNUAL.—Sprigg, Great Russell-street.

The object of this work is to commemorate the taste of the fortunate holders of Prizes in the London Art-Union, by engraving the several pictures and sculptures purchased by them: accordingly, the present volume, a handsome folio, contains 20 such subjects. They are delicately executed in fine tint, and judiciously grouped, from three to five upon a page; and prefixed to the whole is a Description of the Plates, with the names of the Prizeholders; the amount of each Prize, its number, size, and cost: the subject, and name of the artist. Among the latter are Frederick Westmacott, Thorp, Joy, Tennant, Allen, Warren, Hunt, Wilson, Vacher, T. C. Horsley, Jenkins, Havell, C. Landseer, Topham, Sparke, Clater, Pidding, Kidd, Clint, Elmore, Justum, Hague, Beddington, Woolmer, Williams, Wingfield, Dawe, Vickers, Howse, Harding, Horsley, Collins, Creswick, Absolon, Penley, Varley, Miss, &c.; and had the selection been made purposely for publication, it could not have presented greater variety. The several engravings are of gem like proportions: and the work being produced in elegant taste, we know not a more acceptable record of the progress of British art to recommend to our readers

The work has been produced annually: its utility must be obvious, for, we agree with the publisher, that, "had there been a Pictorial Catalogue published of the Royal Academy, from its establishment, that catalogue would form the fullest memorandum of the Arts of this country, and the richest and most interesting memoranda of the invaluable gems of our Gainsborough, Reynolds, West, and Wilson, extant, and a certain guide of date and history of a long list of works, some of which are now lost and never to be recovered."

OUR MAGAZINE COLUMN FOR OCTOBER.

THE UNITED STATES.

The United States of America are the greatest edifice ever achieved by the Anglo-Saxon race. They are a living evidence of the stubborn vitality, of the consistent enterprise, of the sound judgment, of that sturdy variety of the old Teutonic stock. England came last to the great work of American colonisation. Rival nations had seized upon all that was deemed habitable in the New World. The English had to put up with a barren, inhospitable coast, under the melancholies of an iron climate. Other powers exhausted their resources to secure the golden prize. The English Government abandoned the new settlements to the contingencies of private speculation. The results were such as no human wisdom could anticipate. The Mississippi valley withered in the hands of the French. Spain was beggared by the gold of her Peruvian and Mexican mines. England alone owed her wealth, and to a great extent her safety, to her Transatlantic possessions. New England and Virginia were the master pieces of English constructiveness. When the day of emancipation came, and the ever-grown colonies felt able and impatient to shift for themselves, the superiority of the British over the southern races was yet more strenuously asserted. French levity and Spanish indolence gave way before American hardiness and enterprise. The Creole every where dwindled and vanished before the Yankee; and the day is not, perhaps, beyond the limit of human conjecture when the preponderant element shall have completed its work of irresistible, even although pacific invasion, when the Anglo-Saxon shall lord it all over the Continent It is with little reason, we believe, and to little purpose, than an outcry has been raised in England against the late schemes of American aggrandisement. The annexation of Texas, the invasion of the Oregon territory by right of secretion, or by whatever name such conquests and usurpations may be designated, are matters of necessity. They are the obvious consequence of that onward impulse, of that go-a-headism, which can only be arrested by the desert or the ocean. The Yankees have already monopolised the name of Americans, and the day will perhaps be when their somewhat nation and the New World shall be utterly identified.—Fraser's Magazine.

CANNIBALISM IN NEW ZEALAND

The New Zealanders are still cannibals. The practice has, through the exertions of the missionaries, greatly decreased, but is very far from being as yet extirpated. While the American exploring expedition was there, a chief had a boy of fourteen killed as a medicine for his son, who was sick, and the barbarous prescription not effecting a cure, a girl of the same age was about to experience a similar fate; but, as Captain Wilkes tells us, "the timely interference of the missionaries prevented it." Mr. Brown speaks of an aged chief of influence, named Tarrea, who lives near Hokianga, who has devoured hundreds of human tongues—the favourite morsels. Children, it is said, were his favourite food. The head of this monster is, we are told, a physiological study, numerousness being particularly prominent. This custom was first mentioned by Cook: but although his statement has been repeatedly corroborated, its accuracy is often questioned, and even Dr. Dieffenbach appears to think these natives only eat their enemies, and then as ceremonies and restrictions A persuasion that the strength and courage of an enemy are transferred to the person who eats him, and a desire to indulge their revenging feelings of revenge, are, in all probability, the causes of the origin of this frightful usage; but having once acquired this unnatural taste, there can be no doubt they gratified it under other circumstances—from a liking for the meat repast, as well as from superstitious fancies, as we have instanced above. Captain Cook, in his second voyage, speaks of "their great liking for the food." Cruise and Rutherford, in their respective narratives, testify to the same effect; and a chief told Mr. Earle, that "he had been born and reared in an inland district; fish they never saw, and the only flesh he then partook of was human." It is well known that cannibalism prevailed, and has prevailed among nations far more civilized than the New Zealand. Humboldt, in his work on the indigenous inhabitants of South America, describes it as practised by the Aztèques of Mexico, and in the memoirs of Sir Stamford Raffles, there is a very precise account of it given as practised—and with new horrors among the Battas, a populous nation of Sumatra, very considerably advanced in civilization. Criminals are by their laws eaten, and these laws allow of their being mangled and eaten while alive.—Dublin University Magazine.

CLOCKS IN CONNECTICUT.

The New Haven Courier contains an interesting account of the Clock Factory of Mr. Jerome in that city. This establishment is one of the most extensive of the kind in the United States. We cannot describe minutely the whole process of making a clock, or the life-like movement of the machinery, it would take more time and space than we can at present devote to this purpose. In short, the case, movements, plates, face, &c. which, when put together, form one of Jerome's celebrated "brass eight-day clocks," and through some fifty different hands before completed. One man can put together about seventy five movements per day, while every part, from the first process to the finishing, goes on with equal rapidity. We learn from him that the greatest bulk of clocks which he anticipates making this year, are designed for European markets, and that he has already received orders from houses in London and Birmingham, England, a large house in Scotland, and also some quite extensive dealers in Canada. In fact, the Yankee clock is becoming a general favourite in England, almost entirely superseding the old Dutch clock, which has been long used there as a household piece. He yearly consumes of the various articles used in the manufacture of clocks the following enormous quantities:—500,000 feet pine lumber; 200,000 feet mahogany and rosewood veneers; 300 tons of iron for weights; 100,000lbs of brass; 350 casks of nails, 1500 boxes of glass, 50 feet per box; 1500 gallons varnish; 15,000lbs. wire; 10,000lbs. glue; 50,000 looking glass plates. 2400 dollars are paid yearly for printing bills, and for screws, bawl, coal, and oil. Workmen employed, 75; paid wages yearly, 30,000 dollars; clocks made per day, 200, year, 50,000.—Simmonds's Colonial Magazine.

POETICAL INVITATIONS.

If all the young ladies who sit down to a piano to sing a song were to be taken at their words—that is to say, at the words of the poet, which, for the time being, they adopt as their own—much awkwardness might be the consequence. If the invitations that are frequently issued were to be literally accepted, we should have people rushing to willow glens the day after an evening party; or jumping into cabs and giving directions to the cabmen to drive "where the aspens quiver," "down by the shining river," whither they had been requested to "bring their guitar" by some syren of last night's soirée. Four or five years ago it was customary to recommend a whole roomful of company to hurry "Away, away, to the mountain's brow!" and many of our readers will recollect being intreated to "leave the gay and festive scene" considerably before supper, and to "rove 'mid forests green," for the purpose of watching the lingering rays "that shoots from every star," which, as the stars happen to be innumerable, would have been a very endless business. To ask a gentleman to come and watch the rays that shoot from every star, is almost as bad as inviting him to come and count the "five million additional lamps" at Vauxhal, a task under which even Cocker must have fallen prostrate. The coolness with which a request for a meeting "by moonlight alone" is frequently conveyed, may be all very well in a crowded room full of guests, but if the solitary interview were to come off at the appointed hour, the strongest of female nerves might be shaken. As the invitation is general, any one present is at liberty to accept it, provided he fulfil the condition of coming alone, and if Spring heeled Jack should happen to overhear the song, he might take it into his head—and heels—to keep the appointment.—Crunkshank's Table Book.

THE GREAT SPECULATION OF 1824—5.

Here there were signs of mercantile aberration—of the wildest and most reckless rashness. All that the extravagant hopes of the nation was founded upon resulted in the acknowledgement of the independence of the Spanish colonies of Spanish America, and thence the opening of a boundless field for the employment of British capital. This was the sole pretext—formed the entire pivot of the extravagance of the period; loans to an enormous amount were sent out to the new governments, and various rival companies formed for mining operations, for improving the old and opening new mines of the precious metals. Shares of some of these companies, and loans on the objects not a single individual had any knowledge or certain information, rose to a most exorbitant premium. For example, shares in the Anglo-Mexican Mining Company sold for £100, though only £5 had been paid for them; and those of the Real del Monte, on which £670 had been paid, sold for £1350. Other speculations equally delirious were launched. In the commencement of 1825 the new joint stock companies amounted to 270, of which the aggregate capital amounted to 174 millions. For most of these ventures there was no adequate, no rational, tentative: they were bubbles merely, and no one cannot without astonishment revert to the infatuation which produced them.—" Railway Speculation" in Wade's London Review.

THE CORAL TRADE.

From preference, the large coral is sent from Naples to Russia, the pink of the finest quality to China, that of inferior quality to Poland, but the barbaresca and roba chiare to India. The lowest qualities have long been used in the slave-trade, which is, however, daily diminishing. The city of Algiers is one of the connecting points of that detestable net which is spread all over the commercial world. It employs already, every year, about 200,000 francs worth of little bits, the carving and polishing of which occupy several families, and then sends them into the interior of Africa. The Jews of Algiers have, in Africa and in Europe, the best established connection for the extension of this branch of trade.—New Sporting Magazine

THE ROMAN TABLE.

The Romans had no word for table cloth in the language. Even Augustus could not please the eye of Virgil with a beautiful pattern in damask. The interposition of a purple closter between the various pauses of the repast, affected a very poor substitute. In fact, the linen department seems to have been supplied on the same principle that regulates an establishment at Stockwell or Chelsea—every guest brought his own napkin; and why not his fork and silver spoon? The absence of knives was simply owing to taste—they had them, but only the carver thought it worth while to employ them. In the mode of serving a dinner we notice one peculiarity that might be imitated with advantage; the dishes were not brought in singly, but a complete course was placed on the table in trays, which were frequently remarkable for the splendour and costliness of he workmanship and materials. The dishes varied from clay to silver, ado zed with engravings, and the most delicate curiosities of the chaser.—Fraser's Magazine.

RAILROADS IN IRELAND.

The incipient symptoms of an universal locomotive mania are now rife in Ireland. Their influence pervades all ranks and all places. They are prevalent over the entire face of the land. In south, north, west, south, meetings have been convened for the purpose of considering the expediency of establishing, by means of railroads, more facile communication between the different localities. Old projects are revived—new ones are started: both are discussed. Our ardent, enterprising neighbours and fellow-subjects are taking up this question with a zeal commensurate with the natural enthusiasm of the national character. And we do not say that it is so; we are glad that they are devoting their attention earnestly to matters which, whatever be the ultimate result, must lead to much immediate practical good; for a necessary first consequence of carrying all or any of the designs now contemplated into execution will be that—for a few years to come, at least—a wide, a regular, and comparatively remunerative field will be thrown open for the free labour of thousands of men, able and willing to work, of whose present condition "an owre true tale" of miserable idleness could be told. We are glad that a spontaneous spirit of enterprise has thus prompted them into an exertion to serve themselves, without dallying their time in expectation of State assistance. It is often the same in this respect, with nations as with persons—benefits thrust upon them are either unvalued or unavailing. The flat of toil has gone forth, and equally unavailing would it be to segregate a man individually or nationally. What men achieve for themselves in private or public are most prized, and most permanent. We are glad they have at last besturred themselves on this point, and have determined upon a practical adoption of the maxim often urged upon them in other matters, "Aide toi et Dieu t'aidera." They have often expended as much energy, perseverance, intelligence, and unanimity in the pursuit of objects of political utility—alas as could not fail of success. If devoted to the attainment of an enlightened view of social happiness or the man

We enter not now into any disquisitions on the feasibility of this scheme or that on the propriety of running one line or another—the chances of such or such a route bringing profitable, sums adapted to public convenience, more in consonance with the general stream of traffic. All these are matters which we assume as being likely to be settled either by legislative interference, the control of responsible official authority, or the shock of individual interests. We need not at present the speculations of private or political economists, as to the probable repayment of capital—the amount of per centage on money sunk—the resources of a fine country developed—the benefits likely to accrue from increased facilities of intercourse and commerce within itself or with England. All these considerations, we trust, must admit, are weighty, and worthy of every possible attention. These are consequences to be anticipated as naturally following the introduction of railway communication

We by no means under ate these considerations; but while we give them their due importance in the calculations of the future, we cannot shut our eyes to the strong probability of certain, great, and incalculable benefits, social, political, moral, and physical, under any circumstances, to be derived from the copious diffusion of capital, and the constant employment of so many able-bodied labourers in Ireland for a long prospective period. It is then to the speculations which we indulge of immediate practical advantage to the country, that we more readily turn our attention. In this respect we see no reason to entertain any doubts. We behold present tangible good: as to the future, we look upon it too as being pregnant with much hope and promise. And, however some may be inclined to regard the former as likely to be only of a temporary nature, we cannot but hail it with feelings of analloyed satisfaction One or two effects of a wholesome occupation of the time of the labouring classes, may be briefly adverted to here. A most unpopular impost for the support of the poor, in establishments ever unwillingly resorted to in Ireland (ay, and in England too), even by the most destitute, would be much lightened. The acknowledged evils of mendicancy would be considerably mitigated. Agrarian competition would be lessened; and the curse of summary eviction, that most prolific source of wretchedness and outrage, that curse which steeps Ireland in woe, and stains her with crime, would either be averted, or fall less sensibly on the heads and hearts of its miserable victims. Imaginary grievances could not be so mixed up with palpable ones that it would require the acute process of logical reasoning to detect them out, which reality ceased and fiction began. That popular excitability now so easily called forth would be difficult of evocation, when one of its main causes was removed, and the attention of the people directed to something beneficial and useful. We mean not to propound the doctrine that employment should or would supersede the legitimate discussion of existing, known, and felt evils; but this we do mean to say, that want of regular remunerative labour is one of the most crying tangible evils of Ireland. This is the canker at the root of the social tree, whose poison sends its blight through all the branches. This is the origin of the diseased state of the body politic. Give the people work—the paid constant work, and you apply a practical remedy to their worst disorder. It is a simple prescription, worth the trial. Administer that panacea, and

"Methinks I hear a little bird which sings
The people by-and-by will be the better."!

It is employment they want, not alms; it is work they require, not the compulsory maintenance of a poor-law. If they had that they would be contented and happy, because independent, and possessed of a competency that sufficient to satisfy their moderate exigences. The construction of railroads would give them this for some time to come, in addition to other advantages; and with the thrifty, sober, and industrious habits which they have acquired within the last [illegible] years, in all human probability, a great and permanent improvement would take place in the general condition of the people.

There are other points of view at which we have already cursorily glanced, in which this question can be satisfactorily regarded. A good deal of Irish money, hardly supposed to be in existence, will be drawn from its dormant unproductive hoards with equal benefit to the possessors, and the community at large. And as no small quantity of English money will, as a matter of course, flow in to assist, when that feeling of insecurity, which has so long alienated its current from that country, shall have been dissipated. The excellent common sense of our own countrymen cannot fail to perceive that their Irish brother capitalists, with a full knowledge of all local circumstances, would not embark in speculative operations of this description, not only without good confidence in the stability of the undertaking, but a strong hope of profitable and remunerating returns

As opportunity and space permit, and the interest of the subject demands, we may, perhaps, hereafter enter more into the details of this question; we may, also, advert to some of the results which may be likely to accrue from the introduction of a general system of railways into Ireland.

THE ORDER OF ST. PATRICK.—Lord Farnham is to obtain the ribbon of St. Patrick, held by the late Marquis of Ely.

MURDER AT BALLINASLOE. The proceedings of the Royal Agricultural Society at Ballinasloe have been unpleasantly affected by a dreadful and murder committed within eight or nine miles of the town, on the person of a respectable man, who, on the day of his death, was one of those who had been most active in visiting the above Board of the Society. The name of the unfortunate deceased was Thomas Lenney, steward to the Rev. Mr. Hutson, rector of Clonfert. The circumstances are reported to be these:—Some short time back, Mr. Hutson discharged a steward for one of the new Coates, and engaged deceased as his successor. In the interval between that and the murder, Mr. Hutson received several threatening letters to dismiss Lenney from his employment. On Tuesday week, when the steward, Lenney, attended the show at Ballinasloe. He returned to his employer's house in the evening, and there took his dinner and tea, as usual. It should be said that Mr. Hutson's residence, (Moydrum Rectory) deceased was found in Mr. Hutson's hall, threatening that if Lenney was not discharged within a given time, he would certainly be shot. Deceased left the house at his own request, to proceed to his apartments in the farmyard, but he was fated never to reach it. In passing through a gateway, he was fired at, and with so sure an aim, that the ball passed through his heart, and death was of course instantaneous. The shot was fired by the steward, but no immediate attention was paid to it. In about twenty minutes after, the lifeless body was discovered by one of the domestics, extended in the gateway. An inquest was held by Mr. Kenney, the Coroner of the county, when a verdict of "Wilful Murder" was found against some parties unknown. Three persons have been arrested on suspicion, namely, the coachman, and another servant of Mr. Hutson's discharged at the same time with the deceased steward, Coates; also, the rev. gentleman's groom, Joseph Bergin.

BRUTAL MURDER IN ARMAGH.—On Tuesday evening, an old man of the name of Ryan, a driver belonging to Mr. Hughes, car owner, in Armagh, was barbarously murdered by three persons, who jumped upon the car he was driving, and insisted upon being carried. There was a female on the box who was grossly insulted by those persons, upon Ryan remonstrating and attempting to protect the woman, the fellows beat him to death. While they were perpetrating the murder, the woman escaped, and ran to the next police station, where, in a few minutes the body was brought in by three men, who said they found him dead on the road, and that they thought he fell off his car and was accidentally killed; but, much to their surprise, the woman identified them as the persons who killed the deceased.

ENGLISH THEATRICALS IN AMERICA.—The theatrical season commenced at New York on the 15th ult., with "La Sonnambula," and a crowded and fashionable audience. After speaking in favourable terms of the performance as a whole, the New York Herald gives a very amusing description of Miss Delcy's representation of Amina. "The honours of the evening were due to Miss Delcy, who made one of the most successful débuts on record, and fully sustained the high reputation which preceded her." The part was very well sung, but acting in its 4th still more decided success; and her share of the receipts for the three nights amounted to 900 dollars. Miss Delcy was to appear in "Cinderella" on the 18th. The Keans, during their engagement, realised 9000 dollars.

ARTIFICIAL STONE.—At Aubsburgh, an architect, Herr Adolf Steinmann, has invented an artificial stone, which, for solidity, is said to surpass the best free stone, in one third its cost, and to which any form can be given in the manufacture. It is composed of river sand, clay, and a cement whose composition is the author's secret. It has been submitted to the proof of air, pressure, and fire, and resists them all. The King of Bavaria has given his gold medal of civil merit to Herr Steinmann, for this useful invention.

DEATH OF ADMIRAL PAGE.—This venerable admiral expired at his house on Friday evening (last week). As Ipswich was the place of his birth, he also made it the place in which, after active services for his country, he spent the declining years of his life. He lived much respected in the town, and has left to the Corporation a valuable evidence of his generosity in the possession of a series of marine paintings, &c., which have long adorned Ipswich Town Hall.

IMPORTANT SECRET EXPEDITION.—The following is an important extract of a letter received at Lloyd's, from their agent at Lima.—The following ships of war sailed from Valparaiso with sealed orders: July 15, her Britannic Majesty's ship Collingwood, 80 guns, and the Modeste, 18 guns; July 19, the United States man of war Lexant, 22 guns; July 22, the United States man of war Portsmouth, 22 guns; July 29, the United States man of war Savannah, 54 guns. Her Majesty's ship Curmorant, 6, guns, sailed July 15 for England with dispatches.

A LUCKY DISCOVERY.—On Monday morning week, as Mr. Betts, of Stowmarket, was about to repair an old chest of drawers he had purchased at an auction a day or two before, to his agreeable surprise he found money to the amount of £240, all in Bank of England notes of different sums, upwards of 110 years old.

RAILWAY SHARES.

RAILWAY SHARES! RAILWAY SHARES!
Hunted by Stags and Bulls and Bears—
Hunted by women—hunted by men—
Speaking and writing—voice and pen—
Claiming and coaxings—pray'rs and snares—
All the world mad about RAILWAY SHARES!

The Duke of S—, the most changed of men
Never awakened till half-past ten,
Now you may see him in trim divine
With his breakfast over by half-past nine,
Reading the Post for the last new line.
What to him are affairs of State?
What are his tradesmen? let them wait;

Where is his valet? gone down stairs,
Reading up, like his Grace, for shares.
Ha! he has hit on a capital spec;
Suddenly Dukey rings for his sec;
And that patient man will have to write
Letters that last him from morn till night;
And all of them filled with his Grace's pray'rs,
For continued allotments of Railway Shares.

Lady B's in her bright boudoir,
Her cheek all rouge, and her hair all noir;
But well do her anxious glances speak
How little she cares for hair or cheek.
Pray, is she studying Pedigree,
And the branches all of the family tree?
No, her line direct is a Rail, you'll find,
With branches off of a different kind;
Her dreams in Eden are taking a dip—
The glories in beautiful visions of Scrip—
Then sinks in the softest of velvet chairs,
And writes—in an angel hand—for SHARES!

Alderman! What! does your turtle pall?
Calipash—can't you eat any at all?
Can your exceeding excitement be Destructive of Green Fat and Calipee?
Don't you know what 's doing in town?
Aint you proud of your Alderman's gown?
Have you supreme contempt for Mayors?
Heavens! what 's done it—griefs and cares?
No! an absorption in RAILWAY SHARES!
Parson—Have you forgotten your church?
Are you leaving your flock in the lurch?
Can you doubt in your duty's range
Whether to go into Church, or on 'Change?
Are you setting down scrip or sin?
Which do you study, religion or tin?
Writing your sermon—reading your prayers?
What! reading and writing for RAILWAY SHARES?
General—Chief of the ribbon and scar,
What is it flushes you there—is it war?
Scan you the page of some battle grand,
Crowning the glory of native land.

Veteran Admiral—Ha! can it be
That you're back again on your element, sea,
Winning a wooden-wall victory?

Admiral! General! is it "no go?"
Can't you find us a "Yes" or a "No?"
Well, we forgive you both—for in fine
We see you ranging your thoughts in a line;
And though not a line that on battle bears,
It is drawn up and ready for—RAILWAY SHARES!
Butchers abandon their old meat ways—
You meet them with railway joints in their trays.
Baker and Fishmonger! each one wishes
In Railway Shares to find loaves and fishes;
While as for Tailors—the genus scrip
Will take your measure for nothing but Scrip.

A Governess saves her tinyest pittance,
In hopes of getting a Share-remittance.
For the Court may work to Milliners' fall,
But it's Carpet Court tho' after all.
Even stocks that gentlemen wear—'tis strange—
Are made with a view to the Stock Exchange.
Schoolmasters, taken unawares,
Set all their boys a writing for shares;
Every sailor in every ship
Spends his prize money all in Scrip;
Every soldier, in uniform fine,
Is proud because he belongs to the line;
Every convict who walks in fetter
Will have his shy at least for "a letter;"
And we know of Stags—to complete these rhymes—
Who will every night forego to sup.
And every morning rise betimes,
To see what Railways are GETTING UP!

Railway Shares! Railway Shares!
Hunted by Stags and Bulls and Bears—
Hunted by women—hunted by men—
Speaking and writing—voice and pen.
Claimings and coaxings—pray'rs and snares—
All the world mad about RAILWAY SHARES!

SUMMARY OF RAILWAY FACTS.—In the course of fourteen days the number of new railway schemes was seventy-nine; and the aggregate of their estimated capital is £81 535,500.——The prefects of the departments of the Gironde and the Lower Pyrenees have announced that a preliminary enquête has been opened for the line between Bordeaux and Bayonne.——The Brighton Railway Company has again reduced its fares. The first-class fare (ten shillings) is now less than the outside fare heretofore charged by the coaches, to say nothing of the shillings (or rather half crowns) and sixpences charged by the coachmen and porters.——A new company has been formed for the line to the Spanish frontier, passing through Bayonne, with a capital of 25,000,000f., divided into 50,000 shares of 500f., of which the fourth part is reserved to the Spanish subscribers. The surveys have been made with great care, and the execution of the line is declared to be without difficulty.——The French Government has authorised the preliminary enquête for the line which is to unite together the various terminl of the railways from the provinces terminating in Paris.——The Board of Directors of the Northern Railway of France, with Baron James de Rothschild as President, has delegated its powers to a Committee, composed of five of its members, viz., Messieurs P. Hottinguer, E. Pereire, A. Thurneyssen, Marquis Dalon, and M. Caillard, sen.——The works of the Orleans and Tours Line are being carried on with the utmost activity, and there is every reason to expect that it will be opened before the close of the year.——It is mentioned that the condition on which Mr Hudson's patronage of the Manchester and Southampton line was obtained, was the grant to him of 25,000 shares.——The following is a summary of the number of new schemes before the public, and amount required for deposits. It will be observed that already there is more than one scheme, and nearly a million a day for the ent re year, exclusive of foreign projects:—New railway schemes for season 1846, to the 7th of October, 1845. United Kingdom, 399 schemes; amount of deposits, £28,994,074; amount of capital, £899,299,000. Foreign schemes, 76; amount of capital, £127,480,000; amount of deposits, £7,869,750.——The directors of the Madrid and Valencia Railway have paid the £30,000 "caution money," required under the terms of the concession, into the Bank of England.——Among the railway projects newly brought forward, is one for Brazil by the special grant of the Emperor, and sanctioned by the Legislature of the country. It is to extend from Rio de Janeiro to St. Paulo and Minas Geraes, a distance of about 100 miles.——A special meeting of the proprietors of the Bridgwater and Taunton Canal Navigation, was held on Wednesday, at Bristol, when resolutions were passed for applying to Parliament in the next session for powers to convert the Canal into a railway.

FASHIONS FOR OCTOBER.

Whoever is versed in fashions knows that none truly exist for the last month. The high and mighty councils of the ruling leaders do not meet—society is dispersed; and in our climates—in September—one day is summer and the next winter. Only an astrologer could decide the appropriate costume of the week or hour. The real élégantes affect the utmost simplicity at watering-places and country seats; and the publishers of fashion are reduced, like dressers at minor theatres, to make their novelty out of an imagined mixture of two different epochs. To-day, however, we may safely assert that Paris (the present headquarters of the most mobile and capricious of powers—Fashion) has issued its decrees—winter fashions are decided. At this moment, from all the gay capitals of Europe the dealers in fashion flock to the French Babylon to procure models and to carry home stuffs, the richest as well as the most fanciful and extraordinary, rejoicing in names of the most puzzling or varied etymology.

FASHIONS FOR OCTOBER.

We have met in Paris, during the last few days, the representatives of all the first marchandes des modes of London, such as Vouillon and Laure, the Queen Victoria's milliners, &c. &c., buying masses of the most exquisite models, and of all the new tissues just issued from the French looms. The new silk tissues are generally exceedingly rich and enormously dear, which has not prevented a large importation by these fashionable houses of business in London. Our ladies of rank are beginning to pay flying visits to the capital to behold the new marvels arrived. These novelties consist in Pekins, Levantines, gros de Tours, velvets, above all, rich damasks; moires striped in all shades imaginable, mêlés and brochés alcyonnes with treble reflexion of colour, and satins of the hues the most brilliant and of the softest texture. Certainly, these are always made of the same silk as formerly, but the tissues and designs are quite new. The progress of luxury, now extending to all classes, induces the most privileged of the fair members of society to wear stuffs and toilets that cannot be attained by the less favoured of fortune.

Positively, the velvet bonnets, either black, court-green, amethyst, maroon, or violet, will be of the Pamela form. The edges are gracefully rounded off, and ornamented at the sides by knots of ribbon or with leaves in shaded velvet. They are likewise ornamented with three stems of feather shaded, and placed sideways. In general, the ornaments are of the smallest size. If flowers are worn, they must be few in number and of the same hue as the bonnet. We warn our fair readers, that in no paris of dress has greater change taken place, and that the new form should be the more eagerly sought after, as they are highly graceful and becoming.

Capotes are likewise occasionally worn; but they are of a close form, and are made of satin, ornamented with velvet or velours épinglé.

Coiffures are likewise worn of ribbon, either velvet or velvet and satin mixed with lace; to the more full-dress coiffures, silver or gold accessory embellishments being added.

In the ornamenting of dresses, much braiding is employed, and likewise velvet ribbon, either plain or shaded.

FASHIONS FOR OCTOBER.

The redingotes, or pelisses, are made of silk tissue, velvet, or of mixed woollen stuffs. They are made to adhere to the form of the Amazon or riding-habit cut. The accessory trimmings are made very simple, but rows of buttons, of silver or of gold, or of cut steel, are employed, as if to fasten them.

Mantles, and Wrappers of that class, are made in a hundred different fashions; they rejoice in the titles of Hadeks, Haja-walks, Kaftans, Caracos, and other strange appellations. There are so numerous that ladies will have ample opportunity of choosing what is most becoming, as well as convenient, to their peculiar forms and styles.

As an example of a toilet much commended, we will mention here a dress in Moire, with lines, black satin and pink; the body ascended high up, but open in front, with a small falling collar, of shawl form, descending to the waist, and edged with a little fringe of silk. The sleeves short, and likewise trimmed with fringe. The long sleeves, which are put on and taken off at will, are made wide towards the hand in order to show the under sleeve, made of embroidered muslin trimmed with lace.

For promenade, has been admired a redingote, with broad stripes—the one shaded lilac, the other black satin, with lace design. The body forms at the waist pleats, extending in fan form on the chest, and ascending only to a little below the throat, to allow the gimp beneath to be seen, trimmed with lace, which falls down to the edge of the dress. At the bottom of the skirt, four rows of cross-cut velvet—one black, the other lilac; the lower larger than the others. The same trimmings, of smaller size, are applied to the sleeves.

Barring these two examples, we have only spoken generally of the new-born Fashions of the day—the choice of the leaders of Fashion; and the preference of the majority will stamp that preference amidst the mass of novelties which we will communicate in our next report.

RAILWAY SPECULATION IN THE UNITED STATES.—Our accounts from America prove that the people of the United States are as much excited about railways as ourselves. There is a Connecticut River and Lake Champlain Railroad, the Boston Concord and Montreal Railroad, the Nashua and Worcester, the Providence and Worcester, the Old Colony to Plymouth, the Hartford and Danbury, and the Portland and Montreal Railroad in contemplation, or in a state of completion. These lines will comprise at least 1000 miles of railroad, costing not less than 20,000,000 dollars. They will eventually be completed, but it will be the work of years. Many of these lines are under way, the stock fully subscribed, and already at par in the Boston market, while the subscriptions to others are rapidly filling up. As an evidence of the feeling so general in New England in relation to railroads, the subscription to the Portland and Montreal Railroad is about a fair one. One master workman stated that he had six journeymen in his shop, and each man would take a share. Another mechanical company had fifteen, and they intended to have thirty shares in that shop. A young tailoress, at work in a family, declared herself ready to take two shares. The hired girl in the same house was ready for one share. These cases are but a few in thousands. None of these people go beyond their present means, and willingly invest every dollar of their hard-earned wages in the railroads of the place they live in. There are three railroads in contemplation from Boston to Montreal, viz., the Boston, Pitchburg, Burlington, and Montreal road; the Boston, Concord, and Montreal road; and the Boston, Portland, and Montreal road. All these are partly built, and the friends of each are making efforts to push them through as rapidly as possible. As an instance of the progress of railways in Canada, we may mention the appearance of the undertaking called the "Great Western Railway of Canada." It is designed to form a main artery for Upper Canada, and also a link in the communication between the north western States of America, the valley of the Mississippi, and the sea board of the Atlantic. The chief capital is already subscribed, and the company is chartered by the act of the Canadian Legislature, who seem to regard it as a national undertaking.

NEW BIRD.—THE GOLIAH ARATOO.

This interesting ornithological novelty has just been received from Papua, by Mr. J. Warwick, by whose permission it has been sketched for our journal. It has been brought to this country by the Captain of a South Seaman (the Aiert), who obtained it from a Chinese vessel from the island of Papua, to whom the Captain of the Aiert rendered valuable assistance, when in a state of distress. This is the only instance of the bird arriving alive in this country. It is the Micrroglossus Aterrimus of Vieillot, and has been described by that naturalist as differing from the whole family of Psittacidæ (parrots) in the form of its tongue, which M. Levaillant very aptly compares to the trunk of an elephant, and a memoir on this organ was read before the Royal Academy of Sciences in Paris, in 1821, and was afterwards published.

In size, this valuable bird is one of the largest of the parrot tribe, being superior to the Red Macaw. The whole plumage is black, glossed with a greenish grey. The head is ornamented with a large crest of long pendulous feathers, which it erects at pleasure, when the bird has a most noble appearance. The orbits and cheeks are of a deep rose colour, approaching to scarlet; the bill is extraordinary in its dimensions, and will crack the hardest fruit stones; but when the kernel is detached, the Bird does not crush, and swallow them in large fragments, but scrapes them, with the lower mandible, to the finest pulp, thus differing from its congeners in the mode of taking the food, the legs are naked a little way above the tarsal joint; the tarsi themselves are short. In its manners, it is mild and familiar, and, when approached, raises a cry which may be compared to a hoarse croaking. This cry appears to emanate from the lower part of the larynx, for there is no perceptible motion of the tongue. In its gait, it resembles the rook, and walks much better than most of this climbing family.

BRITISH ARCHÆOLOGICAL ASSOCIATION.—Gloucester, we understand, has been decided upon for the next congress of this Institution. The Duke of Beaufort, Earl Fitzhardinge, and Lord Ducie, have signified to the noble president, Lord Albert Conyngham, their disposition to aid the meeting and the Association by every means in their power, as well as personally.

THE GILLESPIE MONUMENT AT CORNER.—The Committee find that a balance of £68 13s. 6d. remains, after finally settling all accounts, which it is intended to apply towards railing in the square in which the Monument is placed.—Dover Recorder.

THE CLERGY AND THE RAILWAYS.—Subjoined is the copy of a letter, which has been sent by the Lord Bishop of Exeter to those clergymen with cure of souls whose names appear in the lists of provisional committees of railroad companies:—

"Bishopstowe, Oct. 2, 1845.—Dear Sir,—Without the slightest intention of ascribing any improper purpose to you, I scruple not to call your attention to 1 and 2 Victoria, c. 105, ss. 29, 30. I think that the words 'dealing for gain or profit,' in the 29th section, taken in conjunction with the exemption in favour of benefit society, and fire or life assurance company in the 30th section, may be held to bring railroad companies within the provision of the statute, and therefore that the being members of provisional committees might possibly expose clergymen to the penalty of the statute.—I am, dear Sir, yours sincerely, H. EXETER."

THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

The building of this fine National Establishment is now in the last stage of "transition:" the old mansion of the Montagues has almost disappeared, although the Octagonal Lodge or Clock Tower remain: on one side you see the last walls of the old edifice, and on the other, portions of the shafts of the columns for the Great Central Portico of the new Museum. Meanwhile, the public gratification is not checked by the pulling-down and building-up: the entrance is, at present, by the western wing, where temporary, but truly substantial flights of stairs are provided, and here the living stream of visitors pour in, whilst the re-edification is progressing elsewhere.

In the wing just named, the room represented in our Engraving, has just been opened to the public; though the articles in the cases are scarcely yet arranged. In the centre of the apartment is placed the magnificent Chinese Bell, taken from a Buddhist Temple at Ningpo, and presented to the Museum by Her Majesty. Our readers will recollect that we engraved and described this Bell, during its temporary location at Buckingham Palace. (See No. 90.) On account of the present position of the Bell, the new apartment at the Museum has been called the "Chinese Room;" though, besides this spoil, there are but few curiosities of Celestial civilisation. Here will be found the specimens of South Sea manufacture which formerly filled the first of the old suite of the Museum Rooms—including several canoes and war implements, articles of clothing, matting, &c.; and the famed tortoiseshell bonnet, once worn by some Pacific beauty. There are, likewise, several idols, happily becoming comparatively rare in the countries whence they were obtained.

The second of our graphic novelties is a noble specimen of the Aurochs, or European Bison, which the Emperor of Russia has just presented to the Museum. The species is now limited to some of the Lithuanian forests, where it is carefully preserved by command of the Emperor; no specimen being allowed to be shot without his Majesty's special permission.

A good deal of difference of opinion has thrown some obscurity over this species. Cuvier considers it as certain that this animal, the largest, or, at least, the most massive of all the existing quadrupeds after the rhinoceros, is a distinct species which man has never subdued. Following out this subject with his usual industry and ability, the great naturalist goes on to state, that if Europe possessed a Urus, or Taur of the Poles, different from the Bison, or Aurochs of the Germans, it is only in its remains that the species can be traced. Such remains are found in the skulls of a species of ox different from the Aurochs, in the superficial beds of certain districts. This Cuvier thinks must be the true Urus of the ancients, the original of our domestic ox, the stock, perhaps, whence our wild cattle descended; while the Aurochs of the present day is nothing more than the Bison, or Bonassus of the ancients, a species which has never been brought under the yoke.

HEAD OF EUROPEAN BISON

The fine specimen at the Museum will, in a few days, be placed in its fit location—the Great Zoological Gallery, which, if we mistake not, is unparalleled in Europe.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

M. Ronge arrived at Manheim on the 28th ult., and proceeded to the theatre with the intention of there harangning the people, but the authorities refused to give him the key of the building. M Bannerman, the deputy, then invited M. Ronge to go to the garden of his house. He did so, and was followed by an immense crowd, who filled the vacant space and covered the trees and the wally. M. Ronge then addressed them, explaining the origin and character of the New Catholic church. He was listened to with great interest, and frequently with much clamour and applause. M Ronge in the evening at one of the hotels. Accounts from Frankfort announce the arrival of M. Ronge in that town on the 4th inst., where he had been received with great enthusiasm by the Protestant party. He had spoken and divine service, and likewise preached in the German Catholic church in that city.

The Fomento of Barcelona of the 27th ult., announces the execution at Gerona, on the preceding day, of Pedro Vinals, a bandit, who had long been the terror of the province. He was 34 years of age. Having fled into France, he was claimed by the Captain General, and delivered up to him by the French authorities on the 24th of July, in virtue of existing treaties. He confessed to having murdered, and committed many more. He had also joined the Carlist bands at the age of 14, and his life had been ever since a tissue of crimes.

The Franc Comtois of Besançon (Doubs) relates that, on the night of the 25th ult., a young man, a clerk in a commercial house in that town, but lodging at the café des Nations, entered the room of a neighbour in a state of consternation, and told the astonished individual just above himself in his chamber with his fowling-piece. The young woman, in fact, was found dead with all her clothes on, the charge of the gun having entered her forehead above her left eye. The journal adds that, after an investigation on the spot, the clerk was committed to prison.

Letters from Zurich state, that the disease which has been this year deteriorating the quality of the potato crop has made its appearance in Switzerland. It is only in the highest parts of the mountains that no appearance of disease is to be found in potatoes. Everywhere else the disease has made great progress. Potatoes that have been gathered are also deteriorated unless kept on dry ground and in well aired places.

By the death of Lord Spencer, a pension of £1840, granted to the late Edmund Burke for the lives of the Princess Amelia, the last Earl Spencer, and the late William Cavendish, Esq., ceases.

Sir John Guest, Bart., has lately purchased the splendid mansion and extensive estate of Canford, in Dorsetshire, from Lord de Mauley (son of the Earl of Ilchester), for £300,000. This property is between Wimborne and Poole, and embraces some of the outskirts of the latter town. Canford was inhabited for one year by the Queen Dowager.

A Berlin letter of the 25th ult., in the Manheim Gazette, states that when the King of Prussia was present at Munich at the baptism of the Prince Royal of Bavaria, the christening party, and some distinguished persons near the child to lay their hands upon it, the King of Prussia stretched forth his hand, but it was set aside by the bishop. The King then (says the letter) knelt upon the occasion, and blessed the infant first Munich in anger. The bishop's behaviour is said to have been intended as a rebuke upon the King of Prussia for his not having acted with sufficient severity against the new German Catholic Church.

His Highness Saïed Hillall Eben Saïed, the eldest son of the Imaum and her apparent to the Government of Muscat, has arrived in this country. The object of the Prince's visit to England is said to be that of obtaining information in respect to our Government and institutions, and to benefit by a personal inspection of those works of art and science for which Great Britain is now celebrated in all parts of the habitable world.

Letters from Corfu announce the arrival of General Kalergi in that town, where he is to take up his residence for the present. He met with a most gratifying reception from the inhabitants, and a round of entertainments was given by the principal people in the place to his honour. Some of the inhabitants wished to display their admiration of the Greek patriot by some demonstration of a more public description, but Lord Seaton opposed it on the ground that General Kalergi was at present a private individual, and that he could not allow anything beyond individual tokens of respect.

The Augsburgh Gazette states, that during the retreat of the Russians from Daghestan, they were followed and attacked a second time by Schamyl upon the Russian territory. The loss of the Russians is not yet known, but it must be considerable, as it was very severe. General Pawlowitsch was slain, and was wounded, but received a musket ball in the thigh. The Russians are said to have lost all their supplies of ammunition, &c., so that the campaign may be regarded as finished for this year.

The Empress of Russia and the grand Duchess Olga arrived at Augsburgh on the 29th of September, where they were received by the Prince of Prussia and the Prince Royal of Bavaria. The Prince of Prussia most affectionately embraced the Empress. The same evening travellers set out in the evening for Insprnck, where they will stop two days.

The Zuid Afrikaan publishes an extract from the will of Mr. H. Murray, once a resident in Cape Town, who died at Edinburgh some time ago. The deceased bequeaths a sum to be employed in the private mission to the South African College of the less affluent colonists—sons and descendants of the old Dutch settlers to have the preference. The residue of his estate is bequeathed to the same object.

The St. Petersburg journals of the 25th of September announce the decease, after a severe, but short illness, of Count de Canerine, formerly Minister of Finance, and member of the Council of the Empire. The Count Paulaski on the 16th of September last likewise mention the death of General Neidhart, at Moscow, on the 27th of August.

We learn from St. Petersburg that the Emperor of Russia, as another mark of his satisfaction at the skill of Prince Woronzow, has given him the command of a regiment of hussars, which is in future to bear his name.

The Hamburg Gazette states, from Riga, that the cholera has made its appearance in Livonia, and caused many deaths.

Letters from St. Petersburgh, under date of Sept. 26, state that the town of Tomsk had been totally destroyed by fire, and that the Emperor had subscribed 10,000 silver roubles towards the alleviation of the distress of the people.

A letter from Dusseldorf, of the 3rd of October, says:—"The opening of the Railway from Dusseldorf to Cologne will take place on the 1st of November next. The general meeting of the shareholders of the railway from Dusseldorf to Elberafeld took place yesterday; the result of the meeting was highly satisfactory. A great house in this city purchased shares to the amount of 150,000 francs."

The Elberfeld Zeitung has published an article, which will be recognised as being semi-official, and which gives the round of the German press. It denies, point blank, that any proceedings have taken place of late on religious matters at Frankfort; in fact, could not, as the New Catholics are not yet tolerated in all the German States, not even in Austria. The article goes on to say that such an interference on the part of the Diet would be tantamount to a domineering over free sovereigns, to which it has no claim. From all which, it is clear that Prince Metternich did not accomplish one of the chief aims of his going to the Rhine to meet the King of Prussia and other sovereigns

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—Since Monday the arrivals of English wheat for our market have been moderate, viz., 1450 quarters, chiefly from Essex and Kent. Fresh up-to-day they were very small, hence the show of fresh red and white wheat was limited. The accounts from the north coming very unfavourable for the harvest, the demand for wheat, of home production, was somewhat brisk, at an advance in the prices obtained on Monday of from 1s to 2s per quarter, and at which a good clearance was effected. The numbers of sheep on sale were moderate, the mutton tradesfolk dull, at late rates Calves were in short supply, and steady request, and previous currencies were readily supported. MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The English Market has been gradually advancing since the opening on Monday, and a good deal of business on prices has been done in Consols. Consols have advanced from 97¼ to 98 (the closing price of the preceding week) to 98⅝ to ⅞, and Wednesday closed at 98⅝. This quotation, however, has been barely supported, and the closing price yesterday was 98⅝ to ⅞ exchequer bills have also improved, but close a trifling degree flatter than the price they had attained, quoting 35s to 45s prem. India Stock receded on Tuesday, yielding to some large sales, and stands at 265. But a bargain has been registered on the remaining bonds that are open for transfer.

The Foreign Market has been a slight degree more active than the preceding week. Mexican Stock did not immediately improve upon the arrival of the mail on Monday, but advanced on Tuesday to 32¾. The following day, however, some realising depressed the price to 31⅞ to 32, the market closing very flatly with respect both to Mexican and Columbian. A slight rally has since occurred on both, and the former closes at 31⅞ for the Active Stock, the latter at 17½ to 18¼. Spanish have been scarcely dealt in, closing at 28¾ for the Three per Cents., and 5⅞ to 6 for the Active. Portuguese have not varied more than a ¼ turn" during the week, and are little better than nominal. Portuguese was flat at 60 to ¾, on Tuesday; the closing quotation, however, shows an improvement, it being 61¾. Peruvian is 38¾; Grenada Bonds, 21¾ to 22; Venezuelas, 4¾; Belgian, 99⅞; Dutch Four per Cents., 99⅞; Two and a Half, 60 to ⅝.

Although there have been fluctuations in the various Scrips of the new lines, the general tone of the Market during the week has been steadiness, with well maintained prices. A temporary decrease of business is usually felt at this period of the year, and the amount done, although less than the preceding account, continues exceedingly extensive. Some slang existed towards the close of the last account that money would become suddenly scarce; and, in fact, the discount brokers were in full employment for all their capital. But within the last few days has considerably changed, and money is again tolerably easy. Scrips generally continue in fair demand, and the merits of several railways already in operation are daily more appreciated. Among others, the Peterborough and Nottingham Junction Railway is regarded with considerable favour. The length of line is about [illegible] miles, and the engineering difficulties are trifling, with the most promising facilities. Earl Fitzwilliam has signified his approval of the project, and the inhabitants of the country through which the line passes, are unanimously in its favour. The present prices are per scrip:—Ambergate, Nottingham, and Boston, 20½; Antrim, Armagh, Coleraine, and Portrush, 2¾. Boston, Stamford, and Birmingham, 1¾ pm.; Birmingham and Gloucester, 128½; Bristol and Exeter, 21; Ditto New, 11; Caledonian, 24½; Ditto Extension, 5¼; Cambrian, 4¼; Cambridge and [illegible] Ditto New, 4¼; Cambridge and Oxford, 2¼; Chelmsford and Bury, 3½; Chester and Holyhead, 20½; Chester and Manchester, 1¾ pm.; Cornwall, 4¼; Coventry, Nuneaton, Birmingham, and Leicester, 4¼; Derby, Uttoxeter, and Stafford, 3¾; Direct Manchester (Remington's), 4¼; Direct Norwich, 1¾; Dublin and Galway, 5¾; Eastern Counties, 2¼; Ditto New, 6¾ pm., Edin and Glasgow, 7¾; Exeter, Crewe, and Chester, 2¼; Oxford and Gloucester, Aberystwith, and Central of Wales, 3; Grand Union, 4; Great Eastern and Western, 2¾; Great Southern and Western (Ireland), 24¾; Great North of England, 9¾; Ditto Leeds and Selby, 5¾; Carlisle and Darlington, 2¾; Ditto Fifths, 36¾; Harwich, 1¾; Hull and Selby, 103; Ditto Quarter Shares, 21¾; Ditto Half Shares, 22¾; Leicester and Birmingham, 2¾ pm., Leicester and Hitchin, 2¾; Direct Northern, 2¾; Direct, 5¾; Lincoln and Burmingham, 217, Ditto Quarter Shares, 27¾; Ditto Extension, 2¾, London and Blackwall, 2¾; London and Brighton, 70; Ditto Sixths, 2¾; London and Croydon, 2¾; London and Greenwich

SAMUDA'S ATMOSPHERIC RAILWAY.

VIADUCT ON THE CROYDON ATMOSPHERIC RAILWAY, CROSSING THE DOVER AND BRIGHTON LINES, BETWEEN NORWOOD AND CROYDON.

We resume our Illustrations of the various methods of Atmospheric Traction with that invented by Messrs. Clegg and Samuda, which may be thus generally described.

A large tube is laid down in the centre of a line of rails. This tube has an opening at the top, which is closed by a valve, formed of a leather strap, covered with short plates of iron above and below. Now, the strap being broader than the plates, it is pressed against the top of the pipe by a succession of long rods, screwed down with hook bolts, and thus forming a hinge. On the side on which the valve opens is a groove, which is filled with a composition of wax and tallow. It is evident that when the valve is raised, there will be space enough for a bent plate of iron to pass into the tube.

ENGINE-HOUSE, AT CROYDON.

To the leading carriage of every train a piston is attached by a bent plate; and the piston rod are four wheels, two before and two behind the bent plate, so that when the piston is in the pipe, these wheels raise the valve, and prevent it from touching the bent plate. In this manner a communication is made between the piston in the pipe and the leading carriage.

Engines, working large air pumps, are stationed at intervals of three miles along the line, by means of which the pipe is exhausted of its air. When this is done, the pressure of the atmosphere on the back of the piston is the power to draw the train. It will be observed that, as the train progresses, (the wheels on the piston-rod raising the valve), there is an opening equal to the area of the pipe, at which the air can rush in, directly on to the back of the piston.

When the piston has passed, and allowed the valve to fall into its place, a wheel, attached to one of the carriages, presses it down; after which, a copper bar is drawn along the groove, to force the composition against the edge of the valve, and so exclude the external atmosphere. This bar is heated, to prevent the composition adhering to it. The pipe is then ready to be exhausted for another train.

The Atmospheric Railway was first experimented, some years since, at Wormholt Scrubbs, where a line of three-quarters of a mile in length was laid down, at the expense of the Patentees. The success of the experiments on this line, in spite of the novelty of the invention, and consequent inferiority of the apparatus, was so decided, as to induce the Dublin and Kingstown Railway Company at once to employ the Atmospheric principle on that part of their line between Kingstown and Dalkey—where it has continued to answer the high expectations formed of it. (See Engravings of this Line at page 16 of Vol. IV. of our Journal.) The Croydon, South Devon, and Paris and St. Germain Companies have since adopted this system.

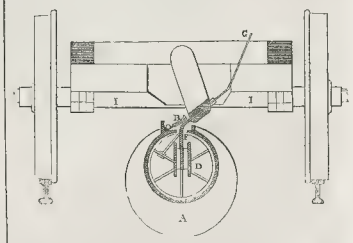
Five miles' length of the Croydon Line are now completed, and trial trips have been made thereon. Upon one occasion, with a train of twelve carriages, a speed of seventy-five miles per hour was obtained.

The size of the tube used at Wormholt Scrubbs was nine inches, internal diameter: that of the tubes at Croydon and Dalkey is fifteen inches.

Several experimental trips have already been made upon the Croydon line. The following are a few of the results:—



CROSS SECTION OF THE TUBE, &c.

The question as to the power of ascending inclines has been completely set at rest by an experimentum crucis. A train was brought to the foot of an incline of 1 in 50, and stopped, so as to deprive it of any power it might have acquired from the impetus of its previous progression. It was then propelled by the atmosphere up the incline, and that which many of our most eminent engineers have declared an impossibility, was accomplished with the greatest ease imaginable. Among other results that have been obtained, we may mention, that the five miles' length of tube has been exhausted in its whole extent, the barometer being at the time at 27½, and that the piston has traversed its whole length.

ALGIERS.

The late disaster which has overtaken a detachment of French troops in Algiers has excited much interest in England as well as France; but the expressions of the English press have given great offence to the Parisian journalists. It has been mentioned as a retribution for the atrocity of the caves of Dahra; and this the French press chooses to consider an insult. They charge us with exulting in the slaughter of brave men, and rejoicing at anything that seems like a misfortune to France. We deny that any such feeling exists among Englishmen; but it is not our fault if the French have so conducted themselves as to deprive them of the sympathies of the world and turn them to the side of the invaded people. There is certainly not so much pity felt for the destruction of these five hundred men, doubtless brave soldiers, as there would have been but for that horrible episode of the burning of a native tribe which had ceased to resist. It was an act more befitting demons than men; it was a violation of all the laws of war, and must have been expected by the French themselves to have provoked a bloody vengeance. That vengeance has come; and when it is traced back to the cruelty of the invading army, treated as a retribution for the past, our neighbours only see in our reflections—which have neither been ill-natured nor exultant—a rejoicing over the humiliation of an opponent. We are sure that thousands in France must have made almost the same observations. All the press of that country, without exception, condemned and denounced the massacre of Dahra as strongly as their brethren on this side of the Channel: it was felt as a disgrace on all civilised countries. Whence, then, the anger that the retaliation of the Arab should awaken but faint regret and no surprise whatever? Surely a warlike nation like the French must know that hostilities have always two parties to them, and that the victor is himself exposed to reverses. The French drive the Arabs into holes in the rocks and roast them alive; the Arabs, on the first opportunity, draw a body of French troops into an ambuscade, and cut them to pieces. It is injury and retaliation, the Arabs showing to the most advantage; for suffocating unresisting men is mere murder, while an ambuscade is a common stratagem of war, as old as the campaigns of Alexander or Hannibal; and those who fell in the present case at least died with arms in their hands and resisting to the last. For such things as this all engaged in war must be prepared. What has been more common of late years than to read of expeditions sent by the French commanders into the interior to "take summary vengeance" on such or such a village, which had been guilty of the crime or resistance to the invader? During the first Revolution and the last days of Napoleon, at both which periods the territory of France was threatened by the Allied Powers, the defence of that territory was considered by Frenchmen a sacred duty.

The doctrine of retaliation is thoroughly understood by the sons of the Desert. The French have shown no mercy, and they receive none. When their calamities, then, are by the world treated as retributions for cruelties of their own, it is not done from any pleasure in the humiliation and disasters of another, but from a sort of natural reasoning almost impossible to avoid—a recognition of that "even-handed justice" which

> Commends the ingredients of our poisoned chalice
> To our own lips.

While public attention, however, is turned towards Algiers, we will take the opportunity of briefly sketching the mode in which the conquest was made, the way it is governed, and the sort of man the French have to deal with in Abd-el-Kader, who, just when he was looked on as powerless, is all at once more formidable than ever.

The possession of Algiers was left as a legacy—and it is almost a fatal one—from the Government of Charles X. In the last days of his reign, when the uneasy spirits of France gave strong indications of a wish for change, his Ministers thought a military expedition would be a good means of diverting dangerous energy from political purposes. The army, as subsequent events proved, was disaffected: it remembered the glories of the Empire and inherited an aversion to the Bourbons. So the expedition to Algiers was planned; the pretext for it being an insult offered to the French Consul in public by Hussein Dey. On the 5th of July, 1830, Marshal Bourmont entered Algiers as its conqueror, at the head of the army then more dreaded by the rulers of France than the people of North Africa. But, alas for human calculations!—on the 30th of that same month Charles X. had virtually ceased to reign! The Army of Algiers, however, did not suspend its operations, which were soon continued actively under the new régime. At first the acquisition seemed an easy one; the coming, seeing, and conquering of the Roman appearing almost realised. Time only brought out the difficulties, which increased with every league of advance into the interior; and now, at the end of fifteen years, those difficulties are as great as ever. The preparations now making by the French War Department are more like those for an attempt of a new conquest than the mere holding a long-possessed colony. When the French landed, they, of course, brought with them an immense amount of ignorance of the state of the country, its resources, its inhabitants, and the mode of ruling them. The first step of the Marshal was to appoint an Administrative and Finance Commission. But the results were only that old forms were destroyed before new ones had been created. A sort of municipal council was formed, and a police established, on the French model; but never were life and property less safe in Algiers than during the early days of the French occupation. It is said that the Treasury, the Arsenal, and other buildings, were left unguarded, so that every man felt justified in helping himself to whatever he could find: this was one of the first things that disgusted the True Believers with the sway of the Christian invaders. The feeling was increased by some immunities and privileges given to the Jews—another scandal in the eyes of the Moslems. In short, the footing of the French with the people of Algiers was like that of Master Slender with Anne Page—"there was no great love between them at first, and it pleased Heaven to decrease it, on better acquaintance." But the true beginning of sorrows was the attempt to subdue the wandering Kabyles, the houseless tribes of the Desert. They were required to acknowledge the French King as their master, and pay a tribute. This authority the French possess in every place within range of their cannon, but not beyond it. Long before these aggressions began, Bourmont had left Africa, resigning the command to General Clauzel; and it was under him that Algiers was organised like a department of France. That organization has been gradually extended; the toils of Civil Government being varied by perpetual skirmishes and battles with the Arabs, and frequent razzias: these are expeditions against some particular tribe, with the object of killing all the males, burning everything that cannot be moved or consumed, and carrying off the women and children prisoners. It was this ruthless savagery that roused the Arabs to the desperate resistance they have always made, and raised to military renown their chief, Abd-el-Kader, who has been a formidable foe to every successive Governor—Berthezène, Savary, Voirol, Clausel (who was twice Commandant), Avizard, and, equal to any of his predecessors in energy and talent, Marshal Bugeaud.

Abd-el-Kader is the third son of an old chief in the vicinity of Mascara: his family is one of the most ancient in Arabia. It was not altogether accident that raised him to the command. When the Arab chiefs began to perceive that the rule of the French would be even harsher than that of the Ottoman powers, they thought of combination and resistance, and cast about them for a commander. They wanted one of talent and influence; and it augurs much for the modesty and good sense of these sons of Ishmael that one of them thought of himself. The choice fell on the father of Abd-el-Kader, and the chiefs waited on him in a body to offer him the post of honour. The old Arab excused himself on the score of years (he was nearly seventy) and declining strength; but pointed out his third son, as possessed of all the qualities requisite in a commander. "The other two," said the old man, "are not of equal capacity." They took the old chief's advice, and selected Abd-el-Kader as the man who should unfurl the banner of the Prophet and raise the standard of ancient Arabian independence. The following description [illegible] speech by a chief [illegible]

> Abd el Kader is about five feet seven inches high, and very [illegible] and yet delicately small and remarkably white [illegible] a fair complexion, pale skin, [illegible] and high forehead, [illegible] full of brilliancy and softness, arched eyebrows, [illegible] a well-made nose slightly aquiline, rather thin lips, and a full black beard terminating in a point.
> His dress is similar to that worn by [illegible] in burnouse, with large silk tassels on the hood [illegible] red cap [illegible] burnouse made of camel's hair. The common cord of black on white camel's hair, wreathed in several folds, round the hood of the white burnouse, denotes the religion to which he belongs.
> He always carries in his right hand, a small chaplet of black beads which he counts with rapidity, uttering a silent ejaculation with each, such as "God is most great." "Oh, High Oh, Great! I assert Thy absolute glory." "God is most great in greatness, and praise be to God in abundance," &c. &c.

Abd-el-Kader has appealed to the religious enthusiasm of his countrymen, and this he directs with great skill and activity. His mode of warfare is predatory—the most difficult to meet effectually in such a country. He has several times narrowly escaped being taken, once solely by a daring leap on horseback; but as yet has defied all the efforts of the French, though they have offered a reward of Four Thousand Pounds for his head. He keeps up a harassing war, in which the French can gain nothing and lose a great deal. The battle of Isly, and the treaty with the Emperor of Morocco, scarcely altered his position. The Emperor undertook more than he could perform; Abd-el-Kader is as independent of him as of the French; nay, such is his influence over the Mahommetan population, that it is not impossible he may seize the Throne of Morocco for himself. Such is the enemy with whom the French have to contend, and who is again on foot with all his wonted vigour. As for the colony, the advantage it has been to France may be estimated from the following facts:—The conquest and occupation of Algeria have cost France twenty-six millions, eight hundred thousand pounds sterling. Against this expenditure may be set balance of four millions, twenty-nine thousand, four hundred and eighty pounds, derived from the treasure seized in the city and the public revenues, down to 1844, leaving an absolute loss of nearly twenty-three millions! Add to this, the waste of life, which is enormous, and we shall see that the worst enemies of France could not inflict on her such deadly injury as she brings on herself by persevering in the career of African conquest.

THE PRESENT PARLIAMENT.—The existing House of Commons may continue in being till the autumn of 1847, and from actual appearance there is no reason to conclude that it will be dissolved much before that time.

TASTE FOR READING AMONG THE PEOPLE. THE TIMES.—"Look at the educational condition of the people. For good or for evil, whichever it be, most important change has there come over us. Whonow brings out a first edition in quarto? Of what are 'people's editions' the evidence? From art we have illustrated newspapers, to republications in weekly numbers or monthly parts of Shakspeare and Froissart. we have everywhere proofs of extension of taste and reading. That the taste is imperfect and the reading mere amusement are, perhaps, more than probable, and that neither produce any valuable results may be granted; but there they are, facts, and as such valuable. Even the reviews and magazines, trashy and superficial, mere trunkmaker's stock as most of them are, now enlist the pens of those who in the last century would have devoted themselves to the production of octavos, as their grandsires did to the composition of folios. A generation had one Junius, elaborating an occasional letter to exasperate the reading public. Every day now affords to an infinitely extended reading public, food for thought or a kind unknown to the literary epheme-rides of thirty years ago."

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE

PARISIANA

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Wednesday

A grand review of the troops which are about to leave this country for the purpose of committing razzahs, and smoking to death the Arab tribes, has just come off. To give it the proper prestige, the King of the French assisted the military solemnity. At an early hour, eight regiments of infantry and cavalry had arranged themselves in battle order, in the Place du Carrousel. The infantry was composed of the 11th, 13th, 24th, 60th, 70th, and 71st of the line; the cavalry, of the 5th Dragoons and of the 7th Hussars. Louis Philippe and the Royal Family arrived from the Palace of the Tuileries. After a short delay, the King mounted his charger, and took his station at the head of his brilliant staff. The King of the Belgians, the Prince of Salerno, the Dukes de Nemours, d'Aumale, and Montpensier, the Prince de Joinville, Generals Rumigny, Gourgaud, Sebastiani, and a considerable number of the officers of the état-major, formed the cortège of the King, who successively passed in front of each regiment, commencing with the infantry, and finishing with the Hussars. The drums rolled loudly, the bands sent forth their most martial harmonies, and long and loud cheers of the right sort greeted the worthy accompaniment. The Queen and Princesses, who were in their most splendid toilettes, graced the balcony of the Pavilion d'Horloge. The windows were filled with three hundred elegantly attired ladies. After the review of the regiments, the King and his cortège returned to the Pavilion, and defiled before the Royal gazers. A grand dinner took place at five o'clock in the Elana Gallery; and eleven o'clock the Royal Family returned to St. Cloud. And this brilliant farce was acted as a prelude to the departure of the poor victims who are consigned to the burning sun of Africa, to the pestilence of the East, or to the fell vengeance of the Moslem, who are gloriously defending their country and their homes, against the gentle mercies of France and its invading hordes. Truly this is wreathing with garlands of roses the temples of the sacrificed. The sounds of drums and the braying of trumpets will scarcely drown the shrieks of bereaved mothers and broken-hearted wives. But this is French glory!

It is reported here, and, I believe, on very good authority, that, indeed, entirely of the railroad project of surrounding Paris, which was submitted to the Commission nominated by the Préfet of the Seine, that there is another project, not under consideration, of forming a railroad in the interior of Paris. The projected line is to form a junction with the Northern and Lyons. It will coalesce at the head of the Pont Neuf, and descend to the "Rue Haute Feuille," running partially in the open air, and following the Boulevards to the place of the Bastille, which it will traverse through the means of tunnelling, whence it is to re-appear as far as the basin of St. Martin, traversing, by a slight bend, to the height of the line to Lyons. The line will present upwards of 4560 metres. The general principle to be adopted is to be the subterranean; so that the most populous portion of Paris will possess a rushing and whirling mass of locomotion, and locomotive and atmospherics, hourly passing beneath it. There is a chance, if these improvements come into operation, that a boiler may burst, and send a large number of the good badauds into what the Yankees poetically call "Eternal smash!" Here is, indeed, an infernal machine upon a grand scale.

Count D'Orsay has presented, through the medium of Eugene Sue, to the French Government, one of the most splendid specimens of Hindoo pictorial art. It was sent to the Count from Madras, by Lord Elphinstone. The picture measures three feet in breadth and four feet in height, and represents the Indian Divinity Krisnah, presented as a sort of mammoth, and receiving the homage of a female of an amber complexion. The colouring, which is exquisite, reminds one strongly of the first manner of Giotto, whose palette I imagined in the thirteenth century. There is an excuse by the old Italian Master, in the Louvre, "The Vision of St. Francis." The work of the Hindoo artist has also another striking resemblance: it is of the Byzantium school, that search which is now being made for the Mosque of Sainte [illegible] 537, by the famous Sculptor Athemius of Tralles. The Hindoo painting sent to Paris, by Count D'Orsay, the portrait of Krisnah, reminds her behind the pictures of the Byzantine artists. Instead of being only covered with gilding, the Krisnah rejoices in a necklace of the finest oriental pearls—it bears on its head a diadem of rubies, and of emeralds, the size of a pullet's egg, one of which is near a pound! Although the stuff has good ground, enamelled with detached flowers in bouquets of wonderous charmingship, and the most exquisite taste. The frame is worthy the picture, and is almost composed of small, cabinet-size looking crystal, the prisms of which sisters like phosphorescent sea-shells. The effect of the fly. It is, indeed, incomparable, and beyond anything in the collection of the Museum, of Leadenhall street. Previously to his leaving Paris, Eugene Sue placed the Krisnah in the Byzantine room of the Musee.

The long anticipated inauguration of the Madeleine took place on Wednesday. The Archbishop of Paris, surrounded by the grand dignitaries of the Metropolitan Church and numerous clergy of the parish, proceeded to the consecration of the Church. The Archbishop first sought the various holy relics which belong to the parish, and deposited them in the reliquary of the principal [illegible] notwithstanding the [illegible] and the [illegible] terminate till after eleven. For the purpose of leaving sufficient space [illegible] Archbishop for making the numerous benedictions, the public was not admitted to the nave until the ceremonies had finished; notwithstanding, several privileged persons had procured tickets for the superior tribunes of the nave, which were then removed, the Archbishop, clad in his pontificals, retired to the sacristy, where are the relics, and placed them on the altar, reading the Seven Penitential Psalms. Then, with [illegible] extensive, he made the three signs of the cross on the sides of the church and the altar. In the presents, ashes were spread in the centre of the nave, upon which he made another cross. The arms of the cross were formed of letters of the Greek alphabet, and of the Latin and French. During this time was sung the cantate of Lazarus resuscitated. Then the Archbishop then approached the altar, where he resounded the [illegible] of holy water, and pronounced a blessing on a mixture composed of salt, cinders, and water. Now took place the consecration of the chief altar, around which he marched seven times, sprinkling it with the aspersoir, and three times the three circuits around the interior of the church, during the holy water above and below. Then took place Grand Mass, and the doors of the temple were then thrown open to the public.

FRANCE.

ANOTHER DEFEAT OF THE FRENCH IN ALGERIA.—Paris has been startled by the announcement of another attack upon the French in Algeria, attended with very serious consequences. We copy the following from the [illegible]

"[illegible], which has arrived from Algiers, brings us a piece of news which [illegible] believe, but which nevertheless is communicated to us as [illegible] Two hundred Frenchmen, and, among the number, sixty Zouaves, have deposited their arms at the feet of the Arabs. This fact, so uncommon in our military annals, has electrified the whole Algerine population. We require to know under what circumstances this unfortunate episode of the African war has occurred, and this the next courier from Africa will acquaint us with."

The Sud has a few particulars of this defeat—

"The Ville de Bordeaux (says this paper), which left Algiers just as the Oran mail arrived, could bring us nothing but rumour. But our Toulon Correspondent supplies us with a piece of information, in our eyes far more important than the deplorable affair in which 450 of our brave men met their death. If our Correspondent, who is generally well informed, is to be credited, 200 of our soldiers and five officers have surrendered themselves as prisoners.

"TOULON, Oct. 8th, 1845.

"Yesterday, at half-past nine P M, the steamer Cerbère arrived from Algiers with despatches. It is affirmed the false brings most distressing intelligence; and that the same was the morning transmitted to the Government by telegraph.

"A [illegible] of another desperate struggle in the westward of Algeria, 200 of our troops, and, among the number, five officers and forty Zouaves, surrounded on all sides by hosts of Arabs, and summoned to surrender as prisoners of war, laid down their arms. This news, which in the morning was only a vague report, has this afternoon assumed all the characteristics of an unquestionable and methodical fact—it is official. We all expect to hear of the immediate return of the Marsha. Duke of [illegible]

The Paris papers comment in a very animated strain upon this fresh attack. The authenticity of the account is to be doubted. It is true that no notice is taken of it officially, either by the Messager of Monday evening, or Moniteur of Tuesday morning; but the Journal des Débats, whose communication with the Ministry is well known, inserts the account given of the occurrence by the Marseilles papers, as if it considered them but too authentic.

The Prince de Joinville, according to the Constitutionnel, is to have a command in the approaching campaign, and to cruize off Tangiers and Mogador, in order to protect the subjects of France, while Marshal Bugeaud [illegible] and Abd-el-Kader within the territory of Morocco. As to the [illegible] on the 16th, the greatest activity prevailed in the preparations [illegible] odate departure of the 12,000 men about to be sent to the province of Oran. Seven steam frigates, as well as other ships were to convey these large reinforcements across the Mediterranean, and one regiment, the 38th of the line, was to have embarked as early as the 12th.

Considerable excitement has been created in Paris by a letter of Marshal Bugeaud, written in a very irritated strain, in which the gallant marshal complains of having been abandoned by the Government to his enemies, the [illegible] and of Abd-el-Kader's having determined not to return to Algiers [illegible] late events had, however, induced him to alter his determination, and had accordingly proposed to leave Paris for Algeria. The Government [illegible] ry with Marshal Bugeaud for publishing this letter, and [illegible] intended to be confidential. The opposition prints, on the other hand, have not failed to make the bombastic effusion an excuse [illegible] charge the Government. It is said that Marshal Bugeaud has been [illegible] upon to explain the insubordinate tone of his letter.

We see that our Paris contemporaries are much pleased with the friendly reception given to M. Thiers in London.

The Journal des Travaux Publics expresses its belief that the adjudication of the railroad lines for 1845 will take place in November.

The adjudication of the Paris and Strasburg Railroad will be announced in the Moniteur immediately after the return of the Minister of Public Works to Paris. That journal adds, that if all the companies did not unite, not more than three or four would be in a condition to bid for the concession.

SPAIN

We have letters from Madrid to the 8th inst. They mention an act on the part of the Government which is very characteristic of the arbitrary disposition of the Narvaez Cabinet. It has summarily dismissed the assistant of [illegible] and has appointed in his room, honourably acquitted MM. Cortina, Madoz, Lasso, and two other deputies.

A decree has been published in the Gazette, announcing the conclusion of the arrangement between the Government and Bank of San Fernando, for the monthly advance of sixty millions of reals, during the months of October, November, and December.

It was reported that the late Minister of the Interior, the Marquis de Pena Florida, would be appointed Alcalde of Madrid. The concentration of the naval force of Spain at Cadiz had given rise to numerous conjectures, but it appears that the measure was ordered by the Minister of Marine, whose intention it was to inspect those vessels. Colonel Milans del Bosch had been arrested, and confined in the barracks of the Guards.

The Madrid Correspondent of the Post, in a letter dated Oct. 7, says:—"The King of the French's grand project, the marriage of his youngest son with the Infanta of Spain, is in danger of being wrecked when all in view of the part of Barcelona, the British Government having, within the last few days, formally announced to those of France and Spain its opposition to such an alliance. It very properly will not abide by what passed in private between Queen Victoria and King Louis Philippe, during her Majesty's last visit to the Chateau of Eu. I have the above news from an authentic source, and future events will prove it to be correct. If the Duke de Montpensier marries the heir presumptive to the Spanish throne, it will be at arms, and against the will of the Cabinets of Russia, Austria, Prussia, Portugal, and Great Britain."

GERMANY

Our letters from Germany trace the progress of the Religious Reform which agitates so much that country at the present moment. The Pastor Ronge arrived at Frankfort on the 4th, accompanied by his brother and the German Catholic preachers, Messrs. Dowiat and Kelmsen, as also by several deputies from the German Catholic communities of the neighbourhood, followed by an incessant shout of joy from a great crowd of people. From Offenbach the road was covered by thousands of persons, and in Sachsenhausen, which place they had to pass, the streets and the public places were decorated with flowers and garlands. The German Catholic divine service was performed at eleven o'clock in the Reformed Church, and the sermon preached by M. Ronge.

A letter from Worms, dated Oct. 5, says:—"The entry of the Pastor Ronge and his companions into our ancient town was like a public festival, and was followed by the Catholic and tens of thousands, who greeted him with continual shouts of joy. Two of our most notable citizens, [the one of them an Israelite, voluntarily offered their residences to serve for a place of assembly for the Catholic divine service should be performed. Our inhabitants, Catholics and Protestants, united to arrange the place, and succeeded in changing it into a well adorned temple, with also several galleries, and other necessary accommodations. However, the number of persons wishing to attend being very considerable it was found necessary to resort to another expedient, and on the very day of its performance a tent was erected and fitted up for the occasion, in which more than 15,000 could thus listen to the words spoken on the occasion by the great reformer of our days, and such words, though simple and without any oratorical ornament, were still very impressive and produced a great effect on the multitude of his hearers

"The good ladies of our town presented the German Catholic Church with a cup and other vessels necessary for its service, and these were offered to M. Ronge and the other officiating divines. Owing to the great number of strangers present, no member of our German Catholic community partook of the sacrament, which was administered under both forms on the occasion, to, however, no less than 300 persons; among whom were those belonging to the German Catholic communities of Mannheim, Grundstadt, and of Sensheim, near the River Hesse."

"The good effects of M. Ronge's visit to our town will be very considerable. Since the time of the Reformation such a multitude of people never assembled here, and thousands of persons will now spread the seed of the new Church far and wide. A most interesting sight to see the Reformer of the 19th century addressing the people in the very market-place, where Luther did the same 300 years before him, and he himself seemed to have been impressed when he called out ein steel Luther!"

A letter from Darmstadt, dated October 8, says:—Ronge left us to-day, amidst the shouts of thousands, who bade him a most hearty farewell, and, after having taken a most affectionate leave from all the members composing the committee of our German Catholic congregation, they, in their turn, presented him some valuable and significant presents. M. Ronge seems, indeed, to have been chosen by the panic terror to arrange the place, and succeeded in changing it into a well adorned temple, with also several galleries, and other necessary accommodations. However, the number of persons wishing to attend being very considerable it was found necessary to resort to another expedient, and on the very day of its performance a tent was erected and fitted up for the occasion, in which more than 15,000 could thus listen to the words spoken on the occasion by the great reformer of our days, and such words, though simple and without any oratorical ornament, were still very impressive and produced a great effect on the multitude of his hearers

"The good ladies of our town presented the German Catholic Church with a cup and other vessels necessary for its service, and these were offered to M. Ronge and the other officiating divines. Owing to the great number of strangers present, no member of our German Catholic community partook of the sacrament, which was administered under both forms on the occasion, to, however, no less than 300 persons; among whom were those belonging to the German Catholic communities of Mannheim, Grundstadt, and of Sensheim, near the River Hesse."

"The good effects of M. Ronge's visit to our town will be very considerable. Since the time of the Reformation such a multitude of people never assembled here, and thousands of persons will now spread the seed of the new Church far and wide. A most interesting sight to see the Reformer of the 19th century addressing the people in the very market-place, where Luther did the same 300 years before him, and he himself seemed to have been impressed when he called out ein steel Luther!"

EPITOME OF NEWS.—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

The King of Sweden and Norway closed in person, on the 27th ult. the Storthing of the latter country, after a longer session than usual. In his address, he expressed his regret that the Storthing had not approved of the plan which was laid before it for the improvement and extension of the marine service, and then proceeded to remark that it was with satisfaction he could inform the Storthing that, in conjunction with a neighbouring state, and with the active support of the Governments of England and France, the negociations respecting the yearly tribute to Morocco had been most happily concluded. At the close of the address he was greeted by repeated cries of "God save the King, the Fatherland, and the brother Kingdom."

The Duchess de Berri arrived at Vienna on the 2nd inst., on a visit to the Imperial Family.

The Frankfort Journal mentions that a whole parish in Silesia having unanimously embraced German Catholicism, considered that according to law the village church belonged to them, but when they were on the point of commencing Divine service, they were intimidated by the Secretary, aided by several gendarmes. The name of the village is Jerschendorf, near Neumark. On the 1st, the people celebrated the anniversary of the publication of Ronge's letter to the Bishop of Treves, declaring that the attempts to repress the reformation would now prove vain.

Accounts from Copenhagen confirm the impression that a severe volcanic eruption has occurred in Iceland. Several vessels which have arrived in ports from the vicinity of that northern island, appear at different periods to have been visited by showers of combustible matter, which can in no other way be accounted for; and direct arrivals from Iceland are anxiously looked for.

Mr. Alfred Tennyson, the author of "Locksley Hall," the "May Queen," and some other beautiful poems, has just received a pension of £200 per annum from her Majesty. Sir R. Peel made the intimation very delicately through Mr. Hallam, the historian

A letter from Vienna, Oct. 5, in the Journal de Frankfort, says:—"The Emperor was agitated by a panic at the news of the disorders which burst out in Italy. Enormous sums were lost by those speculating for the account. The Government, it is said, has come in aid of the Bourse with considerable sums."

A Berlin letter of the 7th, says:—"Yesterday one of our first banking-houses received from Vienna intelligence that about thirty persons, who had speculated in railway shares, and were not able to fulfil their engagements, had disappeared suddenly. These persons, it is said, are for the most part Jews and persons of little importance; nevertheless, their disappearance has caused a considerable fall in the railway shares. The Austrian Government had long foreseen this, and, in consequence, had taken measures relative to the safety of the bank. It is true that these steps have produced a momentary want of money, but they will prevent new disorders and new losses. Similar measures were taken antecedently with full success by the Prussian Government, and since then the phrenzy of jobbing has considerably diminished."

America has lost one of her greatest men, in the person of the celebrated jurist, Judge Story, who died at Salem on the 10th of September last, at the age of sixty-six. The name of Judge Story is well known, not in England only, but in every part of Europe, by his "Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States." his "Treatise on the Conflict of Laws," and other legal works of the highest reputation. As one of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, for no less than thirty-four years, he had a large and important share in the administration of justice, and in combination with his high judicial functions he discharged the duties of a professor of law in Harvard University, in the state of Massachusetts

The Cologne Gazette of the 8th confirms the account we have already given of the answer of the King of Prussia to the address of the Municipal Council of Berlin. His Majesty is said to have added:—"My principle is that the church ought to be formed by itself. My father, who rests in God, made to the church a precious gift—the synods. The late Minister of Public Worship attached too little importance to this point, and therefore the convocations of synods have not been made. The present Minister of Public Worship has as little fear of publicity as I have myself. I shall [illegible] until after the synods have spoken. If they are silent, I will remain silent." It is further stated that the Municipal Council of Berlin is preparing a development of its address, which will be an answer to the reproach made to it by the King.

A letter from Lucern of the 10th, states that two captains of the army of that canton, named Barin and Ulmi, have been sentenced to death, for the part they took against the Government in the late rebellion; but it is supposed that the Grand Council will spare their lives.

A sale of the paintings, the property of the late Joseph Buonaparte, ex King of Spain, recently took place in the United States. The gross amount of the sale was 26,000 dollars.

The following is an extract of a letter from St. Petersburg, of the 20th Sept.:—"Every one here believes that the Emperor, in the course of his journey to the eastern parts of the empire, will visit Berlin. No one envies the position of Prince Woronzoff; and the old Russian party, which obtained the situation for him, is stupified. Since the death of the Grand Duke Alexandra, and that of General Benkendorff, a new party, of whom was replaced in the suite of the Emperor by Count Orloff. Haken schell, the influence of the old Russian party has preponderated."

We learn from Constantinople that the ex-Minister of Finances has been appointed Governor of Trieala, and that the expected Reza Pacha will be placed at the head of a province. Essad Pacha, who has been named Governor of Kroutzoun, has the reputation of being a great friend to the Greeks.

The Augsburg Gazette gives a rather alarming account of the corn harvest in Russia, Poland, and most parts of Germany, but it does not appear to have arrived at its conclusions from official returns, or any other information of a very positive character.

According to a letter from Berlin, of the 7th, the Prussian Government had nearly completed the organisation of a Consistory on the religious disputes in Germany, and had placed at the head of it M. Eylert, a well known orthodox Protestant. M. Sack, one of the councillors of the Consistory, had received instructions to proceed on a mission to the northern courts, to concert with them the measures to be adopted. We learn from Koenigsberg that the municipality of that place has expressed its approval of the address presented to the King of Prussia by the Municipality of Berlin in favour of religious toleration, and resolved to send a similar address to the Sovereign.

FATAL OCCURRENCE TO LIEUTENANT COLONEL METCALFE

Lieutenant Colonel Metcalfe, of the Royal Horse Artillery, came to his death suddenly at the village of Elstree, near Aldenham, Hertfordshire, under painful circumstances. An inquest has since been held at the Artichoke there, and the following evidence relative to this melancholy occurrence was adduced

William Howard examined.—The witness stated that he lived as groom to the late Colonel Metcalfe. He occupied the room immediately under that of his master. On Saturday night last, the 11th instant, witness saw him go into his apartments for the purpose of dressing to attend a party. Witness heard him go out in about an hour after, and he (witness) then went to bed. In a short time his master returned, and again went into his room, but did not remain long before he left. Witness went to sleep, and did not hear any more of him during the night. At about seven o'clock the next morning he went into his room, as was his usual custom, to call the deceased, and when he was astonished at finding two candles burning in the sockets of the candlesticks, and his master not in bed, nor had he been. From the undisturbed state of the bed-clothes. Upon looking behind the window-curtain he divided the room he discovered the deceased sitting on the sofa, with his head reclining over the side, weltering in blood, which appeared to come from his mouth, although the linen were clean. He was quite dead. His countenance made an immediate alarm, and hastened to procure the attendance of a surgeon, who, on arriving, declared the deceased to have been dead some hours. The deceased was undressed, with the exception of his drawers and stockings. Witness afterwards found the pistol now produced in the drawers, which were hanging outside.

By the Coroner.—My master was a widower, and lived by himself. He was about fifty seven years of age. I do not know what to say he returned home from the party. I did not hear the report of a pistol during the night.

The Jury have not noticed that any more evidence was adduced

Captain Robert Maynard was next examined. He stated that he was well acquainted with the unfortunate gentleman, who was highly connected. Witness saw the remains of his friend lying dead soon after the last witness gave the alarm. The pistol appeared to have been recently discharged. On opening the lips the whole of the upper jaw was found to be completely shattered, and the ball had lodged in the back of the head, which was subsequently extracted. Witness was confident that the deceased never intended suicide, but that his death was caused some way or other by accident. He was a particularly high-spirited man, and the last in the world to commit suicide.

In answer to questions, Captain Maynard said he was strengthened in his opinion that it was accidental from the examination he had made of the pistol.

Captain Maynard [illegible] the jury was [illegible] in the conduct of the deceased [illegible]. He could state, that in his experience, he had never known a man more desirous of fire arms than the deceased. He was constantly trying experiments with them.

NATIONAL SPORTS

The present week, which gave us the best specimen of summer weather that the season has furnished, was also as perfect for the business of racing as if it had been ordered for the purpose. It was therefore fortunate that one of the principal autumnal meetings fell on so propitious an occasion. A more enjoyable Second October week has not been known at Newmarket for many a year than that just concluded. It drew [illegible] together a very large general company—for, save the turf, most other [illegible] departs, as far as the million are concerned, are out of season, and it put at rest more than a one question of account, as regards the future fortunes of the metropolis of Jorkshire racing. A proposition had been submitted to the Jockey Club, by which it was suggested that race stands should be erected on various parts of the heath; also that boys was called upon to say whether its members would or would not countenance the project of a line of railway from the town to the Chesterford Station of the Eastern Counties. These matters came on for consideration on Tuesday. The former was very properly negatived; for, if the supply was, in any wise, to minister to the demand, at least half a score of stands would require being built to give one to the finish of each course, while the latter was as widely decided in the affirmative. This short line will be a great boon to all who frequent Newmarket [illegible] inhabitants of the town must drink, from being put in possession of that which is now declared to be a necessary of life. Moreover, the line will not, in the remotest degree, interfere with the peculiarities of the district adjoining to which it will pass. Its course will be on the right hand of the Norwich river, leading from London, and keeping the bottom below the broken ground known as "the Links," beyond half mile clear of the toll-bar at the Devil's Dyke, and on through the farm formerly belonging to the late Mr. Crockford, purchased by Mr. Isaacson, the solicitor. It will have a terminus to the right of the town, somewhere behind the Rutland Arms. Thus it will be altogether out of sight, and nearly out of hearing, of the heath, and will in no wise damage the privacy of the exercise grounds, nor that celebrated site of coursing, "The Chippenham Field." Neither will it, so far as we may come at conclusions by analogy, increase the prejudices of the exclusives of the turf. Because there was considerable railway convenience this year, it was generally stated that Tuesday would pour down its thousands of cockneys to see the fun of the Cesarewitch decided. Such, however, was not the case, the attendance—albeit certainly miscellaneous enough—being much below that of last season. The fact is, Newmarket will never be—at least as at present constituted—attractive for those who mingle with their love of sport a very extensive relish for cakes and ale. * * * * *

Monday—such a day as one looks for in June (and is seen so rarely disappointed) gave us a very sporting list on the paper. There were plenty of events to come off; the quarrel could not be with the quantity, whatever fault might be found with the quality. The two-year-old fields were made up of the awfullest brutes ever brought to a starting post—pastaltar pot Gventura. The amusements were wound up by a mates ridden by amateurs: It was, indeed, a sorry sight. The losing cavalier was Captain Campbell, known as one of the best billiard players we have; but, in attempting to ride a horse at Newmarket, he certainly missed his cue

Tuesday, which was to have given us the title of humanity at spring, shone but feebly for a pleasure jaunt; but, beyond those who took on racing as a serious occupation, very few might be seen in the busy street. In front of the Rooms was a spacious circle; truth compels us to state more spacious than select. Together with hosts of honourable men were the notorieties of the Running Rein, Ruin, and other affairs, just as much at their ease as if they had won their spurs by some special achievement of chivalry. Also, among the strangers were some as strange fellows, perhaps, as ever Nature made or her trolls. One there was with pink eyes, whiskers, and beard, bestriding a black mare, with two wall eyes, a white face, and a rat-tail mane right between her hips—the most wonderful equestrian apparation that can be conceived. Of course, the cynosure of all observance was the Cesarewitch, which was the second issue on the card. It brought to the post the large amount of twenty-seven, and terminated as the [illegible]pated last week. "It will be won by a [illegible] horse, because you cannot find tag-rag-and-bobtail to stay so long a course; and among the quality there is not a strong [illegible] of trail," those who [illegible] view correct will know what to back. For this cause, though the Baron has [illegible] to carry for the Cambridgeshire, we fancy him better for the Cesarewitch: [illegible] we will not bet. He won the Cesarewitch; also, he is now at 5 to 1 for the Cambridgeshire: let the second part of our opinion be not lost sight of. The field for the Clearwell was a very indifferent one, although we don't wonder that it brought to the post the large amount of twenty-six. He is all to nothing the best of his year, and a noble model of a perfect two-year-old: whether this description augurs well for his three-year-old form, it behoves those who desire to back him for the Derby to deliberate.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

ADMIRAL PAGE.

Benjamin William Page, the junior Admiral of the Blue, entered the navy in November, 1778. He was Midshipman on board the Superb in the actions with Mr. de Suffren, and was there twice wounded. He rose to the rank of Post-Captain in 1796, and, during the remainder of the late war, he continued in active service, and was employed on many important occasions. It was Captain Page who, on the surrender of Cairo, was sent to take the thirteen thousand French troops and followers from Egypt to France. In 1804, while commanding the Terpsichore, Captain Page captured two French vessels, the General de Caen and Très Fine. In 1805 he received five hundred guineas, with official thanks, from the Court of Directors, for the care and gallantry he had shown in the convoy of their vessels to and from India. Captain Page was promoted to flag rank in 1819, was made a Vice-Admiral in 1830, and an Admiral in 1841. This distinguished officer died at Ipswich, on Friday, the 3rd inst., at a very advanced age.

SIR WILLIAM WELLER PEPYS, BART.

Sir William Weller Pepys was born on the 4th of May, 1778. He was the eldest son of William Weller Pepys, a Master in Chancery, by his wife, Elizabeth, eldest daughter of the Right Hon. William Dowdeswell, Chancellor of the Exchequer. William Weller, the father, was created a Baronet on the 23rd of June, 1801; and dying the 2nd of June, 1825, was succeeded by Sir William, whose death has just occurred. This gentleman never married, and, in consequence of his demise, which took place on the 5th instant, at Tandridge Park, Godstone, the title is inherited by his next brother, the ex-Chancellor and eminent lawyer, Lord Cottenham. A third brother, the Right Rev. Henry Pepys, D.D., is the present Bishop of Worcester.

The family of Pepys, frequently so distinguished by the ability and high advancement of some of its members, is of ancient and honourable descent. It was originally seated at Diss, in Norfolk, and is represented to have settled at Cottenham, in Cambridgeshire, early in the sixteenth century. Its pedigree has since continued uninterruptedly down to the present time, and among those who have adorned the lineage, we may mention Richard Pepys, Chief Justice of Ireland in 1664; Samuel Pepys, Secretary of the Admiralty in the time of Charles II. and James II., and author of the celebrated Diary; Sir Lucas Pepys, physician to George III., and also those others we have spoken of above, who, still more recently, have enhanced the reputation of their house.

SIR CHARLES D'OYLEY, BART.

Sir Charles D'Oyley was the representative of one of the most ancient families in England, and of the oldest baronetcies, the title having been given, on the Restoration of Charles II., to his ancestor, Sir William D'Oyley, a stanch and zealous cavalier. Sir Charles was son of Sir John Hadley, the sixth Baronet (the intimate friend of Warren Hastings, and M.P., for Ipswich during his trial), by his wife, Diana, daughter of George Rochefort, Esq., relict of William Cotes, Esq., of Calcutta, and niece of the first Earl of Belvidere, a title now extinct. Sir Charles was born in 1781, and succeeded to the baronetcy in 1816: he married first Maran, the third daughter of William Green, Esq., of Keyhaven, in Hampshire, and secondly Elizabeth Jane, eldest daughter of Major Ross, of the Royal Artillery, and niece of the Countess of London.

Sir Charles D'Oyley was well known for his activity and energy in the civil service of the East India Company: he was on the Bengal establishment, and was Senior Merchant and Senior Member of the Board of Customs at Calcutta. The worthy Baron died on the 21st ultimo, at Adenza, near Leghorn, whither he had gone for the benefit of his health. He is succeeded by his only brother, now Sir John Hadley D'Oyley, the eighth Baronet.

CONSECRATION OF WILTON CHURCH.—The ceremony of consecration was performed, on Thursday week, by the Lord Bishop of Salisbury, accompanied by the Dean of Salisbury, Archdeacons Macdonald and Lear, and also about 100 clergy of the diocese. This church, which has been founded and presented to the parish by the Hon. Sidney Herbert, is in the Romanesque style, richly ornamented with marble and stone carved columns and wood carvings. It is capable of holding about 1000 persons SPANISH COSTUMES.

RETURNING FROM MARKET.

SKETCHES IN SPAIN.

Our first Illustration shows the ordinary male costume of Spain, which bears out the observation of the very ingenious and observant author of the Handbook of Spain—that the Spaniards, as a people, are remarkably well dressed. He continues: "The lower orders retain their peculiar and picturesque costume; the better classes imitate the dress of an English gentleman, and come nearer to our ideas of that character than do most other foreigners. Their sedate port gives that repose and quiet which is wanting to our mercurial neighbours. A genuine Spaniard is well dressed, and he knows it; but he is not always thinking about his coat, nor bewildered by his finery. The prevailing use of black, and of cloaks, is diametrically opposed to the rainbow tints of Parisian coxcombry. The Spaniard is proud of himself, not vain of his coat; he is cleanly in his person, consistent in his apparel: there is less of the 'diamond pins in dirty shirts,' as Walter Scott said of certain continental exquisites. Not that the genus dandy does not exist in Spain, but it is an exotic when in a coat. The real dandy is the majo in his half-Moorish jacket. The Andalusian dandies were called paquetes, because they used to import the last correct things from England by the packet-boat. Such are the changes, the ups and downs, of coats and countries. Now, the Spaniards look to us for models, while our ancestors thought nothing came up to

> The refined traveller from Spain,
> A man in all the world's new fashions planted."

The scene sketched by our artist shows a party riding to market, others walking; together with a glimpse of the peasantry, the horses, mules, and the waggon of the country. The cloak and the jacket are the main articles of their dress; still they must be sought in the country; for, according to the Handbook of Spain, "nationality in manners and costume, as far as the gentry are concerned, will soon be only to be stumbled upon in out-of-the-way inland towns, which have escaped the nuevo progreso and a diligence; but the humbler Spaniards have never left off their cloaks and jackets." Again, "the Spaniards live in jackets, and are still the 'tunicatus propellus' of Europe. Augustus Cæsar, who, according to Suetonius, was chilly, wore as many as Hamlet's Grave-digger does waistcoats. Ferdinand VII., the week before his death, gave a farewell audience to a foreign Minister in a jacket; he died in harness, and, like him and Cæsar, Spaniards, when in the bosom of their families, seldom wear any other dress."

The capa, or cloak, is shaped in a peculiar manner, and is rounded at the bottom. The circumference of the real and correct thing is seven yards, all but three and a half inches. As cloaks, like coats, are cut according to a man's cloth, a scanty capa does not indicate affluence, or even respectability. The ample folds and graceful drapery give breadth, and throw an air of stately decency—nay, dignity—over the wearer. It not only conceals tatters and nakedness, but appears to us to invest the pauper with the abstract classicality of an ancient peripatetic philosopher, since we never see this costume of Solons and Cæsars, except in the British Museum and Chantrey's contracts. The capa fits its wearer admirably. it favours habits of inactivity, prevents the over zealous arms and elbows from doing anything, conceals a knife and rags, and, when muffled around, offers a disguise for intrigues and robbery.—Handbook of Spain.

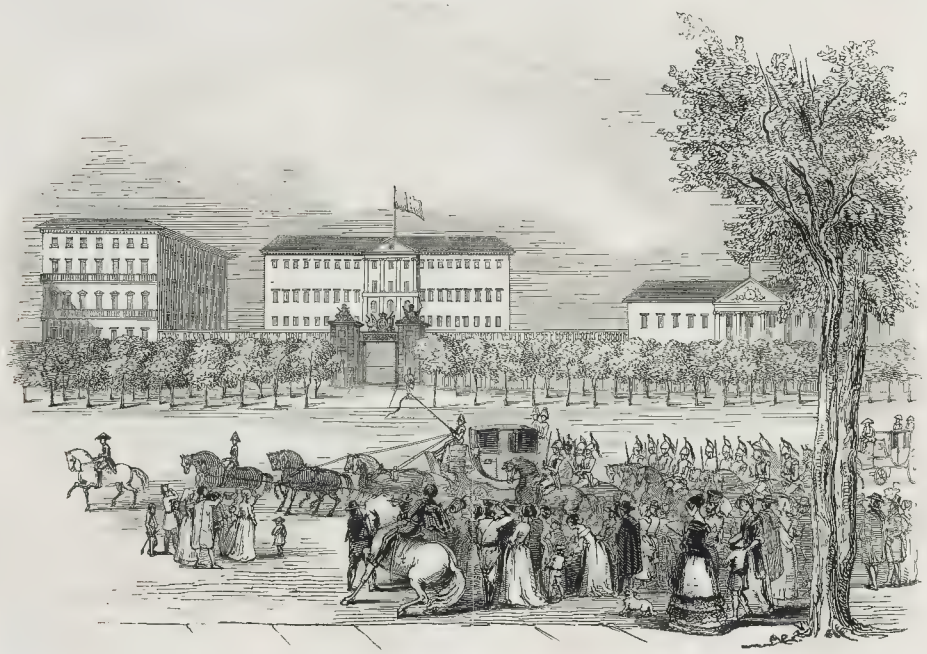
Now we shift to Madrid. The second scene shows the Queen of Spain passing through the street of Alcala, just as her youthful Majesty does twice or thrice a day. The equipage, guard, &c., are well appointed. The large square building, conspicuous in the centre, is the palace La Buena Vista, which was built towards the close of the last century, by the extravagant Duchess of Alva. It was bought by the Madrid Municipality, and given by them to Godoy, then in the height of power. Confiscated in 1808, it was next made the military Museo, in which specimens of curious artillery and models of fortresses were placed. These, when Espartero was Regent, and lived here, were removed to the Buen Retiro, and they, probably, will be brought back again. The noble mansion contains a magnificent suite of rooms, and, in 1844, the Turkish Ambassador, Fuad Effendi, was lodged here.

Opposite this Palace is the residence of the English Embassy, in which, says the Handbook of Spain, a more sustained and splendid hospitality has been shown than in any ten houses of any of the grandees.

We take this opportunity of acknowledging our frequent obligations to Mr. Ford's valuable Handbook just quoted; it is, unquestionably, one of the completest works of its class ever produced.



MADRID.—THE QUEEN PASSING LA BUENA VISTA, IN LA ALCALA.

OUT OF TOWN.

MICHAELMAS IN MAYFAIR.

I am afraid this great lubber will prove a Cockney.—Twelfth Night.

The Lammas floods had borne away to the sea, and eke beyond it, the last of the Orientals: the City was a solemn solitude—albeit, here, and there a streak of social twilight lingered in the West. Thus was it until the autumnal equinox set in—that sure winnower of the harvest of mankind, whose garner is in the parish of St. James, Westminster. So omnipotent, indeed, is the monsoon of fashion, that it sweeps all—both grain and husks—before it; so resistless—to borrow an example from immortal Will—

That even our corn shall seem as light as chaff,
And good and bad find no partition.

Cortes, thus had it come to pass; and the sojourner in Mayfair on the 29th of September last—after a hopeless search in quest of "the other man in town," to help him break his monk-like fast—was fain rise from the relics of his classic bird, without being able to test the whole truth of the axiom which avers that a goose, as a meal, is "too much for one, and not enough for two." All—all—were off—gone—departed; not a soul, blessed or otherwise, remained; nothing human or inhuman participated in the grim loneliness of Grosvenor-square with him, who, sole monarch of its causeways, sought to compose, by means of philosophy and a cigar, the uneasy elements of his spirit—and his Michaelmas dinner. Reader! hast ever seen Pompeii? If not (for not for the Czar's fortunes would we deem thee capable of having experience of the fact), there is no effort of the most diseased imagination can assist thee rightly in figuring to thyself the stark desolation of a West-end square, what time Dian appeareth in shape of the harvest moon. . . . In the "Book of the Boudoir," Lady Morgan relates that, being upon her travels, and about to descend the crater of Vesuvius, or some such volcanic exploit—in a chasm of the lava, she found herself irretrievably in contact with a Mrs. ——somebody from London, who, politely proffering the pas, said, "After you, my Lady." The case of Pliny the Elder, and other incidents of history had in account—this was severe—quite sufficient to deter any one of moderate nerves from venturing upon Italy; and the personal sufferings we had ourself undergone at the hands and tongues of our countrymen on the Rhine, "tabou'd" Germany for the nonce. Still, to tarry in town, was a defying of the Coroner to the death. What was to be done?

There was a time when it was conditional manslaughter for any one, with a soul above buttons, to be detected in "souping twice," or perpetrating ale or stout with his stilton—called by the words of the statute against the case made and provided—"malting his cheese."

But Brummel's dished, and other beaus are diddled,
And Fashion's sybil-verse hath been unriddled.

Aye, by'r Lady! most rudely rendered into the vernacular by the biographer of the autocrat of the dandies—one Mr. Jesse—who severed, by the unkindest cut of all, the Gordian knot of beau-cracy. We live in days—may their glory and their grace never be less!—when every citizen of life is at liberty to pursue or shape his own path—so that it interferes not with his neighbour's landmark. Who does not remember—haply as the lullaby of his own infancy—the quaint refrain:—

The King was in the parlour, counting out his money;
The Queen was in the kitchen, eating bread and honey:

a nursery rhyme, scarce meant for the belief of extremest childhood. Yet we, ourself, not many weeks since, saw the greatest Queen that ever ruled the earth regaling herself in very nearly as primitive a manner.

Peradventure it was thus musing, that, on the morrow following the melancholy Michaelmas aforesaid, we called to a youth got up in the mixed styles of Jack Sheppard and Jim Robinson, suspended—semi-supine—at the rear of a Hansom's cab—"Fresh Wharf, Londonbridge." The good and evil of life, says the moralist, may only be rightly understood by comparison: unless a man has been three hours doing two miles in a drofsky, he can never know the real blessing of the cab called "Hansom." The scene of our nightly ramble intimated that our abode is in the west: people rarely wander far a-field to burn the contemplative incense, and meditate. It was, then, fleeing from suicide—or Michaelmas in May Fair (which is the same thing)—that we were dragged at the heels of a gigantic thorough-bred, which had reached the last scene but one of "the high-mettled racer"—literally for dear life—and deposited with incredible skill and speed upon the margin of the Thames, where it escapes from London-bridge. The case was desperate—but one remedy or steamer was at hand: not an instant was allowed for reflection. The fatal bell had tolled its last summons; "Now, Sir, we're off!" shouted a son of Neptune, in drab trousers and a white hat—we passed a green and white bulwark—and all was over. Through the Pool, despite obstacles thick as leaves in Valambrosa, fast and furious we held on. With wondrous ease the bark won its way. Truly were the words of the poet fulfilled—"Facilis descensus Averni"—we had no difficulty in running down from Grosvenor-square——to Gravesend. . . . .

It was not yet noon, when we cleared Greenwich and launched boldly into Blackwall Reach. The sun, happy to find itself free of Billingsgate and emancipated from Wapping, shone out in its best autumnal humour; and the fresh, crisp air was better than all the cordials in the world for making the heart glad. Our boat, too, glanced like a meteor—indeed we think it was the Meteor—over the shining waters; and if it had only been the Neva or the Niger, instead of the Thames, all might have been well. That it was not so, is inferred: but where shall the blame rest? With the men and matrons, the lads and lasses of active gastric—who, abandoning the day, plunged into the reeking cabin, boiled beef, and bottled beer? or with those fishers of men, who basted the whole shell of the vessel as one trap for their kind, with savoury solicitations, more than the soul of cockney could withstand? We repeat it, on the Niger, with the prospect of six ounces of junk for dinner, these people might, could, would have thought of other prospects; but assailed as to all their savoury senses at once—as to their eyes, with hecatombs of sir-loins, lobsters, hams, and chickens—as to their ears, with feux de joie of corks—as to their noses, with odours such as never breathed from the shores of spicy Araby—is it any wonder that, turning their backs upon Phœbus Apollo, they sought the shade, and such creature comforts as suited their exigences and their exchequers? Would Zeno or the pick of his school have done otherwise, under similar circumstances?

Some such thought as this busied us as, looking round the deserted deck, we descried to starboard of the notice which required passengers "not to speak to the man at the wheel" an individual that, with ourself, still occupied it. He sat on the dais appropriated for the use of the steersman. We have ever been of opinion that "the proper study of mankind is man;" indeed our chief delight is to speculate in the natural and domestic history of our species. A brief contemplation of the specimen before us brought conviction that it belonged to the class of metropolitan fancy dealers. He wore his hands as one accustomed to treat delicate matériel; his very look and bearing had taken the complexion of his merchandise. Could he be a Frenach milliner? As the idea arose, the apparition of a sea-boy, unfurling the to'gallant-sail of an outward-bound Indiaman, caught his eye; and he soliloquized something about "dangerous," preceded by a word which, if not "wery," sounded considerably like it. "A Cockney," we mused; "a solitary Cockney—the most lonely of all the ruminants! What a charity it would be to bid him good day: how full of misery his mien: surely he is going to down himself—or join his family in the country." . . . . It is easier said than done that speaking the first word, however: it's as difficult for John Bull to do as for Jack Frenchman to avoid. We therefore took a few preliminary turns from the stern-sheets to the funnel, just to put us in wind; and halting, accidentally, as it were, in front of our man, made some remarks touching the atmospherical economy. The person thus bespoke looked up and muttered, "It threatened to be a fine day"—correcting himself slowly that "it promised to be fair weather." Now it took us no roundabout way to arrive at the conclusion that the Solitary Cockney desired rain rather than sunshine—something quite eccentric, almost amphibious indeed, in one out for a holiday. What could it mean? Here was a study for the social zoologist; so we tried him again.

"Fast boat, this, sir," we observed.

"Not fast enough, it seems;" he rejoined, "they're going to have a railway next season: the year after, I suppose, they'll fly. Them as can't content themselves with London, the devil send 'em wings; that's the best wish I have for such geese."

"Fond of town?"—we put interrogatively—"business bringing you down the river?" At this moment the Steward happening to pass, we desired him to fetch a bottle of soda-water, for the grief (and a trifle we did to alleviate it) of the preceding night had left us thirsty. "And me one, too;" said the Solitary Cockney, adding, sotto voce, "and just squeeze a thimble-full of brandy into it." O! that men should not put a thief into their mouths to steal away their mauvaise honte. The draught imbibed, our metropolitan melted into good fellowship, as the Artic winter thaws into midsummer.

"Yes, sir;" he set off, of his own accord, "and, as I say to my wife, give me the back parlour of week-days, and the front drawing-room of a Sunday, and that's all I want this side of Paradise. We live at No. 1958, Cheapside, sir, and if that aint the place for a look-out I should like to know where you're to find it. Sixteen hundred 'busses passes our door every twelve hours of daylight. But that won't satisfy my family: I've a wife and two daughters, sir;—and they must go a bathing in the sea at Gravesend every summer. And if they'd be satisfied with going into the water, I would not complain, but they must go into company as well. They've sent for me to escort them to-night to a gala at the Rosherville Gardens. I'd as lieve take poison, that I would."

"Is the place so very bad that you have so great a dislike to it?" we inquired.

"Only try it," said the Cheapsider, with a grimace with the colic in it, "only try it; I should like to catch you at it, that's all."

"That you shall, my friend," we cried; "that you shall; it's the very thing of all others we should like best—a rural fête."

"Oh! very rural," he exclaimed, "mighty rural: well, any how, the next best thing to a good soaking rain will be to see you swallowing Baron Nathan."

Truth compels us to state that the sea-board of Gravesend is not atfractive, it looks like a piece cut off Rotherithe, and floated down to where you find it stuck. Compared with Kemp-town, too, the architecture disappoints you, and the general air of the place is more confined. Its principal productions are shrimps, hot water—for those who bring their own tea—and music, which may be had gratis, at the bazaar. At one Tully, every day during the season, from sunrise to sunset. Here ladies of bills are in great plenty, at eightepence a stomach; and the prominent characteristic features are the absence of restraint in the intercourse between the visitors; and that both sexes take the air in cream-coloured shoes. We landed in a sort of colossal ball-room, and dined off a service of silver in a kind of ramshibious verandah, overshooting the river, which resembled a cross between a cocoa-nut summer-house, and a canal boat. Nevertheless, we dined well: nothing could exceed the way in which they fried our flounders, except the style in which they mulled our claret. . . . .

Having fed, we sallied forth—to play. The moon was bright in her crescent, and let them say this and that about the towers of the Hesperides, our word for it, Dian never beat bow over a more picturesque spot than the Rosherville Gardens of Gravesend. Ay! ay! Fashion, curl your lip over your eyebrows, an' you will, but a fact's a fact for all that. This was said as we stood upon the terrace. We would be spared a visit to the saloon, but both not our bon camarado, the Solitary Cockney, await us? We crossed the threshold—and there, among three thousand of his genus, he stood. He introduced us to his consort, and his daughters—Mrs. Smith and the Misses Smith (we were prepared for as much), and then, at their instance, we turned to the affairs on hand. In the middle of this mortal crowd, was a couple in the semblance of a dance: the lady being to the gentleman in the degree of a duodecimo to a quarto, which was about his rate, taking the folio to be the standard of the species. First, they slipped into the "Minuet de la Cour;" then they slided into the "Cellarius," and wound up with the "Polka" and "Valse a deux Temps." This was the Master of the Ceremonies—the Baron of my friend's denouncement—and his daughter. We are not fastidious, so, in answer to "what we thought of it?" replied, it was something out of the common at all events. This ended, a general charge ensued to secure places for "The Caledonians;" and the two younger Smiths—a brace of very comely girls, that's the truth—glanced at us with Terpsichorean yearnings, which we would not see. In this dilemma, an adjournment to Tully's was moved, on the principle that a little quiet flirting was better than looking on while others agitated it before their eyes. Thither we went.

The object at that place is the listening to music, vocal and instrumental, and observing the manœuvres of a chorus of virgins, clad in sober-coloured robes, to set off, probably, the rest of their mise en scene. These damsels never ceased to solicit all comers to "try their fortune" with them; an invitation, it is but fair to say, a good many were availing themselves of. When one is at Rome, one naturally does according to the practice there; and in a short space of time we found ourself following in the footsteps of the nymphs aforesaid, the younger of the sisters twain being the target of our attacs.

She bore it like a Spartan of Thermopylæ.

Things grew critical; and we began to wish ourself at home with our customary cigar, when the old sinner of Cheapside whispered in his spouse's ear; and, the minute after, she turned inhumanly upon us, and asked us home to supper. This was too bad.

"Madam," we said, "there is but one thing in nature ever induces us to eat supper, and that is a Brighton prawn; should it ever be our fortune to meet them—"

"La! how odd, Ma," cried the unsophisticated maid of Cheap, "that Pa should have promised to take us to Brighton: suppose we should be there when the gentleman is. I wonder when he is going?"

"Next week," we said, emphatically; "by the express train on Monday . . . . . ."

"Then we'll go, too; that's what we will," ejaculated Mrs. Smith, in a tone that sounded as like the language of the Medes and Persians as any modern form of speech we had ever heard.

It was a cruel revenge.

We turned to look at our victim; and there, like a statue of ice, he sat glaring on us with lack lustre eyes. It was too much for our feelings. We rose, and, bowing to the ladies, shook the marble hand of the fancy-dealer. "Good night, Mr. Smith," we said, "good night; we'll meet at Phillipi."

"At Brighton, you mean"—in words that seemed to issue from a sepulchre—answered the SOLITARY COCKNEY.

LONDON IMPROVEMENTS.

Upwards of twenty years since, the plan of opening a street in a line with Coventry-street, across Leicester-square, by Cranbourne-street, was much talked of; but, the project experienced all sorts of vexatious delays, and it has only just been executed.

The commencement of this new line is named "New Coventry-street," and, as our engraving shows, consists, on one side, of a pile of highly embellished houses, from the designs of Mr. Charles Mayhew. The upper portion is profusely embellished in a sort of cinque-cento taste, and the effect is certainly imposing. The width of the street is 60 feet.

The companion illustration shows the new line from the corresponding corner of Leicester-square, and is named "Cranbourne-street." The houses have been built from the designs of Mr. Herbert, of Pimlico; Messrs. Archbutt and Co.; and Messrs. Burton and Dent. It is, altogether, a meritorious specimen of street architecture. The width is 54 feet.

We understand that the Improvement Commissioners intend to continue this line, from the corner of Bow-street obliquely across Drury-lane to Carey-street, on the south side of Lincoln's-inn-fields; thence across Chancery-lane through the Rolls property, midway between Holborn and Fleet-street, to Farringdon-street, and passing under an arch to the west side of the Old Bailey. This valuable opening is again to be intersected by a wide street extending from the north side of St. Clement's Church, known as Pickett-place, into the centre of Lincoln's-inn-fields, across which the street will go directly into Holborn, to join Red Lion-street, and thence direct to the Foundling Hospital, thus opening a noble avenue long wanted from the north to the south side of London. There is also every reason to believe that the long-required establishment of the courts of law in a central part of the metropolis will be accomplished.

The plans will be carried out by Mr. Barry, the celebrated architect, and, combined with the new streets, north and south, east and west, referred to above, will indeed be a boon to the public, as well as a vast advantage to the metropolis in a healthful as well as a moral point of view.

NEW COMET.—Mr. Charles Miller, of Great Wakering, Essex, writes to the Essex Herald to the effect, that a comet is now visible to the naked eye, in the constellation Cancer, and that the best time for seeing it is from two to four in the morning; at the former hour it will be found due east, about 30 degs. above the horizon, and about 11 degs. to the left of and a little below the bright star Pollux or Castor.

THE ACCIDENTAL DEATH OF MADAME HENGLER.—On Saturday evening a meeting was held on Mrs. Sarah Field, otherwise Madame Hengler, who came by her death in consequence of an explosion at Jones's firework manufactory, in the Westminster road, on Thursday (last week). The evidence was confirmatory of the account of the accident which we gave last week, and the jury returned a verdict of "Accidental Death." A correspondent of the Advertiser notices a very curious prophecy connected with Madame Hengler. He says, "The melancholy close of the life of poor Madame Hengler, the celebrated firework artiste, at Lambeth, was unfortunately burnt to death last week, at her residence in Lambeth, by an explosion of her own pyrotechnicals, brings to my recollection an ode, addressed to this lady by that inimitable comic writer, Thomas Hood, Esq., which, alas! but too aptly concludes with the following prophetic lines:—

> 'Long may thy starry brow enjoy its rays;
> May no untimely blow its doom fore tell;
> But when old age prepares the friendly pall,
> When the last spark of all thy sparks decays,
> Then die, lamented by good people all,
> Like Golconda's or Madame Blaize!'

"The lyric poem from which this extract is taken is published in 'Hood's Own,' p. 241, with a fancy portrait of Madame Hengler."

The latest accounts from the Romagna state that tranquillity has been completely restored at Rimini. The insurgents had taken the route to Borgosan-Sepulchro, in order to reach Leghorn, where they hoped to embark. In Tuscany, a party of 100 men were forced to lay down their arms, and they have been sent to Rocca St. Casiano.

We learn from Venice, October 3, that the three Austrian vessels of war which were sent to the coast of Romagna on the news of the affair of Rimini, had returned to Venice, their presence on the coast having been rendered unnecessary on the restoration of tranquillity. The Queen of Greece was to remain at Venice until the 15th inst.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 18, 1845.

THE controversy about the Statue of Cromwell has been settled, but in a manner rather unexpected by both the parties to the dispute. The question was, whether he should have a place among the rulers of England? The reasons urged against it were both political and moral. The successful rebel, though he gained the regal power without the regal title, was held to have no right to be ranked among those who bore upon their brows "the round and top of sovereignty." As to his moral character, the argument for exclusion founded upon that was of less weight, since, if conduct was to decide the awarding of a niche, many Kings must be excluded whose lives were stained with crimes—if we have writ our annals true. On the other side, the advocates of a statue protested against the falsification of history which would be made by the omission. He ruled de facto—was one of our governors, and could not be passed over; and that, whatever was his conduct—how he gained and how he kept his ascendancy—had nothing to do with the matter. It now appears that he is to have a statue that it is to form part of the decoration of the Houses of Parliament; but it is not to be in the line of Kings; he is ranked only among the celebrities of the land, and shares the honour with Purcell, the composer, and Garrick, the player. The whole historical question is thus opened again, as the place of the statue was of the most importance. Nor is this all; two lots have been drawn up, one of personages "unanimously" considered by the Committee as entitled to a statue: the other, of names on which the Committee was not unanimous, but decided by a majority of votes. Cromwell is in the second and doubtful list, classed evidently with military commanders—Wolfe Abercrombie, and Moore—and placed, singularly enough, between Montrose and Monk! one, the celebrated general of Charles the First; and the other, the man who undid the whole work of the Protector and brought about the Restoration. This list, too, is not meant for a final one, but is stated to be rather a guide for another selection, so that there is a chance of Cromwell being, after all, entirely excluded. That this arrangement will settle the controversy—"Should Cromwell have a statue?"—cannot be expected; his place in our annals is surely higher than that of a musician, an actor, an engineer, and a surgeon—for John Hunter and Brindley also stand at his side. All these may be equalled; we have good composers, great surgeons and engineers, now; men like Cromwell can arise but once in a nation's history—and, whether there be controversy or not, the spirit of truth, that should, at all events, inspire the selection of national monuments, ought to give them their proper importance. Two centuries should have sufficed to raise us above the partialities of the past; and the people who have repeatedly set aside the direct line of Royalty, and deposed or banished their Kings with a marked disregard of the claims of legitimacy, have but little right to feel shocked at seeing the figure of the stern plebeian between those of the two Charleses, whose fates he so greatly influenced, and whose reigns he so widely separated from each other.

THE ANDOVER UNION is destined to acquire the kind of fame that may be considered identical with notoriety. The late Master was defended, through thick and thin, by the Guardians, till defence was impossible, and then a dismissal was avoided by the device of resignation. He was succeeded by a protegé of the Commissioners, who now it seems have to be informed by the public press of the characters of their own officers. The person just appointed to the place of Master of the Andover workhouse, had previously gone through the same process at Oxford which made the situation at Andover vacant. Charges were made, a Commissioner's enquiry instituted, and probable censure or dismissal avoided by the device of resignation. When the Commissioners were asked, through the press, how a person who evaded the consequences of an enquiry at one place, could be considered fit to fill the same office at another, they very coolly admit that one of their Assistant Commissioners, was sent down to Oxford some time ago to conduct an enquiry, but that the official report he forwarded to them, had not been looked at or examined from that day to this, and that had they been aware of the previous conduct and character of their newly appointed servant, they would not have sanctioned his nomination! Such a declaration was surely never before made by any body of public officers? What are they appointed and paid for, but to know precisely the things of which they so complacently confess their ignorance. Of what use are official reports if they are neither opened nor examined? It appears that they did hear that the Master of Oxford Workhouse had resigned rather than wait the result of an investigation, and so they considered the business at an end, and never so much as examined the report of their own deputy to acquaint themselves with what was charged or proved against the individual inculpated. Under the Poor Law Commissioners, a resignation is taken as a sufficient atonement for any degree of misconduct in their underlings. We believe no such immunity or door of escape is given in any other department of the public service. In some of them the reins are held loosely enough—witness the Custom House frauds and the Exchequer bill forgeries; but the Government would not have dared to take the mere resignation of Mr. Beaumont Smith, as a receipt in full in discharge of all the liabilities of his peculations. A Custom House officer detected in malpractices would now in all probability be prosecuted, whether he resigned his post or not. The officer who by neglect should run his ship on shore, would not escape the consequences by giving up his command. An officer of the Poor Law Commissioners, if charged with misconduct, has only to resign his post, and he not only escapes all consequences, but is likely, from the ignorance and neglect of his superiors, to be appointed to another district! The disclosures of the first Andover enquiry, were a disgrace to the country; but the carelessness and indifference shown in the appointment made after that enquiry, is equally disgraceful to that system of administration under which such an egregious piece of mismanagement was possible.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR, Friday Evening. (From our own Correspondent.)—Her Majesty, accompanied by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, walked this morning across the Home Park to the Royal Aviary, and visited the Queen's kennel on their return to the Castle. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales, and the Princesses Royal and Alice, took equestrian airing this morning, on their Shetland ponies, in the private plantations. Their Royal Highnesses were taken for a carriage drive this afternoon. Prince Alfred was also taken out for exercise in the Slopes. Her Majesty, who was accompanied by the Prince Consort, drove out for an airing this afternoon in the Great Park. The Equerry-in-Waiting was in attendance upon the Queen. The Royal dinner party, this evening, included her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, the Baroness de Speth, and Lady Caroline Murray. The military and her Majesty's private bands were in attendance.

VISIT OF HER MAJESTY TO THE MARQUIS OF SALISBURY.—It is understood that her Majesty will pay a visit to the Marquis of Salisbury, at Hatfield House, about the 11th or 12th of the ensuing month. Preparations for the visit have been making on a magnificent scale during the last few months. Thirty or forty German, Italian, and French artists have been engaged in embellishing the principal apartments in the ancient and noble mansion of Hatfield.

ARRIVAL OF THE DUKE AND DUCHESS OF CAMBRIDGE AT BERLIN.—The Duke and Duchess of Cambridge, the Grand Duke and Grand Duchess of Mecklenburgh Strelitz, and Prince Frederick of Hesse, are at Berlin. Several grand entertainments have been given to them by the King and the Princes.

THE DUKE OF TORLONIA.—The Duke of Torlonia, the celebrated capitalist, has arrived at Mivart's Hotel from Rome.

LORD BROUGHAM.—Lord Brougham has arrived in Grafton-street from Brougham Hall, where his Lordship has been entertaining a succession of visitors. The noble lord intends proceeding next week to the south of France.

ARISTOCRATIC MARRIAGE.—The marriage of the Hon. Adolphus Liddell and Miss Frederica Elizabeth Lane Fox was celebrated at Bramham, on Wednesday. The bride was given away by Lady Dorothea Fitzwilliam, Miss Mary Vavasour, Miss Maria Lane Fox, Miss Laura Lane Fox, and Miss Lilly Lane Fox. The bridegroom was accompanied by his brother, the Hon. Robert Liddell, who performed the ceremony, and by Mr. Henry Milner. The road leading to the church was thronged with villagers, who strewed flowers on the path as the bride and bridegroom passed. A splendid déjeuner was prepared by Mr. Lane Fox, to which a numerous company sat down, including the principal nobility and gentry of the neighbourhood.

THE HON. CAPTAIN LEIGESTER.—We are gratified in being enabled to state that the Hon. Captain Leigester, of the Grenadier Guards, whose life was at one time despaired of, in consequence of the rupture of a blood vessel, has been pronounced out of danger.

THE ANDOVER UNION.—The new master of the union, Mr. Price, who was appointed on the recommendation of the assistant-commissioner, Mr. Parker, has been dismissed. At a meeting of the board on Saturday, the clerk read a letter from the poor-law commissioners, in which they stated that they were not aware of the previous conduct and character of Price, or they would not have sanctioned his nomination.

SUICIDE BY HANGING TO A GUN.—On Monday morning, about half past seven o'clock, a man named John Knapp, aged fifty-nine years, a gun-smith, residing in Chamberlain-street, Whitechapel, committed suicide in the following manner. He had been latterly in a very desponding way, but he would never disclose to any one what was weighing upon his mind. He retired to bed on the previous night, at his usual hour, without the slightest alteration in his demeanour. In the morning he was missed from his bed by the person who was accustomed to call him, and it being found that he had not gained the house, a search was made for him, and he was discovered in his workshop, hanging by a piece of rope, quite dead. There being no hook or other convenient place in the room for him to affix the cord to, he had tied it to the stock of a gun, which was placed in a horizontal position against a wall, and then, mounting a chair, had thrown himself off.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

DECORATIONS OF THE NEW HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.—THE CROMWELL STATUE.

Another Report has been published from the Commissioners on the Fine Arts, upon the subject of the statues and decorations for the New Houses of Parliament. After noticing the portions of the building which the Committee think would be appropriate for insulated statues, the Committee express their opinion "That six insulated marble statues might be conveniently placed in St. Stephen's hall. We are of opinion that it is not desirable that a corresponding number of eminent names be now pointed out, with a view to the future occupation of those places; but we are at once prepared to recommend that statues of Marlborough and Nelson be placed in St. Stephen's porch; and that statues of Selden, Hampden, Lord Falkland, Lord Clarendon, Lord Somers, Sir Robert Walpole, Lord Chatham, Lord Mansfield, Burke, Fox, Pitt, and Grattan, be placed in St. Stephen's Hall

"We have further to propose that the following three artists, viz., William Calder Marshall, John Bell, and John Henry Foley, whose works in the last exhibition in Westminster Hall were considered by us to be entitled to especial commendation, be at once commissioned to prepare models for three of the aforesaid statues, viz., the statues of Hampden, Lord Falkland, and Lord Clarendon; and that the execution of such statues be allotted to the said artists respectively, as we may hereafter decide.

"We have further to propose that £2000 of public money be granted on account, towards the payment of such works; and we humbly request the sanction of your Majesty to our present Report."

APPENDIX, No. 1.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE, WITH LIST OF DISTINGUISHED PERSONS TO WHOSE MEMORY STATUES MIGHT BE ERECTED.

Your committee appointed to "prepare a general list of distinguished persons of the United Kingdom, to whose memory statues might with propriety be erected in or adjoining the new Houses of Parliament, such list being unrestricted as to the number of such distinguished persons, and as to the time in which they lived," have the honour to submit two lists; the first (A), of names to which they agreed unanimously; the second (B), of names on which your committee were not unanimous, but decided by greater or smaller majorities.

The aggregate of these two lists consists of 121 names, which may probably afford scope, not for indiscriminate adoption, but rather for choice and selection, on the part of the commission at large.

At the same time your committee desire to express their unanimous opinion, that the attempt to execute any great number of these statues simultaneously, would not be conducive to the interests of art.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE RESPECTING SELECTION OF PERSONS WHOSE STATUES MIGHT BE PLACED IN THE NICHES IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS

The selection of the statues for the eighteen niches in the House of Lords which has now been referred to your Committee, does not appear to them altogether so free, and with so wide a scope, as the selection of the ninety-six figures on painted glass, upon which they lately reported. In this case, the very narrow size of the niches, and their Gothic form, seem to limit the choice of the Commission to characters drawn from the feudal age, and, as usual with effigies of that period, presenting little or no variety of attitude.

On a careful consideration of the characters whom it might be chosen, subject to this condition, your Committee have been of opinion that no scheme is preferable to that which was first suggested to the Commissioners by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, namely, to fill the niches with the effigies of the principal Barons who signed Magna Charta. Your Committee subjoin a list of the names which they would recommend for this purpose. They conceive that the difference of character, as laymen or as prelates, would afford a picturesque variety of attire, and that the historical analogy would be most suitably attained, by placing side by side, in the same House of the Legislature, in windows or in niches, the successive holders of Sovereign power, and the first founders of Constitutional freedom.

MEMORANDUM RESPECTING PLACES FOR STATUES IN THE PALACE AT WESTMINSTER.

The Commissioners, having at various times proposed the new Houses of Parliament, with a view to ascertain what situations would be adapted for the reception of insulated statues, and having examined the principal localities on the 25th of April last, for the purpose, were then of opinion—

That, as the entrance to the Houses of Parliament by St. Stephen's Porch will contain statues of distinguished statesmen, warriors, and other eminent subjects, the entrance by the grand staircase, the landing-place, guard room, Victoria gallery, and lobby to the House of Peers, should contain the statues of Sovereigns.

That statues of Egbert, Edgar, Canute, and Edward the Confessor might be fitly placed on the first landing-place.

That the principal landing-place should contain the statues of the Sovereigns, from William the Conqueror to Edward IV. That the statues of Edward V., and Richard III. might be placed in the guard room.

That in the Victoria hall the series should be continued, beginning with Henry VII., and ending with Queen Anne.

That the access to the House of Lords should contain the statues of the Sovereigns of the House of Brunswick, beginning with George I., and ending with her Most Gracious Majesty.

In this proposed arrangement it appeared that one pedestal in the lobby to the House of Lords would still remain unoccupied.

A resolution was referred to (recorded in the minutes on the 21st of April, 1845), to the effect that a statue of his Royal Highness Prince Albert would be appropriately placed in the Victoria gallery (of which the lobby in question originally formed a part).

Thus the situations for statues in the state apartments, and the approaches to them, would, in the event of the above resolution being confirmed, be entirely occupied

* The names of various apartments have been altered and finally determined since the date of this memorandum. The principal landing-place is called the Norman porch; the Victoria-gallery is called the Royal gallery. the lobby to the House of Lords is called the Victoria hall.

According to the above proposed distribution, the number of statues on the landing places and in the guard room would be twenty-two, in the Victoria gallery twelve (William III. and Mary being both represented in the lobby), including the statue of her Majesty, seven.

It was considered that the statues in the robing room might consist of a resolution proposed by Mr. Ralph Knowles, with reference to the allegorical sculpture, consist of allegorical figure

It was further proposed that the lower waiting hall should contain eight statues of celebrated scientific men; that the upper corresponding hall should contain eight statues of celebrated poets, and that the panels in the latter should be adorned with paintings. The lower hall has no panels available for

It was further suggested, if required, statues could be placed in the open area of the quadrangle, and that some of the larger corridors or passages on the ground floor might afford suitable decorations.

The consideration of the place for the statue of Alfred, and of the precise number and situations of other statues in the central hall, was postponed till that part of the building should be more advanced.

Whitehall, April 26, 1845.

CITY OF LONDON REGISTRATION.—On Tuesday an objection was made by Mr. Gunn to the name of Mr. Wright and two other members of the Anti-Corn Law League, on the ground that the property by which they claimed was the joint property of the Anti-Corn Law League. The Barrister thought the names of the parties should be retained on the register, the lease being in their names, and therefore constituting them joint occupants.

MORTALITY IN CITY OF LONDON.—The number of deaths during the last week was only 786, showing a decrease of 70 as compared with the previous week. Deaths from diseases of the stomach, liver, and other organs of digestion, are much above the average, having risen to 90 to 98; cholera still continue more than usually fatal, the number of deaths amounting to 67, average for five autumns 31. Only 39 died of old age, being little more than one-third of the average.

IRELAND.

REPEAL DEMONSTRATION IN MAYO.

Early on Sunday morning the people began to pour into the town of Castlebar. Up to two o'clock the day was fine, though the weather wise had forecoded rain long ere that, from the clouds which rested on the summits of Nephin and Croagh Patrick. Shortly after that hour the rain did indeed come down, as it only can in Connaught, and continued to descend in torrents throughout the day. At half-past three the head of a wretched procession marched into the town. Some six or seven temperance bands, with draggled banners and weather stained uniforms, five or six gentlemen's carriages, a few vehicles of an inferior class, 20 or 30 horsemen, 300 persons with wands and rebands, and a rack of 3000 peasantry, tramping through the mud and filth, constituted the whole demonstration in the town of Castlebar.

Various resolutions were proposed and carried, after which

Mr. O'Connell then came forward beneath a capacious umbrella. He lamented the severity of the weather, but they were told by high authority that rain fell upon the just as well as upon the unjust." It gave him an opportunity, too, of estimating the patriotism and bodily strength of the men of Mayo, than which he had seen no more able bodied men. Honour made some further remarks on this subject, and on the beauty of the women, the internal proceeded to observe that there were 400,000 inhabitants in Mayo, and that he had not one of them (pointing to a tattered) Union man. He was in Mayo men about him, matches for a dozen Englishmen should such a deputy have only two representatives, while Wales, not much larger, had twenty-eight? (Cheers.) Having enlarged on the definite value of the franchise, and on the injustice of forcing the Roman Catholics to support the Protestant Church of Ireland, he proceeded to denounce Roundtree, which he hated more than Greek and Turk and Infidel. He did not like that much (cheers), and he touch upon the ordinary topics of his addresses—peace, perseverance, and the inevitable success of Repeal—with which he concluded. The meeting, which at the time was estimated at about 3000 miserable creatures, then dispersed amid the pelting of a pitiless storm, many of them to return fifteen and twenty miles before they reached their wretched dwellings.

REPRESENTATION OF CORK.—Mr. Sergeant Murphy has resigned his seat for the city of Cork. He intimates that he has been compelled to yield to the pressure from Conciliation Hall, and that any attempt on his part, entertaining the opinions that he does upon the Repeal delusion, to re-seek the confidence of his constituents, would be worse than useless.

THE POTATO DISEASE.—Accounts received from different parts of Ireland show that the disease in the potato crop is extending far and wide, and causing great alarm amongst the peasantry. Letters from the Irish landlords feelingly describe the misery and consternation of the poor people around them, and earnestly urge the imperative necessity of speedy intervention on the part of the Government to ascertain the actual extent of the calamity, and provide wholesome food as a substitute for the deficient supply of potatoes. Mr. John Chester, of Kilscorne House, in Magahale, in the county of Louth, in a letter to the Dublin Evening Post, states that he has a field of twenty acres of potatoes, which, up to the 3rd instant, had been perfectly dry and sound, when they were attacked by the blight, and threequarters of them are so diseased and rotten that pigs decline to eat them. This, he says, is the case all through the county of Louth. The Belfast News Letter has a still more lamentable account. It says: "We have ascertained from occupying our space with the accounts of the prevalence of the calamity in various places, for this reason, that it may be here stated, once for all, that there is hardly a district in Ireland in which the potato crop at present are uninfected—perhaps we might say, hardly a field."

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

THE LABURNUM AT SHEERNESS.

The following is S. P.'s official report of the performances of the several ships of the experimental squadron in the last trial cruise:—

St. Vincent, in Plymouth sound, Oct. 10, 1845.

SIR,—I have the honour to forward to you, for the information of my Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, the signals and reports of the trials of sailing of her Majesty's squadron under my command, and other documents mentioned in the margin of the schedule. In addition to which, a good trial was commenced on the 8th inst. by the Queen, Canopus, Hebrus, and Powerful, in chase of the Daring, under all plain sail, and part topmast and topgallant studding-sails; but the fog, which came on three hours after, prevented angles being taken to ascertain the exact result. The Queen however gained upon the Daring.

You will be pleased to acquaint their Lordships that we have had some splendid trials with as heavy a press of sail as could well be carried. On separating with close-reefed topsails and reefed courses, topgallant sails struck, the next under treble-reefed topsails, and another under double-reefed topsails; and as these against a heavy head

In the latter on the 7th inst., the day after the heavy [illegible] the Rodney [illegible] the whole fleet.

Nothing could be more [illegible] than the trials than the Queen and Albion, who never appeared to strain anything; indeed, all the squadron proved themselves such fine ships as to be incapable of being distressed by press of sail, except the St. Vincent.

Being perfectly satisfied with the result of the trials, that the Queen is the best ship, the Albion and Rodney next, Canopus and Vengeance much alike, Trafalgar weatherly, but slow; St. Vincent, leewardly and crank; and as the weather appeared to set in fine, and not deeming that any further time would benefit the service, I therefore bore up on the 9th for Plymouth, in charge, which I reached with the squadron under my command [illegible] at 1 P.M.

I beg to remark, for their Lordships' information, that all the captains deserve the greatest credit for the seamanlike manner in which they made sail, blowing in the way it did, on the above occasions.

I have, &c.
[illegible], Rear Admiral.

To the Right Hon. Henry T. L. Corry, M.P.

ROYAL YACHT PROMOTIONS.—The following promotions of officers of the Royal yacht Victoria and Albert have taken place:—Lieutenant Langdon Browell (1826), who has been in the Royal yacht for two years, and during the last year first lieutenant, a deserving and highly respected officer, to the rank of a commander. Mates.—Augustus C. Hobart (1842), the senior mate, Edward H. H. D'Aeth (1843), and the Hon. John Russell M. Byng (1843), to the rank of lieutenant.

THE LATE MR. BISSET DEAD.—Mr. Bisset, assistant surgeon, who recently volunteered his services at Madeira, and died on board the Eclair, steam sloop, off Ferrol, at Stangate Creek last week, was promoted by the Admiralty to the rank of surgeon previous to his decease.

THE "ECLAIR" STEAMER.—Mr. Saunders, the pilot who brought the Eclair to Sheerness, from Portsmouth, has also fallen a victim to the fever. Dr. Coffey, and the other sufferers on board the Worcester, are going on quite favourably. Dr. Rogers was attacked on Saturday afternoon, [illegible] dangerously ill, but is considered better. Lieutenant Isaacson died on Saturday morning. One other fresh case has occurred. Dr. Heath, of the Dwarf, having volunteered his services, has been put on board the Revenge, to watch any symptoms of disease among the health part of the crew.

POSTSCRIPT.

THE NEW BISHOP.—The Bishop of Oxford has been gazetted as the new Bishop of Bath and Wells.

THE WEST INDIA MAIL STEAM-PACKET COMPANY. At the Meeting of the Shareholders of the Royal West India Mail Steam packet Company, held on Thursday, at the London Tavern, a dividend of 3½s. per share, clear of income-tax, for the first half of the present year, was declared SERIOUS ACCIDENT AT A WEDDING.—On Thursday evening, a party of friends having met at the house of Mr. G. Hearndon, of Upper street, Islington, to celebrate the wedding of his eldest son, Thomas, with Miss Robertson, of Ely place, Holborn, some of them commenced singing, and one of them having sung a song called "The Musicioe Bough," the bride jocosely observed that she would imitate the heroine, as there was no fear of any such fatal result; and, accompanied by some of her female friends, she ran upstairs, followed by her husband, and some others of the company. The ladies concealed themselves in a room on the second floor, when a young man, of the name of Brooks, a law-writer, having succeeded in forcing the door, Mrs. Hearndon, in carrying out the jest, rushed to the chimney-piece, and, taking down a pistol, presented it at Mr. Brooks, and, drawing the trigger, to the horror of all present, discovered it was loaded. The charge entered Mr. Brooks's left side, who immediately fell. Medical assistance was instantly sent for, and Mr. Greigson, of Gibson-square, was called in, who declared the wounds to be of a most dangerous character.

FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE RIVER.—Yesterday, between two and three o'clock, as a young man, named Mark Lambert, was practising for a coming rowing match in a very light racing wherry, opposite Strand-lane, he lost one of his sculls, and, in attempting to recover it, the boat upset, and the unfortunate man was drowned, no assistance being at hand. The body has not been recovered. He has left a wife and two children to lament his loss.

FATAL RAILWAY ACCIDENT.—The down train on the Great Western Railway left Paddington yesterday morning, and reached West Drayton at half-past [illegible]. Here a quantity of luggage was taken in and some passengers. Immediately after the departure of the train, a more than usual quantity of steam was put on, the train being some minutes behind. The engineer, George Vasey, was about to decrease the power, when the funnel of the boiler exploded its fragments in every direction. Vasey was struck by some of the pieces, which, commixed with the overpowering quantity of steam, threw the poor fellow off the engine on to the train rail. The engine was [illegible], by the men on the instant. On being taken up, the unfortunate man presented a frightful spectacle; he was then alive, but expired [illegible]. The engine was [illegible]. Another engine was provided, and proceeded on with the train.

LAMENTABLE ACCIDENT AT SUNDERLAND.—A distressing accident occurred at Sunderland on Wednesday, by which four lives have been lost. About noon, the pupils of Dr. Cowan, of the Grange Academy, near the town, proceeded to the sea beach for the purpose of bathing. On this occasion 38 went down, accompanied by four teachers, and they bathed at a short distance from Hendon. There was rather a heavy ground-swell, and four boys, named Archibald Baird and Lennie, were swept out of their depth by a strong sea. On their dangerous situation being observed by Robert Baird and Mr. Special, one of the tutors, they [illegible] assistance of their juvenile friends, but they were both swept away by the ebb current, and neither of them being able to swim they were all drowned. By this time Mr. Wilson, the senior tutor, who was bathing at a short distance, came up, and succeeded in drawing Lennie out of the water, but he was then quite dead. Robert Baird is 18, and Archibald Baird 16 years of age; they are sons of Sir David Baird, whose residence is near Dunbar; Lennie is 10 years of age, and the son of Mr. M'Alpine Lennie, of Dalswinton, near Dumfries. The latter had been only a few weeks at the school

SHOPLIFTING.—At the Brentwood Petty Sessions on Thursday Mrs. Margaret Sarah Hardidge, a widow lady of respectable connections, was charged before Messrs. Hay and Beadsted, the presiding magistrates, on a charge of purloining from the shop of Mr. Radford, silk mercer and haberdasher, of High street, Brentwood, a quantity of lace and other articles of value, his property. On the apprehension of the accused, who was fashionably attired, the sum of nearly £900 in Bank of England notes and India Bonds, was found. Mr. James Radford, the prosecutor, deposed that about half-past three o'clock on the afternoon of the preceding day, a lady came to his shop and purchased a quantity of articles, which were left on the shop counter, with orders to be sent home. Witness then went up stairs into his warehouse, leaving only one of his apprentices in the shop. In about half an hour the shop bell rang, and on witness going down he found the prisoner in the shop. She inquired for Mrs. Radford, who was engaged at the time, when the prisoner said she would wait to see her; she then commenced looking over a chair. Witness then commenced packing up the goods on the counter, when he missed a quantity of Brussels lace and other articles, of the value of £7. Witness questioned the apprentice respecting the property, but he had not seen any of the articles, and that not no one had been in the shop since he (witness) had been up stairs but the prisoner. Witness felt reluctant to question the prisoner, whom he knew to be a highly respectable lady, and had been in the habit of making large purchases at his shop. The excited manner of the prisoner, however, raised his suspicion, and he asked her respecting the missing property, when she produced a bundle of it, and evinced great indignation on being questioned upon the subject. Witness observed that no one had been in the shop since the articles had been placed on the counter but the apprentice, who, however unpleasant, he must insist upon her being searched. The prisoner, after expressing her astonishment at such a line of conduct, consented that her person should be searched. In furtherance of this object witness called Mrs Radford, who accompanied the prisoner up stairs to a private room. In a few minutes Mrs. Radford rang the bell, and on witness going up stairs, he was informed that the prisoner would not allow herself to be searched. Witness then threatened to send for a constable, when the prisoner became greatly agitated. Witness again left the room, and shortly after was called by his wife, when he found that the prisoner had taken from her bosom and other parts of her person the [illegible] of the articles which had been taken from off the counter in the shop. On the discovery of the robbery the prisoner became almost frantic, and said she would give any money, thousands if required, to be allowed to go. Witness having sent for the police, the prisoner was given into custody. On the officer's appearance, the prisoner took out her purse full of bank notes and sovereigns, and offered it to him if he would allow her to go home, and not be exposed.—Mrs. Caroline Radford, the wife of the prosecutor, was next examined. She proved discovering the stolen articles secreted about the person of the prisoner, who during the time entreated for mercy, and expressed a hope that she should not be prosecuted.—Both Mr. and Mrs. Radford were subjected to a severe cross-examination by Mr Mayne, the prisoner's legal adviser, but it did not shake their testimony Mr. Mayne said he should not say anything on the part of the prisoner at that time, but he could state emphatically that the [illegible] of the transaction would be satisfactorily explained on a more proper occasion.—The prisoner was then fully committed to take her trial at the ensuing Chelmsford Assizes, and all the property found upon her was produced.—The prisoner was then removed from the dock in a fainting condition.—Before the magistrates left the bench, Mr. Mayne appealed to them to admit the prisoner to bail, which was refused.

THE TYPHUS FEVER AT SUNDERLAND CASES.—Dr. Rogers (of the Ocean) is convalescent, and no new cases have appeared since he was attacked, and it is hoped now that the disease is at an end. Mr. Heath, the assistant surgeon of the Dwarf, was put on board the Revenge on Sunday. The services of no other medical officer have been required, though the assistant surgeons of the Rosen cutter and the Columbine, 84, were held in readiness to proceed on board if necessary.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

SPAIN.—The Emancypation of Toulouse gives with great confidence a very improbable report that a marriage has taken place by procuration, between the young Queen of Spain and the eldest son of Don Carlos, who is said to have been represented by the Duke de Rianzi.

ALGERIA.—The Paris journals of Wednesday are [illegible] with official despatches from Algeria. The first is from Lieutenant-General Cavaignac, ad interim Governor General of Algeria, and dated Oran the 1st instant. It confirms the fact of a detachment of two hundred French troops, which had been marched from Flemcen, on the 27th ultimo, in order to reinforce a post called Ain-Temouchaen, having been suddenly surrounded by the Arabs, and compelled to surrender. The men, it must be observed, had been selected among those least fit to undergo active service. General Lamoricière concludes his despatch by stating that he is setting out with five battalions, in order to join, at Oran Lake, General Korte, who is proceeding to it with 700 infantry and as many cavalry, and that after effecting a junction, General Cavaignac's column, he will march to the mountains, where the enemy had formed a numerous gathering of rebel tribes. A postscript to the despatch adds, that General Bourjolly has had an encounter with the tribes who have joined Ben Maza, and that he has killed 150 men and captured 100 horses. The second report is from Colonel [illegible], and details the furious attacks which he has had to stand in marching to the western parts of Algiers, that the tribes which had hitherto remained quiet, and in which the most confidence was reposed, have risen against the French; and that both Arabs and Kabyles are fighting with extraordinary enthusiasm and bravery. At one place Colonel Gery had to struggle with them corps à corps; and at another, neither party having any more powder, the struggle ended à coups de pierre. "We have seen," says Genera. Cavaignac, "as many as seven Kabyles killed over the corpse of one of our soldiers. This is no longer a mere rebellion of the Beni-Ouenoug it is war reviving on the frontier."

THE WAR IN ALGERIA.

Elsewhere, in our present Number, will be found recorded another attack upon the French in Algeria, which has led to the embarkation of Marshal Bugeaud for that ill-fated country. We annex an equestrian portrait of the French Commander, copied from one of Horace Vernet's finest pictures in the Great Gallery at Versailles. The likeness is remarkably correct and spirited.

Beneath is a group of Kabyles, drawn by M. Frederic Goupil, a successful pupil of Horace Vernet. The Kabyles are a strong and courageous race of Algeria, inhabiting fixed dwellings, and employing themselves in agriculture, as well as in cattle breeding. They always fight on foot, armed with a yataghan and a long rifle. They rarely attack by night, for one of the precepts of the Koran is neither to wander nor to wage war by night, and this they pretty scrupulously obey. They are accustomed to greet the French with a torrent of friendly epithets, such as "hahluf" (swine), &c., which is accompanied by a shower of balls. He who falls into the hands of the Kabyles is born under no lucky planet—his head is instantly cut off and borne away as a trophy.

One of their attacks upon the French is thus described in the very interesting part of Murray's Home and Colonial Library, entitled The French in Algiers:—

"We advanced as usual en tirailleurs to cover the watering-place, but we had scarcely reached the further side of the stream when we were greeted on all sides by yells and bullets. The Kabyles had hidden themselves in the brushwood close by, and occupied an eminence opposite to us. In order to make use of our strongest weapon, the bayonet, which is much dreaded by the Kabyles, we advanced up the hill with levelled bayonets, and took it at the first attack. But scarce had we reached the top when we received a heavy fire from all sides, the Kabyles having surrounded us in a semicircle. In a moment we had several killed and wounded, and were forced to retreat faster than we had advanced, the Kabyles pressing furiously on our rear. The commanding officer exclaimed—'Sauvez les blessés! sauvez les blessés!'

"A non-commissioned officer close beside me had been shot through the jaw; he had completely lost his senses, and was reeling round and round like a drunken man. I seized him under the arm, and dragged him towards the nearest blockhouse, into which the company retreated. We were the very last, and the Kabyles yelled wildly close behind us, while their bullets whistled in our ears; I was not hit, however, and succeeded in bringing my charge safely home, conscious of having done my duty as a soldier and as a man. We had but just reached the blockhouse when the Commandant Superieur came up with a reinforcement of several companies, and sent us all out again to rescue the cattle, which by this time had all but fallen into the enemy's hands. The beasts were so deeply engaged in the noble occupation of drinking, that it was almost impossible to move them from the spot. We now repulsed the Kabyles, and at length the horsemen succeeded in driving off the cattle."

ENCOUNTER OF KABYLES WITH FRENCH TROOPS.

The Augsburg Gazette states that Russia lost during the campaign of this year in the Caucasus 3 General Officers, 6 Colonels and Lieutenant-Colonels, 20 Staff officers, 200 officers of various grades, and from 10,000 to 12,000 soldiers. The army, says that journal, is at present in a very deplorable state, famine and sickness have carried off vast numbers of men. The operations of this year have wholly failed. It was found necessary to abandon all the posts which had been gained with such great sacrifices, and in no part has a garrison been left. The St. Petersburgh Journal of the 28th ult., publishes an account from Tiflis, dated the 18th of August, of the return to Georgia of the Russian troops of the late expedition in the Caucasus. According to the Russian account, the campaign has been attended with important results, and the troops are said to have returned in so fresh a state that it would not be supposed they had undergone fatigue and privation.

According to a German paper, the barbarous feudal system of duelling has had another victim in Wetzlar. An officer of the Yager Guards, quartered there, Lieutenant von Negri, who was universally respected, was shot by one of his comrades. He had already fallen with his death wound, when he again raised himself on his arm, and shot his opponent in the right arm. Negri died sixteen hours afterwards. The cause is said to have been some unfavourable emarks of the survivor on the nobility of the country, and particularly on the descent of Negri.

RAILWAY EXTENSION.

Swindon is described as the "disputed railway territory," from the number of schemes proposing at this point to join the Great Western Railway, or to pass over it with independent lines. It is situated in a very fine part of the county of Wilts, 77 miles from the metropolis (81 by the railway), and 116¼ from Exeter.

The Railway Station, or Stations,—for there is one on each side of the road—are, perhaps, second to none in the kingdom; and their accommodation is of the most elegant and splendid description. Independent of the magnificent Refreshment Rooms, on each side of the line, there are an excellent Hotel and sleeping apartments: they communicate with each other by a covered passage over the railway.

The New Town, which has sprung up within the last two years, is principally occupied by the artisans employed by the Railway Company, who make it a sort of depôt for their various works. The houses are all neatly built of stone, with slated roofs, and arranged in streets. They have already Bristol, Taunton, Exeter, and Bath streets; and others are fast rising.

The Church, of which we gave an Engraving in our journal of last week, is situated at the west end of the town, and is a very beautiful structure; and the school-houses attached are built in the same style. Numerous other buildings and villas are in progress; all building of stone, which is very plentiful in this neighbourhood. The old town of Swindon is about a mile and a half from the station, on the crown of a hill to the south. The view from it is very commanding, the country being very flat on all sides, but remarkably rich and finely wooded. The old town has all the characteristics of an English market town. The old picturesque houses and cottages are here beginning to make way for the more modern style of architecture; and, if half the projects now in contemplation are completed, the old and new towns will ere long be amalgamated in one.

GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY.—THE SWINDON STATION.

THE RAILWAY PROGRESS.

Railways now occupy such a prominent position in the public mind, that we have no doubt our readers will be interested in the following record of their progress. We select the accounts from various sources —

Metropolitan Termini.—A treaty for the purchase of Northumberland House is going on between its ducal proprietor and the South-Western. The Central Terminus are said to be negotiating for leasing Waterloo-bridge.

Southwark Bridge.—Proposals, it is said, have been made to the proprietors of Southwark iron bridge for the purchase of that structure with a view of converting it into a City termini for the South Eastern, Brighton, and South Western Railways.

Direct London and Exeter.—It is reported in well informed quarters, that Mr Hudson is likely to be connected with this line. The allotment of shares has just been made, and they are much sought after. It is said the Railway King is determined to have a narrow gauge into Cornwall and the extreme south-westerly districts of England, either by means of an extension of his Bristol and Birmingham Railway, or by joining the promoters of this project. He can effect this by his Southampton line, which runs from Cheltenham to Southampton, by a junction with the Direct London and Exeter, near Salisbury or Shaftesbury, which would give him a narrow gauge into Cornwall without an additional mile of new railway.

Plymouth and North Cornwall.—A new scheme has been promulgated under the above title. The course of this railway is as follows —The principal terminus is to be at Sutton Pool, the centre of the established trade, for the deepening and improvement of which a new company, with £100,000 capital, is in process of formation. The line will cross the Tamar at or near Saltash, and proceed by Callington to the vicinity of Launceston, whence it will extend by Camelford to the Delabole quarries, and there form a communication with the Delabole and Rock Railway, for the formation of which an act of Parliament, containing ample power to construct docks and otherwise improve the harbour of Padstow, has been already obtained. Short branches will connect the line with Devonport, Linkinhorne, and Launceston. The capital is £900,000, in shares of £25 each, and the engineer is Mr. George Rennie.

Yorkshire and Lancashire.—The railways in operation in these counties are 23, in progress, 97; projected, 160; of the latter, 22 have been surveyed and settled as to the lines, but the remainder are not yet in a definable state.

Birmingham Lines.—About forty lines immediately connected with Birmingham and the district are already projected, the estimated capital for the construction of which is upwards of £30,000,000 sterling, and there are, it is said, applications for fifty times the number of shares which the projectors have for allotment! Birmingham has thus been made a great centre, from which lines radiate in every direction. The town itself promises to be no less revolutionised. Two magnificent central stations have been determined upon. One to accommodate the London and Birmingham and the Stour Valley traffic, the second for the Grand Junction and the Birmingham and Oxford lines. Another consequence of railway progress, and a most gratifying one, is the establishment of a Stock Exchange, of which the foundation-stone was laid last week.

Projects and Deposits.—Thirty millions have been said to be the amount required in deposits for the new projects, representing a total capital of £300,000,000. The correct account, obtained by a laborious compilation, gives, we understand, 332 schemes brought out up to September 30, 1845, requiring a gross capital of £279,950,000, on which £23,057,493 will have to be deposited. But this does not include 137 projects preliminarily noticed. There have been, therefore, in fact, 469 new schemes projected. Thus much for the English projects. In foreign matters, 66 have appeared up to the 30th of September, requiring £190,010,000, deposits, £17,095,450.

The Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton.—At the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton meeting, held on Wednesday, a stormy debate took place on the subject of the lease of this line to the Great Western Railway. The report of the directors was, however, adopted, and the necessary resolutions were unanimously carried.

Amalgamations.—It is said that a very satisfactory arrangement has been made between the York and North Midland Railway Company and the Axholme, Gainsborough, and Goole Company, by which four per cent. will be guaranteed to the shareholders in the latter line, besides half the surplus profits; which, it is believed, will raise the dividend to seven or eight per cent. Mr. Hudson will be chairman, and the Right Hon. Sir John Beckett deputy-chairman of the Axholme Company. Other directors from the York and North Midland Company will also be added to the board.

Eastern Counties.—We understand that Mr. Hudson has accepted a seat in the direction of the Eastern Counties, and that he will become chairman of the undertaking.

Durham and Sunderland.—Mr. Hudson, M.P. (on behalf of the Newcastle and Darlington Railway Company), has purchased the Durham and Sunderland Railway. We cannot state the price exactly, but £33 6s. 8d. has been named as the probable sum per share. Mr. Hudson, in company with other gentlemen, subsequently waited upon Mr Murray, the engineer of the river Wear, and inspected the plan of his proposed docks; and so highly did the Railway King approve of the project, that he at once put down his name for £50,000 (being one-fourth of the entire capital).

Norfolk Lines.—Norwich is to be the nucleus of eight railways, Lynn of four, Ely of seven, Thetford of nine, Bury St. Edmund's of thirteen, Diss of eight, Dereham of five, Newmarke of seven, Wisbeach of seven, Cambridge of eight, Beccles of three, and the small village of Royston of six.

Mr. Hudson.—The testimonial to Mr. Hudson is likely to be of a character worthy of his success in promoting projects of the greatest national importance and magnitude. The subscriptions already amount to £20,000, but what will be the ultimate amount it is impossible at present to estimate. Mr Hudson has purchased Newby Park, one of the beautiful seats of the Earl De Grey. It is bounded by the romantic river Swale, and adjoins the splendid estate of Baldersby, in the North Riding, which Mr. Hudson some time ago purchased of the Duke of Devonshire. As there is no family mansion on the Baldersby estate, this purchase will form a most desirable appanage.

On the line are mining, agricultural, and manufacturing establishments of an important character, while the whole of the traffic will, under the cultivation, become still more valuable. The termini have also a good population, and there are many neighbouring places which would be accommodated. The line has the support of the local landowners, and a case strong enough to enable it to go to Parliament with the best prospect.

Metropolitan Railways Junction.—The allotments in the Company were made on Tuesday. The line has been received with much favour hitherto SCOTCH RAILWAYS.

The Caledonian Canal.—A grand scheme for converting the Caledonian Canal into a railway is in agitation. It has for its object the leasing of the canal, with the improvements now in progress, gathering in the traffic by large vessels from sea to sea, and goods landed in warehouses at Inverness for the west. It will work itself into the Scottish Western half way between the end of the canal at Fort William and Glasgow, and its route will be over an area of some hundred miles. It will be called the Great North and West of Scotland, and will open up and consolidate direct communication with all the northern lines projected and in progress, commencing at Inverness, running along the south bank of the Caledonian Canal to Fort William, thence through Argyleshire, Perthshire, and Dumbartonshire, direct to Glasgow, uniting the Moray Frith and German Ocean on the east with the Clyde and Atlantic on the west.

Extraordinary Premium for Railway Stock.—On Wednesday (last week) the letters of allocation of the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company were issued, and the first sale effected was at a premium of £10, and the last on that day at £16 12s. Next day the sales commenced at £21, and closed at £29 premium. This is a most extraordinary rise that ever took place in railway stock in two days in Scotland, if not in England.

Banffshire.—The promoters of this line have recently employed a gentleman of great abilities and experience to go over again the country intersected by the line, with the view of ascertaining correctly its capabilities, and the traffic which may reasonably be expected; and the result of his investigations has been that the existing traffic will yield a revenue of about £14,000 per annum on a capital of £120,000, and that the working of the Duke of Richmond's inexhaustible fields of ironstone, limestone, and manganese mines, independent of many other sources of traffic, will at least add £6000 to the annual receipts.

Edinburgh and Leith Atmospheric.—The current week has been prolific in announcements of railway schemes for Edinburgh with the port of Leith by a direct and independent communication, at the same time introducing the first Scottish atmospheric line. Two schemes came out simultaneously, but the Edinburgh and Leith Atmospheric Railway Company have formed a junction with the Edinburgh and Leith Direct Railway. No sooner was this amalgamation effected than the prospectus of another atmospheric company to Leith was announced.

Edinburgh, Portobello, and Musselburgh Direct.—This is a proposal to construct a railway between these places, to commence at the head of Leith-walk, and proceed by Restalrig to Portobello, thence to Joppa, Fisherrow, and Musselburgh. Capital, £300,000, in 10,000 shares of £30 each. The prospectus leaves it open to adopt the atmospheric principle of traction.

Edinburgh, Leith, and Granton.—This Company have intimated their intention to apply for power to construct a branch from Bonnington to the shore of Leith. The question of applying the atmospheric principle appears to have been considered by the directors. They are disposed to adopt it, should their engineer report in its favour.

Slamannan and Borness Junction (Glasgow).—The provisional directors of this Company have made the following report:—"The directors are now able to congratulate the shareholders on the completion of the agreement, and the subsequent arrangement between the Monkland Companies and the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company, which has just been concluded. The agreement with the Monkland Companies was entered into in anticipation of a serious and expensive parliamentary contest with the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway, and the terms were highly favourable to the Company. The Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company, however, have now concluded an amalgamation with the Monkland Railway Companies, one of the conditions of which is, that they shall fulfil the obligations of the latter, including this agreement with the Slamannan and Borness Company. By these important transactions, the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company will, in a short time, become to be directed not to Glasgow alone opposite to Port Dundas, but to Glasgow, Coatbridge, Airdrie, and Monkland, and will thereby become the promoters of your line."

Lanark, Stirling, and Clamannan Counties Junction.—A line of seventeen miles in length, branching from the Edinburgh and Glasgow to Alloa, Tillicoulty, and other places The capital is £300,000, in £25 shares with a deposit of £2 10s. per share. Messrs. Nell Robson, and James Colquhoun, engineers.

Inverness and Ross.—A line, with a capital of half a million, in £25 shares. Messrs. N Maclean and Mr. H. Morrison, engineers.

Newton Stewart and Portpatrick.—A line from Dalry and New Galloway, to join the British and North Union Railway near Castle Douglas. Capital, half a million, in £25 shares, with a deposit of £2 10s. per share. Mr. Locke and Mr. Errington, engineers.

Ayr and Dumfries.—A line, fifteen miles in length, from Ayr, to join the Glasgow, Dumfries, and Carlisle Railway. The capital is £250,000 in £25 shares, with a deposit of £2 2s. per share. Mr. Neil Robson, engineer.

Lisk and Mansfield Railway.—The shares in this line have been allotted, and we hear that, from the high character of the projectors and the general prospect which it presents, it is received very favourably in the City.

IRISH RAILWAYS.

Galway and Ennis Grand Junction. The above company has been incorporated with the almost entire Dublin Committee.

Ballyshannon to Belleek.—Colonel Conolly M.P., attended a meeting respecting this new project, at the Town Hall of Ballyshannon, on Saturday, and reported, as the result of a conference with the engineer, Mr. Farrell, that a railway of the county would be satisfied with a single line, to be worked with horse power in the first instance, that such a line might be readily effected at a cost of about £25,000, instead of £75,000, as stated by Mr. Colles; and that in such case, Lord Farnham, one of the Committee, connected with that work, would cheerfully enter on the project.

Dublin, Dundrum, and Enniskerry.—An amalgamation, to a certain extent, between the Waterford, Wexford, and Dublin, and the Dublin, Dundrum, and Enniskerry Railway, has taken place.

Irish Great Western.—The exchange of old scrip of the Company is nearly completed, and the new scrip of ten per cent lodged in the bank The Parliamentary surveys are in a state of great forwardness, and a line has been determined upon which will make the length of the line to be laid from Portarlington to Athlone only 30 miles, and the whole distance to Athlone from Dublin to Galway 132 miles; the most direct line. Almost every town in Connaught has pronounced in favour of the one.

Great Irish Central.—The Company's line to commence at Limerick, in the south, and end at Clones, in the north of Ireland, with a branch from Parsonstown to Roscrea Length, 132 miles; capital, £2,000,000, in 80,000 shares of £25 each. The engineers are Mr. Barton, Mr. Nicholson

Navan to Killaloe.—A new line is announced from Navan, county Tipperary, to Killaloe, on the Shannon, connecting the Great Southern and Western with the Limerick, Ennis, and Killaloe.

New Irish Railway Projects.—A company is in progress of formation in Dublin to be entitled "The Dublin Southern City Railway Company," for the purpose of constructing a line of railway from Dublin to Rathfarnham and Ballyboden, with branches to Tallaght on one side, and on the other to Milltown, Dundrum, Stillorgan, the Vale of Shanganagh, and to join the Bray line. Another company is "getting up," for the purpose of constructing a railway on the atmospheric principle, to be worked by water power, between Dublin and the Liffey Water Works, and the whole of the lands from Dublin to Galway 132 miles; the most direct line. Almost every town in Connaught has pronounced in favour of the one.

Omagh and Monaghan.—A new line is projected, taking up the Londonderry and Enniskillen at Omagh, and thence proceeding by Ballygawley, Aughnacloy, and Emyvale, to Monaghan, from whence there will be a railway communication with Dundalk, Drogheda, and Dublin.

Newry and Castlesblaney.—A line, about seventeen miles in length, proposed to be worked on the atmospheric principle. The capital is £200,000, in £10 shares, with a deposit of £1 5s. per share.

Limerick and Belfast Direct.—A line, about one hundred and twenty miles in length. The capital is a million and a half, in £20 shares, with a deposit of £2 10s. per share.

FOREIGN RAILWAYS.

Switzerland. The question of railways is very much discussed throughout the whole of Switzerland. Opinions are divided in a thousand different ways, local interests prevail, and no authority is found sufficient to guide them all to one point. Two schemes have appeared here almost simultaneously. Zurich is to have a line to be called the "Swiss Northern," which is to join either Basle or the German line at its terminus, and Basle is to construct the Swiss Central, a trunk line to Olten, with branches to Zurich, Lucern, and the Bodensee. Both plans have one object in common, viz., the connection of Basle and Zurich; this similarity has, however, failed in uniting the two parties. Some attempts towards a union of the two schemes on the part of the people were rather rudely negatived at Zurich some months ago.

Stuttgard.—On the 26th inst., the finished portion of this line, from Cannstadt to Untertürkheim, was opened amid universal rejoicings, in the presence of his Majesty the King of Wurtemberg and a numerous public, whose cheers were loud and long. The result was quite satisfactory.

Brussels and London.—There is a new project to establish a direct line of communication between Brussels and London, to construct a pier and jetty near Adinkerke point (which is about seven miles from Dunkirk), with a railway to Ghent, and with embranchments from Furnes to Nieuport and Ostend. This line will pass through Furnes, Pervyse, Boyckerke, Thouroute, Sweveczele, Ruysselede, and Neville, to the state line at Ghent; and from Furnes and Nieuport to the state line at Ostend stations will be constructed at the above places. The distance which will be saved by this direct line between Brussels and London is estimated at thirty miles and upwards; the sea passage will be performed in less than three hours from Adinkerke pier to Dover and Ramsgate. The harbour will be made accessible at all times, tide and weather, night or day. It is proposed to construct a jetty of a length of 1500 feet, and to offer great facilities to steamboats and passengers, so as to enable them to arrive at Dover and Ramsgate at all hours, and thereby prevent any delay or inconvenience which now takes place at the existing different harbours in landing of the mails and passengers. The distance from Brussels to London will be performed in less than ten hours

Fampoux and Hazebrouck.—The ordonnance and statistics of the Fampoux and Hazebrouck Railway Company are published in the Bulletin des Lois. In the list of shareholders are the following:—Count Molé, Peer of France, 100 shares; Count Montalivet, Peer of France, 200; M. Paillard du Cleré, Deputy, 50; M. Mugnos (Jose), 200; M. Augustin Sanchez, Secretary of M. Mugnos, 150; M. Leroy, ditto, 100; M. Barthe, late President of the Cour des Comptes and Peer of France, 100; Count Rumigny, Lieutenant General and King's Aide-de Camp, 100; M. Armand Bertin, Editor of the Journal des Débats, 500; Mademoiselle Louise Bertin, 100; and Count de la Payssonniere, Peer of France, 600 shares.

Damish. On the 18th ult., exactly one year after the opening of the Kanning Kanal in VIII. Baltic Railway, the first length of the Konigsberg-Cranz Railway was opened with great pomp at Rendsberg. This railway has, through the zeal of the directors and engineer, been completed in the incredibly short space of five months, with the exception of the Konigsberg terminus, which is not yet completed. It is anticipated that the newly-opened railway will prove advantageous for the trade of West and South Germany, and Austria, at the same time, compensate for the extremely small cost of its erection, viz., 900,000 marks (£65,500).

Railways in France.—The Journal des Chemins de Fer announces the formation of a new company for the execution of the lines from Tours and Nantes Road, under the presidency of Count Borelli.—The Union Company, which intends to bid for the Paris and Lyons Railway, was about to call on their shareholders to pay into Baron Rothschild's bank the first tenth of their subscription.—A new company has been constituted, to establish a circular railroad round Paris, and a communication between that capital and Soissons.—M. Petiet, former engineer of the Versailles left bank road, had been appointed chief of the materiel of the Northern Line.—Upon the first section of the Great Northern of France, extending from Paris to Amiens, the embankments and other engineering works are completely finished; the laying down of the rails is also far advanced, and there will be, very shortly, one continuous way along the whole extent of the section, the second way will not be finished for some time longer, as the necessary materials have not yet been supplied. By the end of February next the first of the ways will be achieved upon this section. Between Arras and Lille and Valenciennes one way is already accomplished, and the other on the point of being so.

COUNTRY NEWS.

The Monument to Grace Darling.—The long-contemplated monument to the memory of the late Miss Grace Horsly Darling, is about to be erected in Bamburgh churchyard.

Windsor Election.—Mr. Walter has offered himself for Windsor, with every prospect of success. The struggle will be between Mr. Walter and Colonel Reid, who makes no secret of avowing that he is the "Government" candidate, and that he will be supported by the "Castle" interest. Under the circumstances, there is very little doubt that the battle for the representation of the Royal borough will be hardly fought, and the honour stoutly contended for.

Worcester Election.—The vacancy caused by the death of the Marquis of Ely, and consequent elevation of Viscount Lotus to the peerage, makes little stir in the borough itself as to who is likely to be its new representative. The only candidate in the field at present is that of Lord Alfred Churchill, second son of the Duke of Marlborough. Should he succeed, of which there is no reasonable doubt, his lordship will be the youngest member in the house of Commons, only having attained his majority on the 24th of April last.

Wigan Election.—The nomination of candidates for the election of a member to represent this borough, in the place of the late Peter Greenall, Esq., took place on Wednesday, at the Moot Hall. The candidates were the Hon Captain James Lindsay, second son of the Earl of Balcarres, on the Conservative interest, and R. A. Thicknesse, Esq., son of the late Ralph Thicknesse, Esq., of Beech-hill, near Wigan, formerly M.P. for the borough, on the side of the Whigs.—Joseph Acton, Esq., proposed Mr. Thicknesse as a candidate for the representation of the borough. Hesse Brown, Esq., seconded the nomination.—John Thompson, Esq., proposed the Hon. Captain Lindsay. John Lord, Esq., seconded the nomination.—Mr. Thicknesse and Captain Lindsay severally addressed the electors.—Mr. Acton called for a show of hands, which was clearly in favour of the Captain.—A poll was demanded on behalf of Mr. Thicknesse, which commenced on Thursday morning. The result of the poll on Thursday was the election of Captain Lindsay by the close votes—Lindsay, 323; Thicknesse, 311. Total majority for Lindsay, 62.

Conflagration at Nottingham.—A very serious fire was discovered about two o'clock on Saturday morning, on Tuesday last, in a range of buildings in Wool-alley, Nottingham, occupied as workshops by Mr. William Bates, of Woolpack-lane, maker of stocking frames. The building in question was three stories high, with the top one being a mere lumber room, long, full of frames; the second contained a workshop and the counting house; and the ground floor, the forge, a stable, and other offices. The inhabitants in the neighbourhood were soon found in the streets to secure their goods, and seek shelter in their neighbours' houses The fire lasted all night. The building was completely gutted, the floors and rooms having fallen in and been consumed. The number of frames destroyed is about 30, a boat one hundred and thirty, and the damage is estimated at not less than £1400. The building was insured, but the frames and other property, unfortunately, were not. The fire originated in the top room, and it is supposed that the fire originated in consequence of some sparks flying unperceived from the forge, upon some shavings left by the carpenters, who had been employed the day before to repair the floor.

Great Fire at Inverness. This town was, on Wednesday week, subjected to a calamity greater than has visited it for many years, three large lofty tenements being totally destroyed by fire, involving the loss of property to a great extent. The locality in which the fire took place embraces part of Inglis-street and Theatre-lane. It broke out in the premises occupied by Mr. M'Kay, merchant, Mr. Mackay, tailor and clothier, and others, from which it spread to two large adjoining, possessed on the ground floor by several shopkeepers, and occupied above as dwelling-houses. The fire was first observed about three on Wednesday morning, and so rapid were the flames over the buildings, that many of the tenants only became aware of their danger by the beds in which they slept being ignited, and were glad to make their escape in their night clothes. The whole of the furniture in the dwelling-houses was consumed. Seven families, amounting to sixty-two individuals, having been burnt out. Great loss was also sustained in the shops beneath. Mr. M'Kay is said to have suffered to the extent of upwards of £4000.

A Policeman Shot at Liverpool.—A policeman was shot at Liverpool on Sunday morning, under circumstances of a serious character. The event occurred in Johnson-street, Toxteth-park, about nine o'clock in that morning. It appears that, about that hour, three very respectably dressed persons, gentlemen by their exterior, were found drunk and disorderly in front of the above-mentioned premises, and the police-constable on his beat came upon being conveyed to Hotham street Bridewell they were searched, and upon the person of one a brace of pocket pistols were found. The prisoner, it is said, took them from under his coat, and, for the purpose of completing the search, and the person upon whom they were discovered seems to have put those present upon their guard, for he distinctly declared, in an audible voice, that they were loaded. Immediately after, however, the youngest of his companions seized one of the pistols and fired at police officer No 418. The contents entered the bridge of the unfortunate man's nose, and passed, it is said, almost across the head, without touching the brain. He was placed on a mattress in the Bridewell, and surgical assistance was speedily procured. The wound bled profusely. Subsequently he was conveyed to the Infirmary in Brownlow-hill-street, where he lay during the whole of the next day in a very precarious state. Up to Monday night the doctors were unable to extract the ball, and, consequently, to pronounce any opinion as to the probability of the man's recovery. There is every reason to fear that the pistol was loaded with a ball or a large slug, for the wound is of such a nature as would have been inflicted with a charge of that kind, and a large slug has been extracted from the head of the second pistol. It was rumoured that both the pistols had been loaded for the last six months, and that the owner had carried them with him upon a tour he made during the past summer through Wales and the north of England. The prisoners, on being booked, gave fictitious names; but it has since been ascertained that their real names are, Emanuel Bromilow, Thomas Benbow, and Thomas Francis Russell. The latter, who had the sum of £30 upon his person, fired the shot. One of them says that he is a medical man, another that he is brother to a timber-merchant. Russell is an attorney. The unfortunate police officer is an Irishman by birth. On Monday the parties charged were brought before Mr. Rushton and a bench of magistrates, when Benbow and Bromilow were charged with forcing open the door of a person called Wotting, in Hill-street. They made no defence. The latter, after examining Wotting and one of the police officers, took up the case of Russell The magistrates have since resolved to send the case for trial, but Russell has been admitted to bail.

We learn from Lucern, that the investigation respecting the death of M. Leu is concluded, and the decision come to is, that he was murdered by a person named Muller, an inhabitant of the canton, who has been for some time confined in the House of Correction, in the city, on suspicion, and now transferred to a more secure prison, as it has been discovered that plans were made to facilitate the escape of the prisoners in the House of Correction.

MUSIC.

A PROVINCIAL CONCERT.

M. and Madame Ostt's Morning Concert at Tunbridge Wells.—An expedition merely to attend a provincial concert in former times, would have been regarded as an act of intense insanity on the part of either amateur or critic; but, with the rule of these "iron times," such a trip becomes as much a matter, of course, as an ordinary attendance at the Hanover-square Rooms. On seeing the programme of a musical entertainment at Tunbridge Wells, with only a dozen distributed in two parts, in which the names of Beethoven, Mayseder, Mendelssohn, Moliqui, Mercadante, Mazzini, Donizetti, &c., were well balanced, and with only two vocalists and three instrumentalists, we asked ourselves whether a revolution in English taste was about to take place, and that quality and not quantity was to be the basis of a well-regulated scheme? We speculated as to the remaining such a concert, and resolved to have our question solved by a personal attendance. At eleven o'clock on Wednesday morning, starting from the head quarters of the Illustrated London News Office, 198, Strand, we found that the cab driver drove over Waterloo Bridge as the nearest cut to the London Bridge Station, the cuttings in Fleet-street rendering the circumnavigation compulsory. A pleasant railroad ride is it to Tunbridge Wells viâ Croydon, Reigate, and Tunbridge. There was but one casualty; the train being half-a-minute over time at Reigate, an inflammatory gent. menaced to write to the Editor of the Times for redress. The line to the Wells is now complete; that is, the train at Tunbridge, by a series of marchings and countermarchings, quits the Dover Line, and suddenly you find yourself looking down on the valley where a few seconds before you had been sliding. We regret that the profane joke relative to the "Wells" is still extant. Everybody knows who Dan Lambert cut the spot that there are divers mounts which bear such scriptural names as Ephraim, Sion, &c. The parish clerk, who had built houses "to let" on the last-named hill, sanctions to have a proper value fixed on his property; and gave out the psalm when his apartments were empty "Mount Sion a pleasant place." From the station at the "Wells" to the Royal Sussex Hotel, where the concert was given, is a legitimate omnibus expanse; anywards, the route d scloxing the sinuosities of the streets of the "Wells," and the remnants of the sanatory heath, very advantageously. The room in the hotel, for a county so famed for hops, we thought small for balls, but for a chamber concert well adapted. There was a good attendance, the visitors arriving chiefly from the town of Tunbridge, and not consisting of the aborigines of the "Wells." Indeed, we heard mysterious whisperings as to funds between the proprietors of the two towns, as to the division of patronage, although a community of sentiment ought to exist, inasmuch as we heard from a competent authority that the "harbours" are indigenous to both places. Pretty, however, were the views, fine and bright the eyes of the fairer portion of the Kentish creature—whether of the "Town," or the "Wells," and right judges did they prove themselves of the dainty musical repast provided for their morning's digestion.

Madame Oury is a pianiste, who plays not only with marvellous rapidity and consummate feeling and taste, but she reads off the work she plays with astonishing accuracy. She knows Beethoven's pianoforte compositions by heart, and can execute them from memory. In the trio, in E flat, for piano, violin, and violoncello, her even and firm touch, so delicate and rotund at the same time, conquered the greatest difficulties with ease and grace. In the grand trio in C minor (Dussek in Thalberg's "Moïse," in which it would seem as if four pair of hands were required to carry out the composer's conceptions; and in the brilliant passage of Mayseder's trio, in B flat, Madame Oury proved her perfect command over the instrument, and the diversity of her style. There is an enthusiasm, a fire, and an energy in her execution, that place her in the first rank of lady-pianistes. M. Oury's violin performances establish his claims as an accomplished artist, thoroughly acquainted with the fine thoughts of the mighty masters. The concertante duet for pianoforte and violin of M. and Madame Oury, on themes from Meyerbeer's "Robert le Diable," and Donizetti's "Don Pasquale," owe their great charm to matured practice together, and an intimate acquaintance with executive effects, especially those of modern musicians. Mr Cullum performed the violoncello part in the trios, and, with Madame Oury, a duo (à quatre mains) on Mendelssohn's celebrated March from the "Midsummer Night's Dream." Mr. Cullum is organist of Tunbridge, and is a sound musician, who loves Bach's fugues, and can execute them well.

The singers were Signor F. Lablache and Madame Lablache (formerly Miss Fanny Wyndham). These eminent vocalists have a reputation of their own, singing excellently, establishing what constant practice will accomplish. The younger Lablache is a highly-cultivated musician, as well as singer, whose comprehensive mind has an additional claim for praise in musical matters.

The Concert lasted two hours, and afforded infinite gratification; and, like the Parisian Concerts, the company were enabled to separate without the ennui or exhaustion experienced from the lengthened London programme.

It must be recorded as a remarkable instance of English enthusiasm for art, that there was one gentleman present, who has a seat near Leigh, and is building a Music-room, in the Gothic style, eighty feet long by thirty wide, to be called the Beethoven Hall

To any amateur who, like ourselves, may visit Tunbridge Wells on a musical expedition, we recommend, in conclusion, that the return should be made by the Penshurst station to London, inasmuch as the "Wells" and the last-mention place the most charming scenery in the world will repeat his sight. Starting at half-past eleven o'clock, a.m. attending the Concert, visiting the Penshurst, and returning to town by railroad in all, not far short of a hundred miles—we accomplished by half-past ten o'clock at night.

SOCIETY OF BRITISH MUSICIANS

The first Concert of the twelfth season was given on Monday last, at Erat's Harp Rooms, in Percy-street. The room was crowded to excess, and rendered oppressive. We were rather disappointed in finding that the only novelty in the scheme was a scena from "Attila," a MS opera, by Howard Glover. This musician is the son of Mrs. Clayton Glover, a distinguished singer, and herself a violinist, and has now an opera accepted at the Princess' Theatre. We presume the scena—which is written for a soprano—expresses affection for some young Saracen who has been taken prisoner. "Maiden dearer" is the "gloomy night," which she, consequently, deemed "fair." The scena commences with an aria, which is broken, for no apparent reason, by some bars of recitative, and then another aria is started. The composer evidently has written the scena well to suit the stage; in a room, it is quite ineffective. Mrs. A. Newton, who sang it, has considerable energy, and a powerful organ, but her intonation is precarious, and her style monotonous. The vocal specimens of Mr. Howard Glover will prove praiseworthy zeal and tact, but the composition itself was frivolous, and fell far short of the solemnity of such a theme as the grandeur of the great Eternal City. Donizetti has a waltz tune during a murder, in one of his operas; and Mr. Howard Glover must record that Nero fiddled whilst Rome was burning; but still one does not like, even with these authorities, that Mr. Loder should associate the name of Cæsar, and the "Thor's Hammer wave," with quadrilliads reminiscences. The instrumental specimens of native manufacture, were Macfarren's Quartet in A, for two violins, tenor, and violoncello, and H. Westrop's Quintet in E flat for the same instruments, with the addition of a pianoforte part. Macfarren's work is based upon the old system, but will forms but on the ideas of Beethoven—what is good is not original, and what is original is not good. The first and last movements were inordinately long and wearisome; and we do not understand, after the Quartet, why other movements in the fragments at the fantasie should have been made in the fourth movement. The best passages were in the Andante, but they were suggestive of old thoughts. Westrop's Quintet has much genius evidence of the "sacred fire"—that is, of originality. The Andante is instrumented with graceful phrases of melodious imagery; the presto was too much in the full of commonplaces. Works of Mozart and Beethoven opened and concluded, as usual, the scheme. The performants were Miss Baxter, a pupil of Sterndale Bennett, who distinguished herself on the pianoforte; Mr. Wilfy, Mr. Watson, Mr. Watson, Jun., and second violin; Mr. Hill, tenor; Mr. Hancock, violoncello; H. Westrop, piano; and Mr. Lucas, second violin. These are able players, but evidence of want of sufficient rehearsals was affended.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL CHIT-CHAT.

The new opera of "The Fairy Oak" will be produced to-night at Drury Lane Theatre. The libretto is by Mr. Coe Cosse, a member of the Chorus. Committee; and the music by Mr. Forbes, many years conductor of the Scots Amateur Concerts. Morlant has concluded his engagement at the Italian Opera, at Paris, and has departed for Madrid. Madame Persiani has been singing incessantly in Paris: it has been remarked that her voice was never in finer order than it is still: the audiences are delighted with the French critics. Lablache, Mario, and Grisi maintain their sway. Victor Hugo has positively refused to allow his story of "Ernani" to be attached to Verdi's opera, a new plot has been written, called "The Proscribed," or, Cæsar of Venice." Duprez has left Paris for Italy, during his two months' leave of absence from the Académie Royale. His voice latterly had quite recovered its pristine power. It is believed that Jenny Lind will finish her engagements with the Drury Lane Lessee in the course of the ensuing spring: Meyerbeer declared lately in Paris, that he would not speak to Jenny again, unless she kept her contract with Mr. Lumley. We may add, no doubt has been expressed on this subject, that we have seen the agreement for 20 representations in London, signed by Jenny Lind, in Berlin, in presence of the Earl of Westmoreland. The portrait and memoir of this celebrated artiste, the chief successor of Sontag, appears, in the last number of the Illustrated London News

"The Swiss Bellringers," who performed some time since at the Adelphi Theatre, have since travelled with great success through the Drury Lane circuit, the Canadas. At the date of their last letter, the ringers were staying at Boston, to 1000 persons nightly; and they propose to start from New Orleans, for Havana, Mexico, and the West Indies; and then return to England

Professor Keller is giving two series daily of the Poses Plastiques, in Suffolk-street. The exhibition consists in some very artistic groupings, by real figures, in tight shape dresses, representing several well-known pieces of sculpture: the "Gladiators," "Cupid and Psyche," the "Ariadne," the "Graces," &c. These are improved by a little more attention to the mise en scene, as well as the costume of the artistes. All colours, even of the flaunt tints, should be done away with, that the figures might resemble marble! The unseemly wrinkles of the clothings" might also be improved with advantage At present, the display is a species of compromise between painting and sculpture, being neither one thing nor the other.

Mr. Selby's dramatic adaptation of "Le Diable à Quatre," is announced for Monday, at the Adelphi. Report says it is to be performed with great spectacular pomp.

A RAMBLE IN THE REALMS OF CHAT.

In the days of our boyhood, we have often been amused by the old pantomime trick of a candle which could not be put out. It is al. in vain that the Clown places his foot on it; when he lifts it up again, the candle is gone from under it certainly, but it is blazing away in some other corner of the stage as unquenchable as ever. Pantaloon does his utmost to accomplish the task, with no better success; for, after stealing up to it with the greatest caution, and covering it with a huge extinguisher, when he lifts it up with his cry of "Now I've got 'em!" he finds that the candle has disappeared, to appear as quickly in some other place

Such is the manner in which Abd el Kader has been amusing himself lately, with the France and Morocco (as Clown and Pantaloon) have been ravouring to put him out.

First comes France, who attacks him, disperses his troops, and compels him to become a fugitive, whom Fortune seems to have for ever forsaken, but, in a short time, he is at the head of his troops as active as ever.

Then comes Morocco, who endeavours to exterminate him in some other manner. with no better success. He is now at the head of his troops, who, elated with their late victory, idolize their leader, and follow him, more for the purpose of ravaging Algeria, and preserving their country from the tyranny of invaders, than from any hope of gain.

Wild, ardent, and enthusiastic, taught from their very childhood to admire courage, activity, and perseverance, it is no wonder that they are devoted to Abd-el-Kader, who has proved, beyond a doubt, that he possesses each of those qualities in a great degree. When it is also taken into consideration that he is fighting for their rights—that he is heading them against the enemies of their country and their faith—and, that, no matter what their petty quarrels may be amongst themselves, they are sure to make common cause against a common foe, it is not surprising that Abd-el-Kader himself is accustomed to hardships of every description that he has been living precariously in the desert, the curse of continual defeat oppressing and overwhelming all others, but not him, with a great measure make up for the unperseveringly pursues—living among a people who, if they do not openly avow themselves his friends, help him with supplies and information in private, we are forced to think that it will not be so easy to destroy him as some at present believe.

He is now able to collect about 4,000 men for a short expedition, of whom 300 or 400 horse, and 1200 or 1500 on foot, would be regular troops; it is true that they would not all be disciplined, but a never dying patriotism, and a zeal passed in the endurance of privations and fatigues, which would kill a European in such a climate, will in a great measure make up for the want of discipline Sir Roger de Coverley says, in speaking of one of his ancestors (Sir Hugh de Coverley), "That he was a brave man, and narrowly escaped being killed in the Civil Wars, for he was one of the field on a private message the day before the Battle of Worcester" Abd-el-Kader and his adherents have had a similar escape from utter destruction. A Correspondent of the Times says:—"There has been more commotion in the Palace (St. Cloud) caused by the disaster in Algeria than such an event ought to produce. That the King was deeply affected by it I have already informed you. Upon these martial youths, the Princes, the effect was that of fire communicated to gunpowder. The three at present there (Prince de Joinville, and the Dukes d'Aumale and Montpensier, at about prepared for instant departure to coerce Morocco, and seize upon or destroy Abd el Kader, and his adherent Arabs and Kabyles, and probably to exterminate the race of each. The Duke de Montpensier was, perhaps, the most impatient and ardent of the three, but the King interfered, and positively forbade their departure."

It is fearful to contemplate what the consequences would have been to Abd el Kader had they gone.

There was a singular case brought before Mr Cottingham at the Southwark Police-court one day last week. Lord Gage, a paper hanger, was charged by Mr. Strachey, the landlord of the Sun and Pilot on Bermondsey wall (by the by, it's a very queer place for a sign to be, and he must be a clever pilot who brought it there), with stealing a curious snuff box made out of a deer's hoof; but it seems there is evidence that it was the prisoner's dog who stole the snuff-box; and it was proved that the said dog was very much in the habit of taking, or, more properly speaking, stealing, any little article on which he laid his hand—we beg his pardon—his paw.

In dismissing the case, the magistrate gave some very good advice, which we shall take the liberty of giving to our readers in our own words:—

Little pigs, little pigs,
Why do you steal?
Give it up, give it up,
Or you'll be sent,
Some unfortunate day
—If you go on this way—
You'll be brought up and committed to gaol.

There seems to be a war mania raging at present as strongly and as widely as that of the railway. In Italy, they are up and stirring; in Spain, they are far from being quiet; in Mexico, Otibe and Rosas continue to keep the inhabitants in a state of blessed unhappiness; as a sample of which, we give an extract from a morning paper:—"An English family had recently received into its bosom their only son, who had returned after finishing his education in Europe, and as Rosas had intimated his intention of calling all males of a certain age (between 20 and 50) to take up arms, the youth would have to assist (being born there of English parent)—see Sir Robert Peel's explanation, 4th April), in driving his parents out of the country." In the United States (Illinois) the mob are up against the Mormons, nearly one hundred of whose houses have been burned; and, sick and well, young and old, women and children, all alike, turned out into the woods and prairies, where the fate that awaits them, God only knows!

The Indians on the frontier, the Kickapoos and Camanches, have also the infection, and commenced scalping each other as soon as they met each ever. The Mexicans have had a hard battle with the latter, killing 100 of their men, and taking prisoner the wife of the principal war chief.

The mania has extended to Madagascar, where it has put to the natives, and has been communicated by them to some English and French soldiers who were about the place at the time; we hope that it will not extend amongst the latter, as they may be possessed with a desire to scalp themselves in the places of the natives, and if such were to take place, between the climate, which is most fatal to Europeans, and the natives, who are cruel and faithless, we very much fear that they would "pay too much for their whistle"

At Cadiz ten brigands embarked in a boat, for the purpose of taking an English brig which was lying in the harbour, but it is needless to add that they "caught a tartar"

Two battalions of the 58th Regiment (French), who were at work on the Chiffa road, had three men killed by a coup de-soleil, before they arrived at Bouffarick; this goes far to prove that Algeria is becoming too hot for the French

En fait, that "Poet Bunn" has, for the present, resigned the quill to Rooke, the composer of "Amélie," who is engaged in preparing an opera for "Old Drury." Hungerford Suspension bridge was sold last week for £226,000, yielding a profit of £63 16s. on each share. It is to be hoped, for fair, considering the short period during which it has been open. The speculators begin to fear that the supply of iron will not be sufficient to meet the demand necessary by the multiplicity of railroads about to be formed. If any of our readers feel in want of amusement for a wet day, they will find plenty in the advertising columns of the Times. A few days ago we were informed that "a child of Mr. Watson, dentist, which had been for some days was in want of a commercial gentleman," and, in another part of the same impression, we were likewise informed that "a gentleman, who had been in the habit of drawing ten ivories, wished for a re engagement!" This last beats Ax ley hollow!

Opening of the New Hall, Lincoln's-inn.—It is understood that her Majesty has fixed the 30th instant to open the New Hall, which is now in course of completion, at three o'clock, p.m. The festivity is to be a morning collation, not a dinner or banquet, as originally proposed; and we understand that the guests will consist exclusively of her Majesty's Ministers and immediate attendants. The reason for thus limiting the invitations is the very large number of members of the Inn claiming to be present as of right. The Benchers will receive her Majesty in full professional costume. Lords Brougham and Campbell (both Benchers) are expected to be present

M. Thiers.—Last Saturday, this eminent individual, accompanied by Admiral Tilers, proceeded to the British Museum, for the purpose of viewing the magnificent collection of that establishment. He was received by Sir Henry Ellis, the librarian; Sir F. Madden, Mr. Hawkins, &c., who conducted him through the library, the antiquarian-room, the Chinese-room, and the various other departments, and who explained the history of the most important subjects in the Museum It being a day which was not open to the public, every facility was thus afforded for viewing the entire establishment, at which M. Thiers expressed himself much gratified. He also visited the National Gallery. M. Thiers inspected Woolwich dockyard on Monday morning, and was accompanied by the Hon. H. F. Prittie, private secretary to the Admiralty, with a party of friends of the late Prime Minister of France.

Departure at three o'clock, p.m., and was received by Sir Francis A. Carr, Knt., C.B., and Lady, the captain-general of the forces, and conducted over the factory, boiler-maker, and foundry departments, and over the Gremmes frigate, of 50 guns, the Terrible war-steamer, of 800 horse power, and the Royal Albert, first-rate man-of-war, of 120 guns; and also over every part of this great naval depôt worthy of notice. M Thiers left London on Wednesday for Bowood Park, Wilts, on a visit to the Marquis and Marchioness of Lansdowne, having received a pressing invitation from the noble Marquis. From Bowood, M. Thiers repairs to the Grange, Hampshire, to visit Lord and Lady Ashburton

General Francis Slater Benson.—This venerable general officer (formerly of the 1st Life Guards, expired on Tuesday (last week) at his seat in Essex, in his 76th year. The deceased General had seen much service in the army, having assisted in the reduction of Martinique, St. Lucia, and Guadaloupe, in 1794, and at the taking of the last mentioned town he was severely wounded in both legs. In 1812 he took part in the campaign under the Duke of Wellington in the Peninsula

ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL, CALCUTTA.

This magnificent Christian Temple is now in course of erection; and, when completed, it will form a splendid ornament to "the City of Palaces." The first stone was laid October 8th, 1839; the architect is Colonel Forbes, of the Engineers.

The style of architecture is Gothic, or, as Mr. Britton terms it, Christian, modified by circumstances, that is, Indo Gothic, or Indo Christian, if such words may be allo ed.

The extreme length of the building, including the buttresses, will be 247 feet, and its width 81, and at the Transepts 114. The height of the Tower and Spire, from the ground will be 201 feet, and of the walls to the top of the battlements 59 feet. The East and West Windows will be 41 feet high by 14 wide; the others, which will go round the building at intervals of eleven feet, and open to the floor for the fullest admission of air, 33 feet 3 by 4 feet 6 inches

The roof will be flat, or rather, a flat curve, as generally prevails in Calcutta, and, indeed, almost universally throughout the East, in European buildings. A pitched roof would have required for its support double rows of enormous columns in the body of the Church, which would both have obstructed the full ventilation of air which is indispensable in this climate, and have greatly lessened the interior space and the facility of hearing. The north and south Transepts will be on either side the Lantern of the tower, and will extend sixteen feet and a half beyond the body of the Church. The Pinnacles of the Tower will rise 76 feet 3 inches above the roof of the building, and the Spire 98 feet 10 inches above the Tower. Thus much of the general circumstances.

The internal dimensions and the distribution of the parts of the Building will be as follows:—the western carriage Verandah will be 61 feet by 31 feet 5 inches, and is 16 feet high; over which will be the Library, of the same length and width. The Nave, which is carried to so great an extent in the old Cathedrals at home, is omitted at present, but there is a Western Vestibule, 61 feet by 22 feet 5 inches, with side doors, in which will be the entrance to the Library and Tower. The Lantern will be open on its four sides by lofty arches 43 feet 9 inches high, by 14 wide, and will have eight windows, 17 feet 3 inches, and by 3 feet each, at a height of about 82 feet, to illumine it from above. The Lantern will be 27 feet square, and above the roof 35 feet 6 inches. The Transepts, north and south, will be 44 feet by 28, and will serve, during the hours of divine service, the one for a Vestry, the other for a grand side Entrance.

The internal dimensions of the main body of the Cathedral will be 137 feet in length by 81, spanned by an iron-trussed roof, adorned with Gothic tracery; the height 47 feet.

The body of the Cathedral, if fully pewed, will accommodate at least 900 persons; and if galleries should be added hereafter, and chairs be occasionally placed in the aisles, as is done in all our Calcutta churches on the great festivals, 1300 or 1400. The Transepts, also, Lantern, and Western Verandah, should they ever be wanted for separate congregations of Catechumens or Sunday Schools, would furnish above 400 additional seats. The capacity of the Cathedral will not be less, therefore, than for 1,700 persons. But the arrangement of the sittings will be ruled by circumstances, and the convenience of the congregation; as all the stalls, pulpits, reading desks, pews, and benches, are intended to be moveable.

Coolness will particularly be consulted. The freest possible circulation of air, and the full effect of the Punkahs (for these as well as Venetians to the windows are indispensable in Bengal), will be provided for by the extraordinary height of the roof, by the thickness of the walls and buttresses, by the absence of galleries and clustered columns, by the darkening of the windows with deep-painted glass, by shielding the grand western entrance with a wall and verandah, by the raising of the floor four and a half feet above the ground, and by creating currents of air between the lower divisions of the windows of the sacred edifice and the Lantern. On the whole, the Bishop hopes it will be the coolest church in India, if such language can be applied to any edifice in such a climate.

We subjoin from a letter from the Lord Bishop of Calcutta, dated Suez, May 5, 1845, the following very interesting details:

"I landed at Calcutta on Sunday evening, April 26, and had begged the Venerable Archdeacon and Colonel Forbes, my incompatable engineer and architect, with my Cathedral Secretary, C. E. Robinson, Esq., to meet me at the Ghaut. Other friends joined, and we drove to the Cathedra. before I went to my own Palace. I entered the sacred edifice, after an absence of more than one year and a half, and in a week after my landing, with considerable pleasure and solemnity of mind. When our party reached the middle of the Choir, I paused and offered up, with a loud voice, my thanksgivings to Almighty God, for permitting me to live to proceed thus far, dedicated the place to the glory of Christ, and prayed that it might be filled with thronging converts to sound forth the praises of His redemption. The 'Gloria Patri' was then sung. The scene was overwhelming to me, while all Colonel Forbes took me over the buildings. I was astonished; the effect was so much grander than I had anticipated. I must have forgotten English cathedrals, or our Lantern surpasses in equal many of them. Eighty-three feet high and fourteen square, with eight lancet windows toward the top, for which deeply-stained glass, as well as for the great eastern window, is preparing in London. Our progress could not be

OPENING OF THE GERMAN HOSPITAL, AT DALSTON.

On Wednesday, this excellent Institution for the reception of the German sick poor was opened with due ceremony. The establishment originated at a public meeting held in June last, at which his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge presided. A subscription was then opened, and our advertising columns have borne testimony to the munificent manner in which the wealthy and great have contributed to this noble object. Since then, the Committee have secured the premises shown in our illustration; they are situated in the healthy suburb of Dalston, and consist of a large building, and several acres of gardens and pleasure grounds, which is an excellent provison for the use and recreation of convalescents. Our Illustration shows the garden front.

The day chosen for the inauguration was singularly appropriate—it being the anniversary of the birthday of the King of Prussia.

The ceremony was attended by a large and brilliant assemblage of ladies. Among the noblemen and gentlemen present, there were—Prince George of Cambridge; his Excellency Chevalier Bunsen, Prussian Minister; Rev. William Kuper, D.D., Chaplain of the Royal German Chapel, St. James's, The Lodge, South Lambeth; Rev. C. F. A. Steinkopff, D.D., Minister of the German Lutheran Church, Savoy-street, Strand; A. Bernays, Phil. Dr., Prof. of the German language at King's College; Benjamin Bond Cabbell, Esq., F.R.S.; Rev. Louis Cappel, Phil. Dr, Minister of the St. George's German Lutheran Church, Little Alie-street, Whitechapel; J. C. H. Freund, Esq., M.D.; Frederick Huth, Esq., Treasurer; William Kuper, Esq.; R. M. Philippi, Esq.; C. A. Preiler, Esq., Sub Treasurer; Rev. Adolphus Walbaum, Minister of the German Lutheran Church, Trinity lane, Cheapside, Honorary Secretary; D. H. Wales, Esq.; John Wilson, Esq., M.D.; Rev. Charles Wesley, D.D.; Dr. Sutro; Dr. Steinau.

Soon after one o'clock, the company assembled in the chapel, when the beautiful German hymn, "Nun danket alle Gott," with its celebrated air, both two hundred years old, was sung by a choir of German boys and girls, and accompanied by the Chevalier Neukomm, on a sweet and powerful melian of the fabric of Mr. Meyer; the Rev. Dr. Kuper, Chaplain of the Royal German Chapel, St. James's, engaged in prayer, then read the 41st Psalm, and part of the 29th chapter of the First Book of Chronicles; after which he delivered an address, all in German. Another stanza of the hymn was then sung; after which the Rev. Dr. Steinkopff, Minister of the German Lutheran Church, Savoy-street, Strand, delivered another address to the people in German, and then pronounced a benediction. The concluding stanza of the hymn was then sung, accompanied as before, after which the company retired to one of the ward-rooms, where the English part of the ceremony commenced.

Chevalier Bunsen then addressed his Royal Highness Prince George (the President), stating the objects of the Charity to be, first, to give relief in case of illness to as many as possible of their own poor and indigent countrymen, of whom there were no less than 30,000 to 35,000, industrious in their habits, and unexceptionable as to their general conduct, living in this metropolis; and, secondly, to offer a limited number of rooms with somewhat superior accommodations to such as were able to pay for their maintenance, and yet did not possess homes where they could obtain the comforts they required in periods of illness. They were promised the assistance of the first members of the profession, both in the medical and surgical departments of the London hospitals; and, finally, they would have the good fortune to receive further assistance in each of these departments from German practitioners, who were either here or had professed their willingness to come without any salary. (Hear, hear.) With respect to nurses, he had received positive assurance that before six months had elapsed, they should be able to introduce, for the first time in England, three "Deaconnesses," or Protestant Sisters of Charity, from the establishment at Kaiserwerth, near Wesendorf—an institution the fame of which had already spread through Germany, Switzerland, and Holland, and many parts of France. These Deaconnesses were trained nurses, who had devoted their lives to the care and attendance of sick persons, and who performed all the labours and services for which the Roman Catholic Sisters of Charity were so justly praised in many countries. He was enabled to say the institution would be opened on Thursday, to all who spoke the German tongue, without distinction as to religion or creeds, from Switzerland to the banks of the Rhine, and from the banks of the Rhine again to the Baltic and the North Sea. (Hear, hear.) It would be open in the freest possible manner to all visitors every part of the day, and would at all times afford assistance to the full extent of its resources. His Excellency, in conclusion, adverted to the benefit this institution would receive from the presidency of his Royal Highness's venerable parent, and thanked his Royal Highness for his attendance on that occasion. The above, however, is but an outline of Chevalier Bunsen's judicious and feeling address, which was loudly applauded by the company.

His Royal Highness Prince George then replied as follows:—Chevalier Bunsen, in my own name, and, I am sure, in the name of many I now see around me, I beg leave to say one or two words in answer to the very able speech you have given of the arrangements of this establishment. In the first place, it gives me very great pleasure to be here on this occasion, however unworthy I may feel myself; for I am ashamed to say I am not farther connected with the hospital than through my father, but I trust ere long to be so. (Applause). As the Duke is unable, very much to his own regret, to be present on this occasion, I have great pleasure in taking his place. As far as the establishment is concerned, I think it is extremely creditable to the committee to observe the manner in which they have forwarded the work, considering especially the short time in which it has been done. Though the work is more especially connected with Germany, still, from what I know of the Christian and charitable feelings of my countrymen, I am sure that Englishmen will do all that lies in their power to assist in forwarding an undertaking so desirable. I trust that this hospital may flourish, and may succeed in its benevolent design of affording comfort and relief to those who are in distress. I have great pleasure in assuring you, and I am sure I shall be seconded by those around me, when I say that we shall always feel a deep interest in the hospital, and we hope that it may meet with every success. (Great applause).

The Prince then accompanied the Chevalier Bunsen through the wards of the establishment; and having walked some time in the grounds, left the hospital. The general company separated soon afterwards.

THE GERMAN HOSPITAL AND GROUNDS.

RAILWAY MANIA.

WRITTEN AND ILLUSTRATED BY ALFRED CROWQUILL.

RAILWAY Speculation has become the sole object of the world—cupidity is aroused, and roguery shields itself under its name, as a more safe and rapid way of gaining its ends. Abroad, as well as at home, has it proved the rallying point of all rascality—the honest man is carried away by the current and becomes absorbed in the vortex—the timid, the quiet, the moral, and he who "has no speculation in his eyes," are at last, after some slight hesitation, caught in the circle of the whirlpool as it expands, and they follow in the giddy whirl with as much excitement as those whom they have watched with pity and derision.

"Why not I as well as my neighbour?" says the baker, "it is the most rapid way of making one's bread."

"It's nothing but a joint concern," says the butcher, "luck's luck; "every man takes his chance; what's one man's meat is another's poison—I shall have a cut of the carcase."

"I hope it will last," says the shoemaker, "for what boots it sticking to trade when your sole chance is the railroad."

"Friend," says the Quaker, "I will go partners with thee, for thou hast laid thy lines in pleasant places."

The Duchess of nineteen quarterings, with her friend the Countess, blush as they put their delicate hands to the horrid documents, so like a bit of trade, but congratulate themselves that "finis coronat opus."

"Lord! Marm," says the washer-woman, "have you heard how Mrs. T. made £500, Ma'am, by railways, in ten days, Ma'am; that is a short way of getting up things, indeed: and everything 's got clean by steam, and ironing the road flat for miles and miles. They must take care they don't get in the suds, for I heerd 'em say that these quick things very often go too fast and blow up their coppers."

Thus from mouth to mouth goes the cry, gathering strength from each new reporter, that all begin to think themselves actually culpable for allowing prudence to button up their pockets, which, in keeping fast what they have got, decidedly keeps out what they have not.

The thought once entertained, becomes powerful and irritating; the patient puts on a decidedly calculating look; caution keeps shaking his head, but avarice paints a picture at which the infected one smiles, and crams his hands up to his elbows into his breeches pockets. Wonderful philosophers must these Stock Exchange chaps be, thinks he, making a £10 note into twenty in a twinkling, pop it into your fist, make a bow, and say thank ye, sir, as if they were much obliged to you. I wonder how it's done. I'm hanged if I shouldn't like to go and have a peep. Accordingly he does. His heart beats high as he walks down the famed Bartholomew-lane, to the entrance of the court which gapes with wide and long jaws at its particular old chum and money-lender, the Bank, opposite, which, with equally open mouth, appears to invite you in to fill your pockets at your pleasure. Charming association! How the astonished speculator longs to go into the temple forbidden to the uninitiated, in hopes that, like at a glass blower's, he may see the brokers at work, making their more expensive bubbles; and, with a power only known to themselves, turning shillings into sovereigns, merely by hallooing at each other, and putting down immense cabilistic sums in very minute memorandum books. He passes up the court through a very motley mob of men, who look very like the people who stand at large tavern doors for the sake of the smell and the broken victuals. They do, I believe, stand there to catch what they can, and bear a strong resemblance to the high priests of the interior, as to the books, the pencil-cases, and the noise, but like the outsides, at a stationer's, they are rather ragged at the edges, and slightly dirtied, and have no particular office or particular client, but live in the excitement and the hope that the turn of the market may be a chop and some half-and-half in their favour.

The aforesaid innocent speculator pushes open the swinging doors, which are just as quick to catch you as any animate body inside; here e is disappointed; he gets no view of the interior, but is arrested by a man in livery, who (the place being very far from like a church is not called a beadle, but being a sort of half-and-half breed they call him porter) puts his finger upon him with an impressive look and says, who? that the rash intruder does not exactly know; before he can answer he s pushed on one side by eager inquirer for Timson Janson, Bobstooth, or Snobs—or the porter shouts their names down a tin serpent that twines thro' the walls of the temple. Yells meet frightful instantly arise; the foregoing names roll and scream, above, below, and around, they are at it! hear that hubbub! that awful growl! those laughs! what can they have to laugh at? Perhaps it is settling day, and Mammons fling the defaulters—the perspiration stands upon the listener's brow, who repents as he thinks of trusting his stock in such a chaos, and like the man who determines to have his tooth out, but when close to the door of the operator makes up his mind to keep it in. Yet he is irresolute to go or stay, when a rush of brokers of the liveliest order (with burst crowns to their hats, or pens stuck in the back of their collars), showing the vigour of the struggle inside, lift him out of the vestibute, and leave him with his hat over his eyes on the foot pavement.

He walks away, but the money burns in his pocket. Railway plates meet him at every turn. He runs against a young gentleman, with his eye to a little telescope, looking at a thing with alarmingly long legs; and, getting out of his way, bolts up against another, holding a long rule upright, apparently doing nothing: what are they about? Why preparing "the Anti-Omnibus Railway;" for people will no longer be content to come fifty miles an hour by Rail, and arrive at a terminus, enter an omnibus, and consume another hour in getting four miles to their homes: nothing under shooting them into their own doorways, with railroad speed, up to the very scrapers, will be tolerated. He walks, if he is a countryman especially, into a Burton Ale or Stout House, just to moisten his parched mouth, takes up the newspaper, which is crammed with Railway advertisements—one, particularly, which must prove highly productive, called the General Terminus Railway—where, from one rotunda you may, by different doors, go at once to any part of the Globe! In vain he struggles against the many-armed Demon; he finds a broker, who takes his directions and his money, and lays him gently on the red-hot gridiron of Speculation.

Who is that Young Gentleman, in that dog-cart, with his loose white coat, clubbed oily hair, and fast trotting pony? What is that hat, which rolls about, even with his elbow! Oh! I see, it has a mite of a boy in it, his tiger. How he bowls along, with a knowing chuck of his elbow at the long-stage coachmen and omnibus drivers: where can he be going so fast? To the City. Impossible! He is. He is a young Stock-jobber—Railway made. A few months back he walked to town in shoes and dirty cotton stockings, with a hack knife, and his dinner in an old newspaper, in the crown of his hat. He wrote from his employer's office for shares—why shouldn't he? He had nothing to lose—which is the finest thing to begin speculating with in the world. He now has his offices—banker—cottage out of town—and thinks the National Debt a trifle.

The Moor wakens up from his trance and hopes to clutch some more gold to imprison in his iron coffers, so tempting is the bait, that he even unties the hard knot of avarice from around the mouths of the money bags, and drops piece by piece into the vortex with a fierce agony of hope.

Feeble old age, trembling with eagerness, holds out its withered hands for a share of the golden shower, with an unhallowed desire for a piece more of the world which it is leaving.

The pleasant country town and the peaceful village are no longer free from these money fevers—the Railway is coming! Shares must be up, the Line is so fine, so much wanted. Out comes the Farmer's canvass bag—the shepherd's savings—the young lady's card-purse—all must write for Shares, their little pleasant circles become scattered, the simplicity of retirement flies, and the railway whistle scares the cattle from the pastures, and pride and vanity pop up and down with every train; last year's fashions become no longer bearable or tolerated, they can go to London in no time and be back to tea, a journey that took their grandmother, if they ever thought of a thing so rash as going, two or three days.

The little village shopkeepers are next to feel the change—all that the careful house-keepers want they have from London, it is so much better and so much cheaper, until the hitherto prosperous tradesman in small way closes his shutters and is seen no more.

The Railway, in fact, is the ultima linde of all classes. The peer looks out to become the Chairman or ruler, that he may carry it through his waste land and furze bushes, that compensation may portion the junior branches of his Right Honourable Family; and a lump of shares may patch some little indiscretionary hole in his rent-roll. The Squire takes it up, that, as fox hunting is somewhat cut up, he may pop some of his young cubs into good cover, as clerks, overlookers, and station inattentives, who lounge away their time at some magnificent station, and manage never to be in the way when they are wanted, either as a reference, or in cases of accident. Tradesmen leave their shops to the care of their assistants, that they may watch for contracts, and, neglecting the little things that made the fortunes of their forefathers, grasp at great ones—for now has arrived the time for lottery fortunes to be made, when immense sums are to be realised from the maniac state of the public mind, and the boldest get the greatest share, leaving the timid only regrets and the union workhouse. The poor man—agriculturist or otherwise—sneers at the paltry stipend he has hitherto gained, leaves his wife and family, with his spade on his shoulder, to seek the El Dorado of the Rail, and to gain one pound, thirty shillings, or more, being three times the sum he ever expected to be the recipient of. Well, he joins an army of debauched ruffians, who soon teach him to become one of themselves: the comfort of his home is lost in the migratory life of a Railroad man, and he turns a low sot, and his high wages were worse than nothing, and few and far between are the driblets that conscience wrings from him for his absent family, who are left, to starve at home, or to the tender mercies of the Union.

Politics are no more—the patriot's voice is hushed—Railways sops are flying about, and they must be all gobbled up before they can attend to business. That great and influential body called senators no longer attends to the petty affairs of Army, Navy, Corn-laws, &c., but allows itself to be cut up by the Railway shares into small lots, as Railway Committees, &c. &c., in which capacity much fatigue must be endured, in keeping their worthy constituents in the dark as to their proceedings, and endeavours to do the best for themselves. Of the great stirrers up of this Railway cauldron, who keep it on the move, that it may not burn, and of their workings, in our next—Earnest in Jest.

MR. MACREADY, AS HAMLET, AT THE PRINCESS' THEATRE.

THE THEATRES.

PRINCESS'.

On Monday evening Mr. Macready appeared, for the first time, at this theatre. Long before the time appointed for opening the doors, a vast crowd had collected at each of the different entrances, and the mass accumulated to such a degree, that, at half-past six, it became evident not above two-thirds of the multitude would be able to find room. A terrific rush took place when the doors opened, and the house was quite full a few minutes afterwards. Not only was every inch of standing room occupied, but many resolutely took up their position in places from which it was impossible to get the slightest glimpse of the stage; whilst, it was said, as many went away, as there were others packed almost to suffocation in the theatre. The effect of this on the other theatres was very remarkable: those who were disappointed in obtaining entrance at the Princess', having determined upon making a play-going night of it, directly posted off to the Haymarket, Adelphi, and Lyceum, and we were told that a sudden influx of visitors was observable at all these houses about a quarter past seven.

The tragedy of "Hamlet" was chosen for the occasion, and the earlier scenes passed almost in dumb show, the restless and crowded masses in the pit and galleries rivalling, with their noise, the clamour of "Boxing-night." But the appearance of Mr. Macready was the signal for one of the most extraordinary bursts of excitement we ever witnessed. The whole house rose, cheering and huzzaing with an enthusiasm that appeared perfectly frantic. Hats and handkerchiefs were waving in all directions, and roars of welcome succeeded one another with such unflagging heartiness, that we began to think, at one time, the chance of silence ever being restored was somewhat remote. At length, however, the tumult subsided, and the play was permitted to proceed.

It is almost a work of supererogation to enter into a criticism of Mr. Macready's performance of Hamlet, so very frequently as it has been noticed in all quarters. We may, however, say that his reading of this very difficult part is the most effective we can imagine—melo-dramatic, it is true, but marked with the highest degree of intelligence, the interpretation of the philosophical character evincing throughout the mind of the scholar, the gentleman, and the accomplished actor The finest points were educed in the most masterly manner, so as to render the various shades of temperament intelligible to all; albeit, this was accomplished by the most delicate touches. The deep interest Mr Macready excited by his powerful delineation of this most indefinable and mysterious creation of Shakspeare was the best proof of its excellence. The mere dramatic action of the play was almost lost sight of in the wrapt attention with which the commentings of the chief character were listened to.

We do not recollect ever to have seen Mr. Macready play with such fire and effect as on Monday evening: and he must have been rewarded by observing how every point was made to tell with the audience; the applause being throughout hearty and general, at the same time discriminating and properly bestowed. He was very fairly supported by the other characters, although few of them rose above average respectability. The best acting, to our thinking, was that of Messrs. Compton and Osberry as the Gravediggers. This was admirable; and the abolition of several conventional pieces of business connected with the parts made their assumption still more praiseworthy. Mrs. Ternan played the Queen judiciously, evidencing the experienced actress. Miss Emma Stanley is a very clever young lady in vaudeville, but the character of Ophelia is a little beyond her grasp. The tragedy has been placed upon the stage with great care. All the appliances are in excellent taste; and one scene in particular—that of the Castle Platform by Moonlight—painted by Mr. W. Beverley, is eminently beautiful.

On Wednesday, Mr. Macready appeared as King Lear, supported by Mrs. Stirling as Cordelia, Mr. Wallack as Edgar, and Miss Marshall, a clever debutante as well as actress, as the Fool: the text of Shakspeare being followed. The house was scarcely less full than on Monday evening, and the performances went off with the same acclamations. The engagement of Mr. Macready appears to be the most promising speculation yet entered into by the manager. We hear his salary is fifty pounds per night: and, from a rough estimate formed on Monday evening, we think there must have been over three hundred pounds in the house.

A new farce is announced, called "Jack o' Both Sides," as well as a new drama, in which Mr. Wallack will sustain the principal character. Mr. Edward Loder's opera of "Giselle," and the ballet "Le Diable à Quatre," are also in active preparation.

LYCEUM.

A piece was produced at this house, on Monday evening, called "The Last of the Bravoes," being, if we mistake not, an adaptation of an idea from, rather than a translation of, a French vaudeville, called "La Fils d'un Bravo." The humour of the plot turns upon the dilemmas into which Giacopo Ruspantino (Mr. Keeley) is perpetually getting, from the circumstance of his being the son of the celebrated Venetian bravo of the same name. He is residing at Venice: and whilst he can never go out of doors without being escorted and beset by the public, on account of his fraternal descent, he is always being visited at home by jealous senators and dissipated nobles, who want some enemy removed or some love intrigue carried on, for which they all pay him handsomely. This position gives rise to some very entertaining situations.—The prettiest bonne that in which two senators, Andrea Montelcone (Mr. Frank Mathews), and Antonio Spondin (Mr. F Vining), rivals for the affections of Giacopo (whose name Mr. Arden), engage him in turns to kill the other Giacopo locks them both up at his house, in separate rooms, and at last allows them to peep at each other through two openings in the doors. The scene arising from this is exceedingly laughable. We do not, however, think the piece likely to attain very great popularity. The consciousness of the audience as to what was going on caused throughout a destroyed interest and induced ennui: the introduction of action as recorded the two senators, in the dilemmas in which they were constantly involved, was somewhat tedious. It is, however, but just to say that the applause was very general, especially when Keeley hoped he should never hear the "last of the bravoes" of his audience.

To burlesque of "Aladdin," which ran some sixty or seventy nights last year, was revived on the same evening with the same gorgeous splendour, all the scenery and dresses being entirely new. Miss Georgina Hodson played the Princess, originally sustained by Miss Woolgar. The young lady does not improve. With the advantages of a pretty face, and an agreeable person and voice, there is an utter absence of intelligence, which, as we have remarked upon former occasions, is fatal to burlesque jokes and allusions. Every point fell still-born from her lips. The Aladdin of Mrs. Keeley is one from which we can furnish quotations from us. Her consummate acting made every line tell, and she looked as if she had stepped out of one of the cases at the Hyde-park Collection.

SURREY.

There are some very extraordinary little people now performing at this house, whose exercises will well repay a visit. They are called "The Lilliputian Lauri Family," and are described in the bills as "the only successful rivals to the Ruleys." In some of their feats of agility, we think they go beyond them: their evolutions, groupings, and transformations, it certainly do beat we have ever seen—of the kind. After their performance, a new three-act drama was produced, called "Ecarté; or, the Salons of Paris." It is a version of the novel of the same name which came out a few years ago, and obtained some popularity. The present piece contains all the elements requisite for the success of Surrey drama, and was well acted throughout—the principal parts being sustained by Mr. Henry Hamilton and Mrs. H. Vining.

Monsieur Pièce and his family, the French artistes on the light rope, will appear next Monday; and engagements are said to be pending with one or two very popular performers. Mr. Edward Stirling, the active manager, is about to dramatise Mr. Albert Smith's romance of "The Marchioness of Brinvilliers," from Bentley's Miscellany, for this theatre.

An exhibition called the ALETHORAMA has been opened at the Princess' Concert Room. It is a very ingenious mechanical representation of living objects, but not altogether novel, being constructed on the same plan as the Rifle Tableaux on Lorsbrack, whom our readers may remember to have watched, riding, every half minute, across the window in Leicester-square.

SKETCHES OF IRELAND.

NEWPORT-MAYO

Newport Mayo, in the county Mayo, is situated on a little river that empties itself into Clew Bay, on the western coast of Ireland. It is the property of Sir Richard O'Donell, the nominal owner of eighty thousand statute acres of land, but, unhappily, like many Irish lords of large sound, but of little value, owing to long leases, mountain waste, and bog land. He resides at Newport, and this little town is an evidence of what a good resident landlord may be. If Ireland had all such, a very different state of things would be the result. As late as 1839 it was a wretched place, and had previously been a mere collection of hovels: now it has a good and comfortable inn, a bridge and brewhouse, a fine quay, nursery and Lancasterian excellent free school, and a good sign of prosperity in trading vessels and warehouses. A cheerful, lively, improved, and improving place, well adapted for shipping trade, and especially situated on both. It is well sheltered by hills and trees, and is close upon the bay, although hidden from the sea by the turn of the stream and the high rocks. Nothing can be more beautiful than Clew Bay, with its myriad islands, and grand coast scenery; the mountain Croagh Patrick, and the Island of Clare, being among its more important features.

For the fisher Newport affords attractions. In the Lake of Burrishoole, in its immediate vicinity, it is common enough to take half a dozen salmon and a score or two of large trout in a day. Indeed, to the tourist and occasional resident, Newport has many inducements, and, like the whole land, its attractions to the sportsman and angler are abundant, and both may pursue their pleasure without hindrance, the sole stipulation being that they shall reside at the inn, which is the most respectable and most comfortable to be met with in the district. A few miles hence is Westport, at larger, but less pleasantly situated seaport, the ride to which is agreeable. Around this district are the haunts and caverns of the hardiest fighting race of Ireland, but full of interest and character to the curious inquirer—the people, most primitive in manners and customs; civilisation has hardly interfered with this district, where few roads, and those of recent formation, but ordinary carriages

The ride from Newport to the island of Achill, round the heights upon Clew Bay, passing the Castle of Carrick a-Hooley, once the residence of the famous Grace O'Malley, or Grana Uaile (a sort of pirate chieftainess, who owned the islands of Clew Bay, and the sovereignty of this part of the country), is as grand as any in the way of coast scenery could possibly be. The myriad of islands that dot the bay (between 50 and 60 in number) add greatly to the beauty of the scene. From Runown a splendid panorama of the entire scene is obtained; and a day the loveliest the world can produce, deur, is scarcely to be equalled. We say a fine day, for rain in Ireland falls so heavily, that nothing can be seen at a half mile distance in a good soaking shower, and these are few and far between. It is also a very uncommon thing to be in the midst of sunshine and fair weather, and to find it suddenly obscured, "clouded up," the rain to fall in torrents, against which umbrellas offer no defence. And after the whole country is hidden from view for an hour or more, the clouds will as suddenly break up, roll over the mountains, like a curtain withdrawn, and the sun beams forth with a brilliancy upon the wet grass and trees, that gutter in its beauties with a clear green unseen elsewhere, and which, indeed, justly entitles the country to the name of the "Emerald Isle."

THE MARKETS.

(ublished this week.)—During the present week the arrivals of Eng. ish wheat somewhat have been moderately good—viz., 5649 quarters, but by land carriage and sample very little has come fresh to hand. The stands to-day being fairly filled, and the accounts from the north representing the progress of the harvest more favourable, the demand for all sorts of tions of wheat of home pro ance was dull, and Monday's quotations were with difficulty supported. In free foreign wheat, very little business was transacted, at unaltered terms. The little new barley here has gone off on mu the same terms. We continue to have a fair retail demand for the best Scotch and Irish oats, with choice. The new oat is not good, yet the demand was steady, at full prices. Beans, peas, and flour, as last quoted.

Provisions. For all kinds of Irish and foreign butter we have to notice a heavy demand, at a decline of from 2s to 3s per cwt. Bacon, Dutch, 52s to 58s per cwt. Smithfield (Friday).—The supply of beasts on sale here to-day being rather limited, and the attendance of buyers somewhat numerous, the best trade ruled firm, and Monday's quotations were supported in every instance. There were on sale about 2,200 oxen, 60 sheep, and 4 calves, per steamers from Holland. Although the numbers of sheep were as small, the inquiry for them was in a sluggish state, at barely steady prices. In calves, a fair average amount of business was transacted, and some superior breeds realised as per cwt. The next trade will take place at our quotations. Mr. cow moved off slowly, at from 2l. to 2l 10s each.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WE-

The English Market displayed some improvement at the commencement of the week. Consols quoting 89¾, sellers, firm. The extraordinary pressure for money, arising from the settlement of the Shares in the Account, during the same day as the English and Foreign Accounts, caused a depression of about ¼ per Cent. in prices on Wednesday; this decline was added to on Thursday, by the announcement of the Bank Directors, that the rate of the Discount would be increased from 2½ to 3 per cent. Consols immediately declined about ¼ per cent. upon the previous day's price, but have since partially rallied. Bank Stock has fluctuated, and closes rather heavily. Exchequer Bills are also worse. The closing prices for money are Bank Stock, 86½; Three per Cent. Reduced, 86¾; Three per Cent Consols Annuities, 86¾; New Three per Cents, a Quarter per Cent., 79; Long Annuities, Jan 1856, 10¼; 28 years, Oct. 10, 1885, 10⅜; India Stock [illegible], South Sea Old Annuities, 96¼; Consols for Account, 96⅜; Exchequer Bills £1000, 14s, 8s pm.; Ditto, £500, 8s pm.

The Foreign House has been scarcely attended, although the settlement took place on Tuesday. It was a very unimportant affair, and, consequently, passed off without much difficulty. The principal fluctuations have been in Brazilian, which was done, on Monday, at 86¼, but receded to 85, and, the following day, to 84, at which price it closes. Columbian improved, on Monday, to 18, and, on the following day, to 18¼, but receded, on Monday, stood at 61, and was a trifle flatter on the following day, quoting now, nominally. 60. Spanish Securities have not varied more than a turn, and close at 16, 17, the close of the week, but 16 is wanted for the Active, and a Half per Cents. are 6⅝; Four per Cent. Certificates, 94, Equador, 42, and Mexican, 22¾, for the Actives; Deferred, 15¾

The assigned cause of the Discount made by the Directors of the Bank of England, on the rate of discount, is, "to put a time check" upon the present Railway Speculation. If this be true, a more harmless demonstration could scarcely be devised, to effect that purpose. Persons in the Stock Exchange and Discount houses will not give more than 2½ "for the call," the only result therefore, that can arise from the measure, is, that instead of going to the Bank of England for the money, they will go to the Railway deposit. Anything more ominous, therefore, cannot be conceived. The last state of the Railway market towards the close of the week, has been affected by the above cause. Nothing, however, can be further from the fact. A settling like the present is an affair that requires a week to complete, and all parties are prepared for it, until after its close. Hence, prices have not materially varied, except in a few instance. Eastern Counties have been done as high as 21. Mr. Hudson having announced the Chairmanship of the Board of which he is a member on Thursday. Blackwall also quote an advance from the understanding that it will be offered terms to join the Eastern Counties in connecting the Northern traffic proposed to be thrown on the line with the East end of London and South bank of the Thames. Nothing has and Boston have advanced considerably upon the confirmation of Mr. Hudson having joined the direction. The Essex and Suffolk Railway have received an increase to their Board, two of the Directors of the rival line having withdrawn for the purpose of joining it. The Great North and South Wales Company are in treaty with the South Wales Company. The scheme has been welcomed cordially by the local parties affected. Wainfleet-haven and Lincoln Railway is progressing favourably, a great probability existing that the Government will make it a harbour of refuge. Prices were firm at the close, quoting as follows—Aberdeen, 6½; Birmingham and Gloucester, 127; Birmingham and Oxford Junction, 53; Boston, Stamford, and Birmingham, 12; Bristol and Exeter, 94; Ditto New, 12 pm; Caledonian, 14½; Ditto Extension, 5½; Cambridge and Lincoln, 6¾, Cambridge and Oxford, 2; Chester and Manchester, 12 p; Cheltenham and [illegible] 6d, 5; Dublin and Drogheda, 2; Direct Gloucester (Rennie's), 4; Ditto (Sandwich's), 7¼; Direct Northern, 3½; Eastern Counties, 23⅜; Ditto New, 1; East Lincolnshire, 5½; East and West of England, 13; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 8; Edinburgh and Dalkeith, 5; Gloucester, Aberystwith, and Central of Wales, 3½; Grand Union, Great Eastern and Western, 33; Great Southern and Western (Ireland), 23¾; Ditto Extension, 16; Great North of England, 127; Ditto Extension, 94; Ditto New, 12 pm; Caledonian, 14½; Ditto Extension, 5½; Cambridge and Lincoln, 6¾, Cambridge and Oxford, 2; Chester and Manchester, 12 p; Cheltenham and [illegible] 6d, 5; Direct Gloucester (Rennie's), 4; Ditto (Sandwich's), 7¼; Direct Northern, 3½; Eastern Counties, 23⅜; Ditto New, 1; East Lincolnshire, 5½; East and West of England, 13; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 8; Edinburgh and Dalkeith, 5; Gloucester, Aberystwith, and Central of Wales, 3½; Grand Union, Great Eastern and Western, 33; Great Southern and Western (Ireland), 23¾; Ditto Extension, 16; Great North of England, 127; Ditto Extension, 94; Ditto New, 12 pm; Hull and Selby, 104; Irish North Midland, 12; Lancaster and Carlisle, 1; Leicester and Birmingham, 5 pm.; Leicester and Bedford, 2¼ pm; Leicester and Tamworth, 2½; Lords Extension, 1½; Lowestoft, Beccles, and Lowestoft, and Newcastle Junction, 6¾; London and Birmingham, 218; Ditto Quarters, 26; Ditto Extension, 23; London and Blackwall, 11¼; Ditto New 3; London and Brighton, 50; London, Chatham, and Dover, 8; London and Croydon, Cheltenham, Oxford, Gloucester, and Hereford, 12; London and Greenwich, 16; London and South Western, 7 Ditto New Consolidated, 3; London and Birmingham, 5 pm.

STATUE OF THE LATE MARQUIS WELLESLEY—BY WEEKES

STUPENDOUS BRIDGE AT ST. PETERSBURG.

The Neva, at St. Petersburg, is crossed by three bridges of boats, which are removed whenever danger is apprehended from the ice, both at the beginning of winter and in the spring. For some years past, attempts have been made to supersede one of these aboriginal contrivances by the erection of a fixed bridge; but the work was beset with so many engineering difficulties, that the project has only of late promised realisation. Pérronnet, the celebrated French engineer, submitted a design for such a bridge to the Empress Catherine. Sir Isambard Brunel, about twenty years ago, projected a tunnel under the Neva. There have likewise been designs for bridges of metal and granite piers; bridges of suspension with moveable centres; and other designs too numerous to mention.

At length, in 1843, the Emperor of Russia approved of the project of a fixed bridge across the Neva, with cast-iron arches and granite piles; designed by an ingenious Russian, Colonel Kerbedz. The works were, accordingly, commenced in 1843; and, by the winter of 1845, all the piles were driven.

The new bridge will be situated below Isaac's Bridge, not far from the spot where the old canal of Krukow empties itself into the Neva: it will thus afford communication with the most important portion of the city. It will be a truly magnificent work; for such is the elevation of the middle arch, that large vessels may pass under it in full sail. It is expected that this superb bridge will be completed and opened in the year 1847. Its entire length will be nearly 1,100 feet.

STATUE OF THE LATE MARQUIS WELLESLEY.

"This cleverly-executed marble Statue, from the chisel of Mr. Weekes, the successor to Chantrey, was included in the last Exhibition of the Royal Academy. It was a commission from the Honourable East India Company; and it has lately been removed to the East India House, in Leadenhall-street, where it will occupy a prominent position, as a memorial of their high sense of the Marquis's brilliant Administration in India, and which, too, has been productive of lasting good. An outline of his Lordship's Governor-Generalship will be found in the first volume of our journal.

Of his Lordship's six or seven years' service in India, it has been well observed, that, "without adopting all the exaggerated eulogies of the panegyrists of the Marquis Wellesley, his policy was, in the circumstances of our Eastern Empire, the wisest and most just that could have been adopted. His Government marks the commencement of a better æra of English rule in India."

DEATH OF MRS. FRY.

We are sorry to learn that the excellent and philanthropic lady, Mrs. Fry, who for so many years devoted her time and her purse to ameliorate the miseries of the inmates of our various prisons, died on Tuesday last, after a protracted illness. Her whole life was one continued course of active exer tion, which has been attended with many beneficial results. She gav e much attention to the condition of female convicts and prisoners, at a time when our prison discipline and management were many degrees worse than they are now. Her efforts secured her the respect of all Christians, and acquired for her name European reputation. About two years ago Mrs. Fry was seized with a pulmonary complaint, but the proximate cause of her death was paralysis. It will be recollected that when the King of Prussia recently visited this country, his Majesty paid great attention to her, and visited her at her residence at Dagenham, in Essex. The whole of Mrs Fry's family and the leading members of the Society of Friends were present at a public breakfast upon the occasion.

Mrs. Fry was the sister of Mr. Gurney, the principal partner in the firm of Overend, Gurney, and Co. She was the third daughter of Mr. John Gurney, of Earlham Hall, Norfolk, and was in her sixty-sixth year. Her father, though a member of the Society of Friends, was by no means strict, and suffered his children to enjoy greater freedom than is usually permitted among individuals of that sect. It was in 1800 that she married Mr. Fry, whose estimable character fully justified the choice.

THE "CLOUD IN THE WEST."

The "uses of adversity" are as well known to politicians and statesmen as to philosophers, and, by the former, are much more frequently applied to a practical purpose.

In a time of public calamity or danger, a ruler can resort to measures which, in a period of calm or tolerable prosperity, he would not dare to attempt. The extraordinary crisis must be met by extraordinary means; they succeed; but things do not invariably return to the state in which they were before; the Dictators of old did not always lay down their power with the return of peace; half of our taxes were invented and imposed to carry on the great Continental war, and we are still paying them, after thirty years of tranquillity. Political dangers and necessities make things possible—even easy—that seemed out of all probability should ever come to pass: the Duke of Wellington passed the Catholic Emancipation Bill, he said, to escape a "civil war." Sir Robert Peel drew a deplorable picture of the finances and credit of the country, and obtained the Income-tax for three years: it is found one of the best instruments for conveying the earnings of the people into the Exchequer, so it is continued for another term, and, in all human likelihood, our grand-children will pay it, as we are paying it now. The Duke pointed out a public danger to be enabled to pass a measure that would have been rejected in a period of security. Sir Robert alleged public necessity to obtain a tax, that, without such a plea, he would have asked for in vain. Both statesmen understood and applied the "uses" of a crisis of political "adversity." The same application is now about to be made of another public calamity, which threatens us, though its effects are not yet visible. The general impression of the deficiency of the harvest, the failure of the potatoe crop throughout Europe and America—extending, unhappily, to Ireland, where it is the staple food of the bulk of the people—will be made the imperious necessity for giving a heavy, if not a final, blow to the Corn and Provision Laws, which were imposed at the risk of exciting a rebellion, were passed amid riots in the Metropolis, and have never been popular at any period of their existence. Repeatedly altered and amended, they never seem to have answered any of their ostensible purposes. They have not benefitted the farmer, for the agricultural interest is the very one that has most frequently suffered from embarrassment and distress, as the records of Parliament abundantly prove; they have not made us independent of Foreign supply, for they have more than once been suspended during actual times of scarcity by Orders in Council; and, whether they have been of any real advantage to the owners of land themselves, by whose influence they were passed, is a question open to great controversy. They have been strongly attacked, and not strongly defended; they are not in the catalogue of party measures; their continuance or their change has always been a commercial problem that involved no religious or political principle; they have been supported by Liberals and denounced by Tories, so that the opinions of public men, upon other questions, give no clue to their probable conduct upon this. For some years the number of the adversaries of the system has been increasing; among them may be counted now, all the Leaders of the Opposition; and from much that has also of late years been visible enough, it may be doubted if the Head of the Ministry will be found a very firm defender of it. It was long ago said of these Laws, that they could be tolerated quietly as long as they were, from the circumstances of the country, totally inoperative; but, in periods of scarcity—to say nothing of absolute famine—their existence would be perilled. Such a period seems at hand; and already rumours are rife that an Order in Council will suspend the Corn Laws for a limited time, and permit the importation of grain into the Kingdom, duty free; this, joined with the "foregone conclusions," contained in the speeches of Capt. Rous, Mr. Sotheron, and other Members of the Legislature, and the Address of Lord Ashley to his constituents, have created a deep and universal impression that the days of the Corn Laws are numbered, and that, in the words of Sir R. Peel, "the principles that have been gradually applied to other branches of industry" are about to be applied to Agriculture.

The Premier once alluded to a "cloud in the West," in a manner of which he was frequently reminded on subsequent occasions. But, a disputed boundary or an unpeopled tract, sinks into utter insignificance compared with another "cloud in the West," he has to encounter in the impending famine in Ireland. The "great difficulty" is increased to an incalculable amount: political discontent will be deepened by physical destitution. Without trade, without resources, without employment, and the great article of food, the staff of life, failing—the worst and saddest results are but too likely to be produced. A Statesman, too, who is charged with such an immense responsibility, must provide for the worst possible. Political disaffection can be curbed; the days of political rebellions have passed away; the systematic "agitation" that has succeeded the reign of violence, keeps for its own efficacy within the Law, and produces its effects but slowly by means of registries, elections, and other means that require time. But famine has no laws, no arguments, cannot be curbed by force or cajoled by conciliation; it needs no leader, for all suffer alike; it is desperate, as are all struggles for life and death, and its wild ravings can only be pacified by one remedy—food. Some step, then, in anticipation of the pending calamity, must be taken; and thus we hear of a contemplated suspension of the Corn Laws. Already, too, the consequences of this movement are appearing in alleged differences in the Cabinet; the Premier is the man of the hour, meeting exigency by expedient, and not disposed on any question to make himself a martyr to consistency. He has abandoned old principles when they became impracticable in things involving far deeper responsibilities than a question of taxation, import and export, and which, after all, though great in appearance, can be brought down to the level of a Custom House regulation. But some of his colleagues are less impressionable, less easily convinced of the necessity for a step in a new direction, more tenacious of their old opinions and policy. If the suspension of the Corn Laws is to be followed up, on the meeting of Parliament, by any extensive modification of them, as all men seem convinced will be the case, the Premier will need all the support he can derive from the necessity of the case; the "uses of adversity" will be again exemplified, and the "cloud in the West" will be pointed at with an effect nobody can withstand. The temporary suspension will not be much opposed; but, in any discussion on the general question, it will be used as an argument against the whole system. It will, moreover, be an act of the Cabinet for which the whole Cabinet is responsible, and the resignation of Lord Stanley, on account of the step, does not seem anticipated. But he may not be as willing to join in a course of legislation which would change the law altogether—though the author and advocate of the Canada Corn Bill is by no means incapable of making a compromise on the subject. The same may be said of the great landed Peers; they cannot help the suspension of the law, for a temporary object, but they would strongly oppose an alteration in the law itself. However, wider differences than this have been got over, and rougher opposition than the Premier will have to encounter on this question, smoothed down. For the present, the suspension of the import duties, by the Order in Council, is enough to occupy attention. It is up to to the present moment a measure of precaution, rather than necessity, induced, no doubt, by the similar step taken by the Dutch, Belgian, and Russian Governments. They have suspended the collection of all duties on the importation of grain; in Russia the vessels freighted with it are exempted even from the usual port dues. It is obvious, that if England kept up her present high scale of duties, while other countries were suspending theirs, all import here would cease; grain would go to the untaxed market; nay, the grain now in bond here might be taken out and re-shipped for re-exportation.

With the present population of England, the conflicting, but, on the whole, unfavourable, reports of the harvest, and, above all, the failure of the potato crop—the withdrawal of the foreign supply—would throw us wholly and entirely on ourselves—a step which, though its wisdom is often praised in argument, no men placed at the head of affairs have ever liked to carry out in practice. The risk would be too great, and Peel is now only doing what Canning did in 1826. But the Corn Laws will no bear now the shock of these suspensions so well as they di twenty years ago. If in a time of plenty they are not wan no imputation at a profit being possible, and if in a period t dearth they are neutralised by an act of the Executive, the keyn, a duty being imprudent, those affected by them will perhaps begi to ask, of what use are they at all? The present state of the C tis not, too, will give the agriculturists of England a clearer idea the productive powers of other countries. They are by no mea the inexhaustible sources of supply they have been represent H land imports at all times; Belgium has a dense population t feed her whole can spare any for others; and Russia—even Tam boff itself—is now importing. The farmers of England have bee induced to believe that all the produce of grain-growing countri could be brought into competition with them, while it is only the superfluity of which we can avail ourselves. This is not too muc for us to hold at command, over and above our own supply, when we consider our limited surface, our uncertain and ungenial cli mate, and, above all, our enormous and yearly increasing p opulation. If we learn from our present difficulties our real strength and that of our neighbours, the people, too, may have made some "use" of their "adversity," and the "cloud in the West" will no have passed away without leaving some portion of wisdom to com pensate for the suffering it brought with it—great part of which human means, we trust, will be found for alleviating.

ERUPTION OF MOUNT HECLA

A few weeks since, intelligence was received that the largest of the Orkney Isles was, during a violent storm from the north-west, on the night of the 2d ult., covered with fine ashes, resembling ground pumice stone; and that it was thought they had been driven by the wind from Mount Hecla in Iceland, as similar appearances had been observed from a great eruption some years ago. We now learn, that, on the same or the following night the crew of a vessel, bound to Copenhagen from Reikjavik, observed, whilst about eighteen English miles from and, volcanic flames on the southern coast of Iceland. According to letters which have been received at Co penhagen, an earthquake occurred on the previous day in the west, north and east portions of Iceland. A few days after the first shock arrived, anot appears that Hecla, after reposing seventy three years, has again burst forth. In the night of the 1st of September, a frightful subterran an groaning filled the inhabitants around with terror. The groaning continued till the 2nd, when the mountain burst in two places with a horrible crash, and vomited masses of fire. In former times these explosions came from the summit, where Hecla has no crater; but this time, but the same torrent of lava flowed down two gorges on the flanks of the mountain.—Letters from Reikjavik of the 13th state that up to that day no great damage had been done to the Sysels of Rangervalla and Arnes, situated nearest to the moun tain, inasmuch as the openings whence the ignited masses issue are fortu nately on the north and north west sides, and consequently took that direc tion, in which there is neither a habitation or a human being. Besides, the wind has constantly blown from the south and south west, has driven the ashes and dust towards the opposite points. From the close of the smoke and vapour the top of the volcano could not be seen. The sheep on the heaths were driven down to the plains but not till several of them were burnt. The waters of the mouths bring down new the eruption become so hot that the fish were killed, and it was impossible for any one to ford them even on horseback. Although the lava and ashes took a northern direction, the erup tion was not known on that side of the island till after the 10th; and even as late as the 15th the people at the Sysels of Mula in the north east were ignorant of it. In the western parts, the noise accompanying the eruption was distinctly heard, like the rolling of distant thunder. Nothing was heard at Reikjavik."

Hecla is in the southern part of Iceland. It is neither the most elevated nor the most picturesque of the Icelandic mountains, but it has become famous by the tremendous eruptions of twenty three of which are upon record since the year 1004; but this statement is far from complete. Hecla has now been quiet for more than seventy years, and remained tranquil more than seventy years before the last eruption in 1772. Its summit is divided into three peaks, the middle of which is the highest. The craters form vast hollows in the sides of these peaks, which are mostly filled with snow. The mountain consists mostly of lava, forming ridges and ridges, which are very variified wall, like glazed brick, seventy feet high, around its base. When Sir George Mackenzie ascended Hecla, in 1810 the vapour of water was so copious at from the middle peak, that the thermometer was not to be trusted; but that a thermometer placed an one the ridge rose to 144 deg. Mr Barrow, on his visit to Iceland, in 1834 did not ascend Hecla, which he compares to the projects "three forked" Parnassus. The people in the neighbourhood, it seems, attempt to ascend every one from ascending. It is stated that a French doctor, in 1670 was assured that it was the practice to the Icelandi regi on, and that the devil was always in attendance to punish the sacrilegious those who had fallen in attempting. Sir Joseph Banks was told that the mountain was guarded by strange black birds, resembling crows, having beaks of iron with which they would tear to pieces any human being that should enter upon their territory. Sir Joseph found the mountain surrounded for two leagues with cinders, pumice stone, cinders, and ashes. On reaching the sun out, the cold was extremely severe, and the party had their clothes so covered with ice in such a manner that, to use his own expression, "our clothes resembled buckram." The surrounding country was formerly in habited a most close to the mountain, and what to have been gardens, is now beautiful and fertile, but the successive irruptions of lava have subombed the farms, and the verdant meadows have been almost entirely covered with sand and pumice. In the last eruption, the shower of ashes, &c., was carried by the wind, and fell like rain on the Ferroe islands, 300 miles distant.

The Geyser Springs are in the neighbourhood of Hecla. "On entering the plain" says Mr. Barrow, "we were at once in the midst of enormous steam, rising above an around us and of boiling springs of boggs and heated mud at every step we took. The ground seemed to be shaking and trembling under our feet, and below we could hear a sort of murmuring or rumbling noise, not unlike that of distant thunder."

The eruptions of Hecla become inferesting in connexion with the Phenomena of the Geysers. Mr Barrow rightly considers steam as the prime cause of these extraordinary eruptions of hot water. "The spectator is everywhere surrounded with steam, he sees it—he hears it—he feels it, and he smells it, impregnated with a small portion of sulphur. We know of no projectile force if the elasticity of steam to be much increased by the direct flame, the smoothness, and the form of the cavity in which, but, if it be acted upon the fire is that produces all the steam and boiling water, no one will be hardy enough to assign a local habitation to that element which Sir Humphry Davy has called "an unerring fire to the labyrinths of the earth." The first operative cause which heaves up mountains—clouds them to vomit forth red hot lava—rends open deep chasms in the surface of the earth, and supplies the fountains of the Geysers with boiling water and steam? A question may be raised, whether the same fire that supplies heat for the Geysers, melts the streams of lava that flows from Hecla? The tranquility of Hecla is against such a presumption.

The height of Hecla is variously stated. Sir Joseph Banks calculated it, by a Ramsden's barometer, to be 5000 feet. Subsequent observations give the altitude at something less than 4800 feet; but the measurement made by Sir John Stanley gave only 4300 feet. Nevertheless, it is stated, in the Penny Cyclopædia, at 52.0 feet.

ATTEMPTED SUICIDE.—On Friday night (last week) Mr. Coxhead, well known on the theatrical world, and who, it is said has lost £15 000 in theatrical speculations, went into a bath-dresser's shop in Kennington, where after he was shaved, he inflicted a dreadful gash across the throat. Surgical assistance was instantly provided, and as soon as the necessary remedies were applied the unfortunate gentleman was conveyed in a cab to his residence in a very helpless state.

FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE SHEFFIELD AND ROTHERHAM RAILWAY.—On Sunday night last, about ten o'clock, after the mail train had arrived at the Sheffield station, the engine was detached, and after going about the length of a coach, was driven on to another line of rails preparatory to being attached to one of the mineral trains. At that time a man, named Matthew Jessop, a platelayer, for the purpose of ascertaining the character of the line in that direction, to Rotherham, was engaged in shunting several carriages, and among these was one heavily laden with iron. It was a part of the man's duty to do this work; but he was employed that evening to supply the place of another man who was ill. For the purpose of shunting the carriages towards the Sheffield station, he had to take a long chain on to the centre hook of the last carriage, and when the engine was attached to the tender when was going in the same direction down another line. He placed his back against the carriages, for the purpose of unhooking the chain, when the engine was backed, he inferred from the character of the noise it was to take, found that he had placed himself out of the line of the hook nearest to the direction of rails which the engine was going down upon. The consequence was that the chain was drawn in a direct line across the poor man's breast, and was dragged along till the stopping of the engine relaxed the bent of the chain. He then fell, and was immediately afterwards found in a sitting position. On being spoken to, he merely said he should be better if he could cough, and died in about three minutes afterwards.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PARIS AND

(From our own Correspondent.) PARIS Wednesday.

The subject that engrosses all conversation is the late defeat suffered by Abdel-Kader in Algiers. The great talent of both the Emperor and his General has raised the name of the former to a height that has excited the military ardour of all Europe. Comparisons are made between the new of the British force in India, and here in Mauritania and of the Duke of Isabella in Algiers. With one party, Marshal Bugeaud is compared to Washington; with another to Napoleon. The entente cordiale is of course the name of a state of feeling which had your Correspondent remarked in the year 1840 it would have called forth the Times and Globe articles, which are now in the habit of running down the French with a spirit worthy the days of the Crusades. But the demonstrations there are not the spirit of humanity and civilisation which the movements are here displayed, to seek a comparison between the Emperor of Morocco and his enthusiastic followers. The result will be, that the spirit of the Koran will fall before the deadly influence of chivalry, and they fall before the sword of the Infidel, as they have already fallen before their bows in the great honour of reading the soldiers' names inscribed on tablets, and their officers defiled by some spouter of blank verse on a provincial platform.

The race of the Duke of Aumale is still in great force here; scarcely a day passes but new wonders are advertised, and received for. I do not allude to the political Duc d'Aumale, which are rife in the richest palaces and chambers out of the real Dunsmanse, who vend their pots, powders, and potions. One of the most celebrated of the quacks rejoices in the cognomen of Jean Wagl ire Cadet: he is tall and meagre as he Knight of La Mancha, and is voice is of that peculiar timbre that belongs to the Scotch style of conversation; his complexion is allied to the mummy of old Egypt, and his whole person and genius. Pinter has M. Morgue declared him fit for the practice of his forbidden art; and, but a few days since, the author repeated their terrors on the still dreaded. The scene sent to the court was the day's dinner, and never was I more amused by a party table personne than on the present occasion. I give you but a faint outline of the dialogue.

The President:—"You fabricate a certain powder?"—"I do not fabricate; I invent from my ancestors, who were profound alchemists, a high-purified medicine, the powers of which each of them essayed on their own erudite and skilful bodies."

"But you sell them?"—"I sell to the rich, but I distribute to the poor."

"You have placed in our hands a paper, in which you speak of the wonderful cures you have made"—"I can furnish you with fifty cures proved by sundry evidences. They comprise the incurables that have been pronounced past recovery, and have been by the medical faculty. Could I refuse succour to the poor? Have I not assisted by my

THE RAILWAY PROGRESS.

Abergavenny, Nottingham, and Boston — The Abergavenny, Nottingham, and Boston Company have determined to extend their line from Grantham to Sleaford, and surveys for it commence have been commenced.

A New Railway Department at the Stock Exchange. The new system of the Stock Exchange, decided upon for the establishment of a department for the registration of late business affecting railway shares, English and foreign. Circulars are to be addressed to the different companies, requesting a transcript of the reports, tables of calls, &c., and weekly returns of traffic belonging to each undertaking. A sub-committee of quarters is also sent to be filled up. Kentish Lines. The rage for railroad making does not appear to have reached us yet. In the course of fourteen days, 79 new shares have been brought out to the public, the aggregate amount of which is £31 850,000. The county of Kent is interested with lines from all quarters. Four lines of Canterbury are before the public, and I am told that the neighbouring town and no bounds. That many will fail to the ground there can be no doubt, but others, exhibiting a decided public benefit, will obtain their adoption, will, in all probability, receive the sanction of the Legislature.

Peterborough and Nottingham Junction — A very numerous meeting of the proprietors and occupiers of land was held at Stamford's Head, Stamford, on Monday, for the purpose of considering the advantages which the projected line of railway from Peterborough to Nottingham was calculated to afford to the town. The meeting, being numerously attended, was very spirited, and unanimously passing a series of resolutions approving of and pledging their support to the Nottingham, Stamford, and Peterborough line, and the Sutton-bridge, Stamford-Leicester, and Nottingham junction line.

Railways in the City — Within the last few weeks several new schemes for joining together, and giving a City terminus to the railways which enter London on the north side of the river, have come before the public. The proposition of the Brighton Company to buy the Fleet-market for a terminus, and of the Direct Manchester Company to buy the Fleet-prison, is likewise engaging attention. The general-street extension is also proposed by the South-Eastern line, and an infinite number of other projects for the same purpose. All this clearly proves that the subject is really becoming an important one, and that I will engage the serious attention of the Government.

Railway Streets. — The question of adding Railway viaducts to street traffic so as to improve instead of destroy the property they possess, and diminish the cost of their construction by the removal of new building from the line. The proposition is to receive, it is conceived, a practical solution in the experiment about to be tried on a great scale by the Thames Embankment and Railway Junction Company. The object of this company (projected by the Duke of Buccleuch) is to form a line of communication with the railways entering the metropolis from the east and west, and to connect them, by a Railway bridge, with the lines approaching the Thames from the north and south. It is intended to form the new line of Mount and Blackfriars-bridge a level street, nearly a mile and straight as Oxford-street, with a Railway viaduct for atmospheric carriages in the middle, constructed with cast-iron girders, supported by columns along the side pavements, parallel to those of the Quadrant. The new street, which will give a frontage to Doctors' Commons, and open a view of St. Paul's from the south, will, in one line with the embankment line, if carried out as intended, form one of the most noble streets of the metropolis. The chief City station will be immediately at the back of the Mansion-house of William-facing Lombard-street, but it is intended to have a station for goods a little further to the north, near Broadway, in Blackfriars.

Herks and Hants. — In line which is to connect the Great Western and South Western Railways together has been laid out, under the superintendence of the Company's engineer, Mr. Bidder. It is said that it will be completed in nine months.

Sheffield and Manchester. — The work upon this line of railway are, for the present, suspended, and the rails laid; the tunnel, however, remains unfinished, but nearly 2000 workmen are engaged fixing the mass ary

Deal and Dover. This line proposes to complete the chain of coast communication, and to avoid the engineering difficulties of the Gentle Hill, at Dover. It is to throw a belt of railway communication round the entire coast, reduce the distance by about two miles between its proposed terminal, and complete the military road by uniting even the most naval arsenals.

Regent's Canal — A meeting of the proprietors, householders, and occupiers, along the canal was held on Thursday, at the Vestry Room, for the purpose of petitioning against the construction of a Railway. Mr. Cumbert was in the chair, and the meeting was addressed by Messrs Sadley, Greenhaugh, Dudley, Denton, Lee, Norwood, Yeates, Calcutt, Macardle, and others. Resolutions strongly condemnatory of the proposed Railway were passed, and an amendment to appoint a deputation to wait on the Directors, was lost, only six or eight voting in favour of it, the room being filled up in favour of it.

Bedfordshire Lines — The most extensive part of the county of Bedford is likely to partake largely in the benefit of Railway communication. There are no less than six Railways contemplated, to pass in the town of Bedford, or within a very inconsiderable distance from it, and Dunstable. Of course, some arrangement must be made between them, as it is absurd to suppose that four Railways should exist a few miles from each other.

London Atmospheric Line — On Monday there was a special exhibition of the working of the atmospheric line of the London and Croydon Company. At nine precisely, two trains, the one for the Croydon and the other for London, were arriving at the Dartmouth Arms, the point at which the atmospheric line commences, in seven minutes and a half past two, the train for London started from the Dartmouth Arms in the direction of the station at Croydon at the rate of nine miles an hour, and pro ceeded at a rapid rate. With a momentary stop of 12 miles an hour was attained in the second minute, 18 miles an hour in the third minute, 25 miles in the fourth minute, and 30 miles in the fifth minute, and from the sixth minute it reached its maximum speed, which was about 32 miles an hour, at which it continued till it decline d speed, on approaching the Croydon terminus. The whole distance, about eight miles, was performed in about eight minutes. The train was heavier than on the first experiment, consisting of three carriages, which with passengers, exceeded fifty tons. The last train on the piston carriage indicated a pressure of eleven inches of mercury. The stopping party, having inspected the machinery, left Croydon at a minute and a half before three. At forty seconds before three the piston entered the tube, perfectly fitting it to the Dartmouth Arms in the same manner as at the Croydon passage at the New Cross Station. The stoppage was made in four minutes, for the efficiency of the "breaks" intended to be used on the line. On leaving the Dartmouth Arms, the line drove was again attached to the tube, and the party were once more safely launched in London. The travelling was constantly during the great part of the journey, but at times it le to considerable speed, perfectly frightful. On their return, one of the party occupied first class carriages. The movement of the train was scarcely felt; it formed a strong contrast with the o cillation when it was experienced after leaving the atmospheric line. Another experimental trip took place on this line on Tuesday. The highest speed attained was nine mile in sixty two seconds, being a fraction over forty-eight miles an hour. The ordinary on the third-class carriages was not so favourable as on the previous day. It is understood that the line will be opened to the public next week.

London and York — The directors have issued the usual legal notices of their intention to present a petition to the ensuing session of the House of Commons in the next session of Parliament, for the introduction into that house of a London and York Railway Bill, to enable it in every respect as the said London and York Railway Bill when it was read a third time and passed by the House of Commons last year.

Direct Northern. — The promoters of the line here named, it is said, also propose to go to Parliament, as they have altered their line so as to avoid Chesterfield.

Electric Telegraph. — The Electric Telegraph is being laid down on the London and Dover railway.

Southwark Bridge and North Kent Railway — This bridge has been erected by the Bridge Company (Vignoles' me) subject to their assent, and the consent of the projectors. The sums are £200,000, or a toll of £12 000 per annum. The payment not yet decided upon. The bridge is to be 42 feet wide, and 1,000 feet in length. The number and the tile machine value of a 4/6 share, until lately, was £3. The bridge was surveyed by the Thames Embankment and Railway Council, a company, we believe, to the same object, by Messrs Rennie and Rendel, engineers, more than £150 000 on the ground that a new rival way-bridge could be built for nearly that sum that would have to be spent in the re-construction of Southwark bridge to adapt it for railway traffic, without closing the bridge for a public month.

Miscellaneous Railway News Among late items of Railway intelligence, it may be mentioned that the London and Brighton have applied to Parliament for power to construct a railway from Croydon to Epsom, and to purchase the Croydon and Epsom Railway Bill, the same

NEW FOREIGN BAGGAGE WAREHOUSE, ST. KATHERINE'S DOCKS.

The St. Katherine's Dock Company was the first to provide accommodation, in front of the Dock premises, for landing and embarking passengers, without using the diminutive London wherries previously employed for these purposes. This increase of the public convenience was planned by Sir John Hall, the indefatigable Secretary of the St. Katherine's Company, who, on April 9, 1830, had the gratification of seeing his improvement consummated, by the embarkation of 400 passengers in the Harlequin steam-packet, for an excursion to the Nore. This occasioned a complete revolution in the affairs of steam-packet companies; the accommodation thus afforded to passengers was highly and justly commended in the public journals of the day; and the managers of companies found themselves unable to resist the demand for similar accommodation at other stations.—(Cruden's History of Gravesend and the Port of London.)

The improved system commenced by the St. Katherine's Company, or rather by their Secretary, has been ably followed up, in the erection of the New Foreign Baggage Warehouse, represented in our Engravings; the object of which is to obviate the numerous complaints which have been made of the want of facilities for the landing, examination, and delivery, of the luggage of passengers, to or from the Continent; as well as the landing of foreign cattle, fruit, and other imports. The wharf will also afford convenience for despatching the baggage of a large number of passengers, in the event of several steam-vessels arriving together, which is by no means a rare occurrence; and, by this means, several vessels may be cleared in less time than has hitherto been occupied in the case of a single arrival, and but few passengers. These improvements have the entire sanction and concurrence of the Honourable the Commissioners of Customs, who have, it is known, evinced great solicitude on the subject.

The contractors for the new premises were Messrs. I'Anson and Co., the respectable builders, of Marylebone; and, extensive as is the pile, the works did not occupy more than six weeks; although they included the raising, en masse, of the roof of the original building, in length about 120 feet. The interior arrangement consists of a suite of rooms, four in number, which are approached by capacious and easy staircases. The apartments are a large General Waiting-Room, with a separate one for the use of ladies; both being in direct communication with the New Baggage Warehouse. This room, which is the principal one, contains three separate "loopholes," or "scuttles," each of which is furnished with the necessary appliances for the expeditious housing of luggage; it has also a monstre counter, about 120 feet long, furnishing ample room for as many as six landing-waiters, if required, for the examination of baggage. Adjoining is the floor appropriated to the delivery of examined baggage, and to such deposit of it as may suit the convenience of passengers. The whole is well warmed and ventilated, and brilliantly lit with gas.

We congratulate Continental travellers, and the owners of the numerous steam-vessels engaged in foreign traffic, on this important addition to their accommodation; and we wish the spirited proprietors of the wharf that share of public patronage which they obviously merit.

FINE ARTS.

A Chart of Anglican Church Ornament. By F. Bedford, Jun. Weale.

The study of ecclesiastical ornament, apart from its sacred associations, possesses high secular interest, inasmuch as it involves the consideration of many nice estimates of the progress and data of ancient art. To assist this study is the object of the artist in producing the Chart before us; which, however, is a far more pictorial production than the title would lead the reader to suspect. It aims at systematizing the various emblems by which our pious forefathers sought to personify or typify the men and means through whom and by which our Redemption has been wrought out.

The "Chart," or characteristic delineation, is admirably lithographed, to the size of 15 by 11 inches. The framework is a border, somewhat in the style of German illustration, rich in floral ornament, and bearing medallic portraits of the great English antiquaries and chroniclers—Camden, Dugdale, Speed, and Stowe. Within this frame are portrayed, whole-length, the Holy Evangelists, Apostles, and other Saints commemorated by the Church, with their distinguishing emblems: the figures are somewhat small, but remarkably spirited and characteristic. Beneath these are Examples of Stained and Painted Glass, arranged according to date; showing the distinguishing character of each succeeding period of the art in England and elsewhere, by which the age of Painted Glass may, with tolerable accuracy, be ascertained. These Examples are brilliantly coloured. Thus, we have the elaborate Norman, or twelfth century, crowded with figures, radiant with ruby and blue, and many-tinted border-work. To this succeeds the Early English, or thirteenth century, wherein the figures are superseded by elaborate geometrical forms, bright bands, and panel portraits of Kings and Saints. Then comes the Decorated, or fourteenth century, with its florid architectural picturesqueness, and leafy border; and, lastly, the Perpendicular, or fifteenth century, in which the architectural beauty of the period is finely carried out, and, with the story of a Saint, shows the advance made in the art. Here Mr. Bedford's Examples terminate; for, with the sixteenth century, the simple beauty of the Designs is almost lost, and the Colours are far inferior to those of the earlier works.

We trust that amidst the present revival of church ornament the art of glass-painting will receive the attention of scientific principles which would soon tend to dissipate the notion that the present artists [illegible] Mr John Martin, if not a glass painter, maintains that we can even surpass the ancients "in a much higher pitch than the ancients sought in one particular colour (ruby), and we come very near to that. We can blend the colours, and produce the effects of light and shadow, which [illegible] by harmonizing and mixing the colours in such a manner, and fixing by properly enamelling and burnishing them, that they shall afterwards become just as permanent as those of the ancients, with the additional advantage of throwing in superior art. Under patronage, and with the advance of chemistry, we could achieve the above triumphs; but the past will blind us to the advantages which we possess in our own times."—(Evidence before Parliament.)

To return to Mr. Bedford's "Chart:" the lowermost portion is occupied with the emblems of the Passion of Our Lord; also, of the Trinity, and of the Evangelists; sacred monograms, &c. There are likewise notes on other symbols and ornaments used in churches. The whole sheet is admirably arranged and executed, and the artist is much to be commended for his taste and skill. The effect is judiciously heightened by working on a tint. The whole costs but three or four shillings, and it merits a place in the library of the divine, the architect, and the lover of artistical ornament. We have seen, from the same hand, a sheet of specimens of the architecture of York Minster, beautifully drawn on stone. There is nothing like this instant and direct education of the eye.

LUTHER AND MELANCTHON.

In our paper of October 4, we mentioned the purchase of two interesting residences—the one of Luther, the other of Melancthon (alias Dr. Schwartz—or, in plain English, Dr. Black)—the great leaders of the Reformation. The King of Prussia is about to convert them into schools; and a Correspondent has obligingly forwarded the annexed views of these interesting memorials, which were procured in Wittenberg. The town is familiar to us as the location of one of the oldest Universities in Germany, and is a large place, of 8,500 inhabitants, about thirty miles from Berlin, on the railroad between that capital and Leipsig. The church in which Luther is buried is at one end of the town, and his dwelling at the other. Melancthon lived in the centre of the principal street. The inscription on Luther's grave, cut on a simple bronze tablet, is as follows:—

Martini Lutheri S., Theologiæ Doctoris Corpus hoc loco sepultum est qui an Christi MDXLVI., XII. Cal Martii Eyslebii in Patria.
S. M. O. C. V.
Annos LXIII., M. II., D. X.

The two lines are put for

Suam mortem obiit cum vixisset.
Sixty-three years, two months, ten days.

MELANCTHON'S HOUSE, AT WITTENBERG.

The grave of Melancthon and inscription is almost the same, varying only in the dates. He died the Calends of May, MD.4XXIII. "in hâc urbe. C.V. Ann. LXIII., M. II., D. II."

It is curious they should have both lived to nearly the same age, there being only eight days difference. The grave of a Dr. Schneifer is between them. His epitaph records him as "totius orbis literati decus immortale." In little places little men often occupy the public eye more than the world's best men.

Luther resided in the Augustine Convent. The annexed is an exact copy of his room. The ceiling and sides are painted in flower-work. In the seat, by the window, the guide relates that Luther and his wife used to sit. The basil relievi on the stove are representations of the four Evangelists. The room is in a dilapidated state, and propped up by bearers along the centre. Over the door which leads to the Bedroom and Lecture-room of the Professor, Peter the Great inscribed his name. In the Lecture-room, are preserved Luther's Throne, or Professor's Chair, and various relics—such as embroidery by his wife and the cup he is said to have broken when, on one occasion, the aforesaid lady did not please him.

LUTHER'S HOUSE, AT WITTENBERG.

On the house of Melancthon the inscription is, "Here lived, and taught, and died Melancthon."

The Brazilian Slaver "Echo".—This vessel, on board which the murderous conflict took place with the crew of the Felicidade, is now in Ilfracombe harbour. She was sold at Sierra Leone, after condemnation as a prize, and now sails under the British flag; she is named the Elizabeth, in her new register. The Elizabeth (Echo) left Sierra Leone about three weeks after the Eclair.

Shipwreck of the "Mary" from Sydney.—By the arrival at Liverpool of the Bucephalus, Captain Small, from Bombay, we learn the total loss of the above vessel, and seventeen of her unfortunate passengers, women and children. The Mary left Sydney, N.S.W. on the 19th May, and all went on well until the 24th, when the vessel, about midnight, struck on a reef in Bass's Straits, and immediately went to pieces; the passengers and crew, with the above exceptions, saving themselves with much difficulty, and ultimately reached Flinder's Island in safety, whence they were conveyed to Launceston, New South Wales. Captain Collins, a passenger, has written a long narrative to one of the Sydney papers, in which he deprecates in strong terms the unseaworthy state of the vessel, as it appears she began to leak shortly after leaving Sydney; he also says, that from the striking of the ship to her parting and going down, only seven minutes elasped. We subjoin a list of passengers saved and lost:—Saved. Captain Collins, 13th Light Dragoons; Mrs. Collins, Miss Elizabeth Collins, Miss Emma Collins, Miss Straethallen Collins, Sarah Sarson, Mrs. Newby, Mr. Reeves, Mrs. Reeves, Mrs. Stanbury, Mrs. Evans, Mr. Hefferman, Mrs. Hefferman, Stephen Dwyer, Mr. Thomas Newman, Mr James Abbott, Mr. J. Jones, Mr. Joseph Wilkinson, George Hempson, Patrick Gardiner, and all the crew. Lost: Mrs. Heather and two children, Mrs Grey, Mrs. Turnbull, two daughters of Captain Collins, three daughters of Captain Newby, Sara Fowkes, and six children of Mrs. Evans. The Bucephalus received her report from the Indian, bound from Launceston to London, which vessel she spoke on the 6th instant in lat. 27 N.

OPENING OF "HORN FAIR," AT CHARLTON, IN 1745.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

LEEDS CASTLE, KENT.

Embosomed in one of the richest vallies of the luxuriant County of Kent, (between four and five miles from Maidstone),—its grey towers mirrored in the lucid waters of an encircling lake,—its fair domain dotted with the graceful figures of innumerable deer, and girded by a belt of stately trees, almost coeval with the edifice itself—Leeds Castle offers to the eye of the

ourist a noble specimen of the Feudal Keep, in its most picturesque and least repulsive form. A stone bridge of two arches connects the Castle with the Park, by which means, in belligerent times, the complete isolation of the structure could be easily secured. The Castle itself mainly consists of two venerable gateways, a grand Hall, and a magnificent suite of state apartments. These are ranged round an ample quadrangle; and, being constructed entirely of stone, and exhibiting the architectural features of a variety of epochs, combine to form a grand and imposing tout ensemble

Leolan, Counsellor to Ethelbert II., appears to have been the first founder of the Fortress, circa 978, and from him the Castle and the adjoining village derived their names. In 1119, a Priory of Black Canons, in honour of St. Mary and St. Nicholas, was founded here by Robert de Crepito Corde, or Crevecœur, Knt., the revenues of which, at the period of the Dissolution, were rated at £269 7s. 7d. Old writers concur in representing the Abbey Church to have equalled a Cathedral in magnitude and beauty; while the Monastic buildings, judging from the existing remains, were upon a corresponding scale of grandeur. William of Wykeham and Henry VIII. both contributed to the erection of the present Castle; though, what particular portions of the pile owe their foundation to the munificence of the one, and the architectural skill of the other, we have no means of determining

Part of the building has been modernized; the foundations of the more ancient part rise immediately from the water.

Leeds Castle was the residence, occasionally, of Richard II, and Henry IV.

During the Volunteer mania in 1779, and while the celebrated encampment was formed on Coxheath, George III. and his royal consort and suite were entertained at Leeds Castle with extreme splendour. The present possessor of the Castle and its domains is W. Marten, Esq.

A CORRESPONDENT.

THE NEW HALL AND LIBRARY AT LINCOLN'S INN.

On Thursday next, the magnificent pile of buildings just completed for the Hon. Society of Lincoln's Inn, will be opened by her Majesty, accompanied by his Royal Highness Prince Albert. The Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Wellington, Sir Robert Peel, and other distinguished personages, are expected to be present. The Benchers, who will be robed to escort the Queen over the edifice, will give a splendid breakfast on the occasion. Mr. Simpkinson, the Queen's Counsel, is the present treasurer; and it is rumoured that some mark of honour will be conferred, to commemorate the event.

Next week, we shall present to our readers a series of highly finished Engravings of this handsome addition to our metropolitan architecture; the ceremony of the opening, &c.

The entire structure has been erected from the designs of Mr. Hardwick. The foundation-stone was laid by Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce, April 20th, 1843; and thus, notwithstanding the extent and nature of the works, and the care bestowed upon them, they have been completed within two years and a half. "The other buildings of the inn have very little to recommend them: for, besides that the older ones are so huddled up as to be a confused medley, they are all more or less disfigured by modern additions and alterations, many of them in very barbarous taste; while the new range of buildings erected by Sir Robert Taylor, and called Stone-buildings, is altogether different from the rest; and is, besides, a very insipid specimen of the style it professes. (It has lately been completed by the addition of a pavilion at the south end, corresponding with that at the north, according to Sir R. Taylor's design.) Great inconvenience having been experienced in consequence of the present Dining Hall being used as the Lord Chancellor's Court, and also from its not being sufficiently commodious in itself, the Benchers determined to erect an entirely new and distinct building, comprising not only a Dining Hall upon a much more extensive scale, but a spacious Library, Benchers' Room, Drawing Room, &c. "Such was the origin of the noble structure to be opened on Thursday next. The style adopted is the best Tudor —that of the early part of the sixteenth century, or the reign of Henry VIII., of which we have many fine examples. The exterior is of red brick, chequered with darker-coloured bricks; and the finishings are of fine stone. Architectural effect is extended both by terraces connecting the structure itself with the gardens, and by the adjoining entrance from Lincoln's Inn-fields.

The preparations made for the Royal Visit are of a very superb description. In the Library, which is situated at the north end, and runs transversely to the rest of the plan, a splendid throne will be erected, upon which her Majesty will receive an address from the Hon. Society of Lincoln's Inn. This is a very fine apartment, 80 feet by 40, and 35 feet high; lit by two large end and side windows; in the central one of the latter are gorgeously emblazoned the Royal Arms. The Vestibule connecting the Library with the Great Hall, is chiefly lit by an octagonal lantern of elegant design. But the glory of the pile is the Dining Hall, wherein her Majesty and Prince Albert will partake of a déjeuner, to be served, as in olden time, at the upper or dais end, where the Royal throne and draperies are in excellent taste. The Hall is, indeed, a magnificent apartment, exceeding the present or old Lincoln's Inn Hall as 5 to 5, and being considerably larger than the Middle Temple Hall: it is very lofty, and reminds one, generally, of Crosby Hall, one of the finest examples of its class. It has an open oaken roof, and a louvre, or lantern, which forms, externally, an elegant ornament to the large roof. We shall not, however, trench upon the interest of our forthcoming illustrations, by describing the structure at present; but reserve the architectural details to accompany our account of the Royal Visit on Thursday next.

Among the removals from the old Hall are Hogarth's picture of Paul before Festus, which has been placed high above the dais of the Hall, and the statue of Lord Erskine at the west end of the Library.

IFFLEY CHURCH

This beautiful specimen of Norman and early English architecture, situate at a short distance from Oxford, has lately been restored, by subscription, internally; but the funds raised did not allow of the work being extended to the exterior. Great care has been taken to preserve the architectural character of the interior details—especially in the fine zig-zag moulding. It has an addition to the Chancel of early English, and some inserted windows of decorated and perpendicular date. The Norman portion is remarkably well executed; it has a groined chancel, three fine door-ways, and a handsome west end.

We trust that the interest which has been excited in behalf of the preservation of this venerable monument of the piety of our ancestors will not be allowed to falter; but that the success with which a portion has been restored, will stimulate the lovers of archæology and the public to aid the promoters of the good work in its completion.

IFFLEY CHURCH

The yew-tree shown in our illustration is a denizen of the churchyard, supposed to be coeval with the church itself.

CHARLTON FAIR.

This old-established fair, better known as "Horn Fair," and held adjacent to the park of Sir Thomas Maryon Wilson, of Charlton House, commenced on Saturday last, the festival of St. Luke; and from the Woolwich and Greenwich steam-boats and the adjacent country not less than 15,000 persons attended. The fair was continued on Monday and Tuesday; and the greatest order and regularity are now preserved; though, formerly, impropriety and riots were of such usual occurrence that it passed into a local proverb, "All is fair at Horn Fair."

A fair in our times is but an unpicturesque scene; and our artist has preferred carrying the reader back a century, availing himself of a drawing of that period, in the possession of Sir T. M. Wilson. It was then customary for the Lord of the Manor to open the fair by reading from a scroll a sort of proclamation to the crowd assembled on the green in front of the manor-house, in the manner shown in our illustration. The people then dispersed throughout the green, and the holiday sports began. Some years since, the green was enclosed, and a wall built around the manor house; and the fair was then removed to its present site—a field adjoining the village.

The vulgar tradition of the circumstances under which the grant for holding Horn Fair was obtained from King John need not be repeated. The following details, from a clever "Pictorial Guide to Eltham Palace," are in much better taste —

"The Horn Fair of bygone times we learn to have been a much more extensively celebrated festival. An old newspaper informs us that so late as 1779, it was the custom for a procession, formed of a king, a queen, a miller, &c., to leave some of the old inns in Bishopsgate-street, accompanied by a great concourse of people, all of whom—

> "'In comely sorts their foreheads did adorne,
> With goodly coronets of hardy horne;'

when, after proceeding through Greenwich and across Blackheath to Charlton, they paraded round the church three times. Nicholas Breton's 'Antidote for the Headache,' published in 1612, gives us some rhyming particulars respecting Horn Fair, which would, however, lead us to suppose that this festival had even then fallen in popular estimation. He says—

> "'Long time this solemne custome was observed,
> And Kentish men with others met to feast;
> But latter times are from old fashions swerved,
> And grown repugnant to this good behest;
> For now ungrateful men these meetings scorn,
> And thankelesse prove to Fortune and the horn,
> For onely now is kept a poor goose fair,
> Where none but meaner people do repair.'

"If we are to believe what the local antiquaries have written on the subject, Horn Fair would seem to boast a more reputable origin than that ascribed to it. Philpot states it to have obtained its name from the annual sale of horn drinking cups, spoons, winding-horns, and other articles manufactured of that material. The sign of one of the Charlton inns (the Bugle Horn) bears, perhaps, some allusion to this supposition as to the origin of the fair. Another ingenious conjecture connects it with the sale-like day on which it happens to be held. St. Luke, to whom the church is also dedicated has for his symbol a winged ox; and of the painted glass that before the Protectors adorned the church windows, all that were preserved from the fanatical iconoclasm of the Puritans were a nine small remains of the evangelist's head and shoulders, and fragments of his ox "bearing goodly horns upon his head." These also have been carefully replaced in the upper parts of the present window. A sermon was formerly preached during the fair time, for which the rector received 20s., the bequest of a morris-dancing parson; for, for some reason, however, the sermon is now discontinued upon the festival day.

A Spanish journal notices the existence of a veteran of the army of Spain, who was born in 1731, and consequently is now 114 years of age. He remained in the army till he was promoted to the rank of sergeant, and afterwards received his discharge. In 1815, when 84 years old, he married a young woman of 21. He is said to be still so strong and active, that no one would think him to be more than 70. His only infirmity is total deafness.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON SATURDAY OCTOBER 25 1845

GREAT numbers, acting under one impression, but without concert in any of its extremes. The Railway world are not exempt from this failing; from a readiness to buy anything and everything in the shape of shares, they have flown suddenly to the determination to buy nothing, and the market is stagnant; good schemes and bad are, for the moment, alike valueless, as scarcely any sales can be effected. And very few can render any reason for this sudden change, except the appearance of two or three articles in a leading paper, violent and alarming enough, certainly, but containing nothing that should have thus deprived men of their faculty of judgment. Neither the facts nor arguments of these articles are by any means unimpeachable. If the present amount of speculation was thrown into Spanish Mines, Foreign Loans, and many of which no one knew either the nature or the chances of the returns, the prospect would be disastrous enough; but every one knows what a Railroad is; we have them in daily operation, of all degrees, from those that make a good return, to those that are working at an actual loss. The boldest prospectus cannot venture to paint a Railroad as a gold mine; but many of them may be fairly considered as good investments. That very many are unnecessary and absurd, is also evident; but these will never cross the threshold of Parliament, or will be thrown out there; of these, the paid deposit will cover all expenses; those who have paid them, to that extent being losers, as they would have been had they spent the money on anything else without proper consideration. On most of the sound schemes—those which will be proceeded with—five per cent has certainly been paid up, and the other five per cent. will only be required when the Bill is ready to go to the House of Lords, on many of them that per cent. is paid up already. For the completion of these ones we have no doubt the money will be found with no difficulty, and, as their construction will be gradual, extending over some years, the capital employed returning during that time into the general trade of the country, no shock need be apprehended to the monetary system. The panic seems to have been produced by taking the whole number of proposed lines, calculating their expenses, and then asking whence is all the money to come from? But, as comparatively few will be actually constructed and those few gradually, the money will be found without pressure. How did the country find the scores of millions it spent every year during the war, in Foreign subsidies, and he pays and provisions of troops abroad? Are we, as a nation, less energetic, with less command of capital, after the accumulation of thirty years' peace, and when it is known that all the outlay will be in labour at home? But the public mind is perplexed with the multitude of projects, and, being unable to distinguish the bad from the good, is frightened by a kind of argument made to apply alike, although unjustly to all.

MR. PARKER, the Assistant Poor-law Commissioner, who conducted the inquiry at Aldbury, has been required to give in his resignation, and has done so. Why he was set up did the world of his masters too well, and by no means expected he would be visited with punishment. The Commissioners dismiss every body—the persons who are accused and the judges who try them—what rule they go by it would be impossible to say. For Somerset House is a law to itself. As far as any one could understand the ambiguous slip-loop of the "instructions," which seem now the recognizance sign go in all cases, Mr Parker has done his duty. All it does appear, Mr Parker appeared to have complied with them. All the uncertainties, doubts, doing one day and countermanding the next, were the Commissioners' own, and were all quite consistent with the easiness which could leave an official report affecting the character of an individual unread, for many months. It is quite time Parliament, or the Secretary of State, stirred up this Commission, and made it do the duties it was set to do, or undo them. All it does at present, is to make a bad law worse, by its mode of administering it, writing letters and instructions in bad English, while it dismisses officers for obeying, and instituting inquiries into mal-practices, without troubling itself about the result.

We are glad to see public—we wish we could add official—attention drawn to the scandalous manner in which the luggage of passengers arriving by the foreign steamers is examined at the Custom houses. The outports are not enough, but all of present management, and it is here, the palm must be given to London. The mode in which the business is conducted is a disgrace to the country: we can speak from personal experience on several occasions. An English-man landing at any French or Belgian port, has his luggage examined by the Custom-house, searched, and given up to him within twenty minutes. Several men are employed, and they do not, as officials, think we ready scoundrels, unwilling to pay in England. Consider every man guilty till you prove him innocent by a most minute and insulting investigation—this is the mode in action on here. But it is not the search that is complained of so much as the tedious manner in which it is done. Two men to examine the luggage of two hundred and fifty passengers, some with three, four, or more packages each, is the utmost a country with the great resources possessed by us can afford to employ; and the search is not merely nominal, as in France and Belgium. There all the passengers and all the luggage are sent into one room together; each gathers together his own, and unlocks bag and box; the officers come round, peep in, ask if Monsieur has anything to declare, perhaps move an article or two, chalk a mark on the package, walk on to the next, and you are at liberty to go your way. If there are parts from this rule, it arises from some act of rudeness on the part of the traveller himself, or some reasonable ground of suspicion in the officer. But politeness, civility, and, above all, despatch, are universal. An Englishman landing in London finds all this reversed. His luggage is conveyed into one room, he stands in another. His name is called from some list given in by the captain of the steamer—in which, in all probability, his name is not entered. It is certain not to be, if he does not take a berth, and on many occasions the vessel is so crowded there is no berth to take. Then, again, it happens frequently that three or four berths are taken in the name of one of a party, unknowing of the inconvenience this will cause them a landing. As only the person called is admitted, sometimes like a light of stairs on the part of the others to get in also—as they have a right to do. But as his masters believe all men are smugglers, the tyrant is constituted that all men are liars, so that he sees and the key is turned for another half hour. Those who see names are not down must wait till all the luggage is despatched, of all of that are. A delay of three or four hours is quite usual—sometimes for a single carpet bag. A few more hands employed, with a large room—and there is ample space in the Custom-house—with the passengers admitted at the same time, and many hours, in each morning, and much discredit to our government, would be saved while the revenue would lose nothing, for all this search does not detect anything in one case out of twenty. From the gentlemanly turn of our dry-shirts and stockings, it might be imagined the officers were making up in this share for their remissness elsewhere. Hundreds of thousands of pounds of duty were evaded in one year, the goods being passed under the very noses of the officials. At this moment large quantities of watches and jewellery have escaped them, which they have only seized after importation; and even now, perhaps, another huge batch of Custom-house fraud—may await discovery.

If half as much vigilance had been exercised in other departments, it would have been more creditable to the Board of Commissioners. Let the search be made as strict as may be required, but for the sake of our national character let it be made with some regard to public convenience, and with despatch. At present, all the arrangements are utterly and wholly disgraceful. It will be seen, from another part of our paper, that an advance has been made towards some improvement in the system at the St. Katherine's Docks.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR, Thursday Evening.—(From our own Correspondent.)—The Queen and the Prince promenaded this morning in the private grounds. The Hon Keppel Craven were taken out for their airings this morning; and again in the afternoon. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, shot this morning over the royal preserves in the Great Park. The Prince was attended by Mr Anson, of Exeter, Lord Hardwicke, Colonel Bouverie, and Mr J. E. Anson. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, attended by Lady Anna Maria Dawson, visited her Majesty, at the Castle, and remained to luncheon. Her Majesty was driven out in a pony phaeton, for an airing, this afternoon, to Virginia Water, by his Royal Highness Prince Albert. The equerries in waiting were in attendance upon the Queen and the Prince. The Royal Inner party this evening included her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, the Baroness de Spaeth, and Lady Anna Maria Dawson.

POSTPONEMENT OF HER MAJESTY'S VISIT TO ARUNDEL CASTLE.—This interesting circumstance, which has been talked of for the last year or even more, and for which the most costly preparations have been made, has been suddenly put off by her Majesty. There are various reports of the cause of this disappointment, the most probable of which is that Prince Albert is amused by his recent accident; and as pheasant shooting would be the leading sport of the day for his Royal Highness, the visit is consequently postponed until her Majesty's Royal Consort is quite recovered from the fall.

DEPARTURE OF M THIERS FOR PARIS.—Vascoe Malton had the honour of entertaining M Thiers at a dejeuner on Tuesday morning. His Lordship's guests on the occasion included the Marquis of Salisbury, Colonel Gurwood, Mr Hume, M.P., Mr Hayward, Mr Harcourt, M.P., &c. M. Thiers, accompanied by Count Walewski, left Mivart's Hotel on Wednesday morning at an early hour for Paris. We understand M Thiers had a lengthened interview with Viscount Palmerston on Tuesday afternoon, and was to have met with the noble viscount and vice-admiral in the evening, who had invited a select circle to meet the ex Premier; but owing to other engagements he was only glad to decline the pleasure.

THE SON OF THE CROWN PRINCE OF HANOVER.—The christening of the son of the Crown Prince of Hanover took place in Hanover. It is report that as Majesty will himself stand as one of the godfathers of the young child, who will be called Ernest Augustus.

THE RESIGNATION OF EARL GRANVILLE.—Earl Granville continues in every precarious condition, and breath and strength gradually declining

HER MAJESTY'S INTENDED RETURN TO THE ISLE OF WIGHT.—Her Majesty has announced her intention of rewarding Colonel Wemyss and Colonel Gurwood, Mr Hume, M.P., Mr Hayward, Mr Harcourt, M.P., Mr C. STOCK EXCHANGE AT LEICESTER.—A Stock Exchange was opened on Leicester-a Wednesday at the sale-an of the Exchange. The association consists of eight firms, comprising thirteen individuals. The subscription is £20 per annum, and the entrance-fee £10. The hours of business are from eleven to all past and remain two to half past. The dealings are for cash or for every of or purchase.

THE ARTHUR'S TEAS, MIDLAND RAILWAY.—There is a rumour that Mr. Robert Stephenson has died at their parlour, Liverpool. Mr. Bowler has been a member of Co. formerly for fifty-one years; he presided at the Secession in Friday last week, and was observed to be in his usual health and spirits. It when conversing with some of the magistrates, observed that "when the railroad-act was completed, he should be able to travel from Canterbury to London in two hours and a half." The coming event has not very much to blame for allowing the train to proceed at when he knew that the other engine would be only active and assist, and as he could only get on at the rate of five miles an hour. Had he stopped at the station, the accident would have been prevented."

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS

FRANCE.—It seems from the latest French papers, that, after all, Marshal Soult will retire from the Ministry of War; but that he will retain the Presidency of the Council. It was said that General Prim would be the new Minister. The Moniteur states that the administration of the Paris and Strasbourg, with branches to Reims, Metz, and Sarbruck, and that from Tours to Nantes will take place on the 1st of November next. Preparations for the inauguration of the Paris to Lyons, Lyons to Avignon, and Creil to St. Quentin, were in active progress. The papers contain a series of despatches from Algeria, which state that the Arabs were able to maintain themselves in all their positions, but that they had made no impression on the Arabs. Abd el Kader, who was supposed to be beyond the Tafora, had gone towards the province of the west. His son Ali had been seen with fifteen cavaliers. (Post)

DINNER TO MR HUDSON, M.P., AT SUNDERLAND

On Tuesday evening, a public dinner, in honour of Mr Hudson's return for Sunderland, took place in the Polytechnic Hall, which had been fitted up and decorated for the purpose. The walls were covered with banners used at the election, and opposite the chair hung a likeness of the Hon. Member taken by an artist in Newcastle. Upwards of 350 gentlemen sat down to dinner at J. J. Wright, Esq., was in the chair. On his right were G. Hudson, Esq., M.P., Lord Adolphus Vane, the Hon. H. T. Liddell, M.P., Alderman Richardson of York, the Sheriff of York, R. Pemberton, Esq., of the Bishop, and C. Brandwell, Esq. On his left, Lord Shaftesbury, Lieutenant-Colonel Wood, M.P., the Rev. D. Pierpont, Professor Powell, the Rev. Dr. Cumming, the Rev. Robert Webster, Esq., &c. &c. The principal vice-chair was filled by R. Spence, Esq.

After the accustomed toasts, the Chairman proposed the leading one of the evening,—

The health of the returned and distinguished gentleman, in whose honour we are assembled, (cheers) and he happened in order to proclaim the high estimation in which we held his talents—the unqualified support we entertain for his public character and the confidence we have in the integrity of his principles and conduct—a confidence that he will still more increase, if, instead of wishing to be thought a statesman, he will be content to be himself, and to place Mr Hudson alone by the side of the Members for Durham and Northumberland, the manner of which he may justly be proud when compared with the effete and effete names, Wellington, Lincoln, Lansdowne, Aberdeen, Peel, Graham, and Gladstone. (Applause.) The formation of Mr Hudson, a system of business and commerce, which has placed the name of Sunderland in the first rank of industry, has already, and will, in the future, be productive of greater benefits to the country than the whole of the Ministers that ever held office since the days of Walpole. (Cheers.) Mr Hudson's success which has become all the envy, have become matters of European wonder for the rapidity with which they have been accomplished, and the unexampled results, and as to the opinion formed of its power, and how it is proposed to be turned to the interest of the country, he would refer to the speech of Lord Ashley, in the House of Commons, on the 11th of last month, in which he said, "I consider the railway system of this country as the most important and valuable, and also as the most dangerous, power that ever was placed in the hands of any body of men." (Cheers.) Mr Hudson's success has been unparalleled, and has been the result of his own unaided energies, and he (the Chairman) felt that he was not trespassing on the feelings of any present, when he said that the honours he had received, and the position he had attained, were not the result of any party or political influence, but were entirely attributable to the high character and estimation in which he was held for his unquestionable integrity and honour. (Applause.) He (the Chairman) was not a party man himself, and he was glad to see so many present who were not of his own political opinions, but that they had made no impression on the Arabs. Abd el Kader, who was supposed to be beyond the Tafora, had gone towards the province of the west. His son Ali had been seen with fifteen cavaliers. (Post)
